This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

Printed Papers (Hansard's Case) — The Sheriffs, — By Mr. D'Israeli, — from the mayor, corporation, and inhabitants of the town of Maidstone, expressive of their deep regret at the continued imprisonment of the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, under order of this House, and praying for the immediate release of those gentlemen.

Church Rates, — By Sir George Strickland and Mr. Ward, for the abolition thereof, and for the immediate release of John Thorogood, now suffering imprisonment by reason of his conscientious refusal to pay such rates, — from Steeple Bumsted and Oughty Bridge.

Newport Riots (Cases of Frost, &c.), — By Mr. Ewart, — for a free pardon of Frost, Williams, and Jones, — from Worcester and Dumfries.

SOCIALISTS. — PRINTED PETITIONS.

Mr. WARD. — I have a petition to present from the inhabitants of Sheffield, complaining of the disparaging and very gross misrepresentations which have been made in this House, and elsewhere, respecting the doctrines and objects of a sect, to which petitioners belong, — the "Socialists." They respectfully pray that inquiries may be instituted into the doctrines in question, and especially that Mr. Robert Owen may be examined before a Select Committee of this House.

An Honourable Member. — I perceive that that petition is lithographed. I submit that it is therefore informal, and cannot be received.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I will take this opportunity of stating that the Public Petitions Committee, which is now sitting, would be exceedingly obliged to you, Mr. Speaker, for some instructions on this very point. Petitions are very frequently referred to us, on various subjects, which petitions, being lithographed, we do not exactly know how to deal with. Perhaps the Chair would favour us with its opinion on this matter?

The SPEAKER. — I take the rule, founded on the general understanding which has been come to by this House, to be, that lithographed petitions shall be considered as printed petitions. It is against the orders of the House to receive printed petitions.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS BILL.

Second reading deferred from Tuesday, 18th February, till Wednesday, 26th February.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — In case it shall appear that the sheriff, still in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, has not been released by that day, and in the event of my having no more convenient opportunity for the purpose, I beg to give notice that I shall, on Friday next, submit a resolution to rescind the order directing the sheriffs of Middlesex to repay the sum of 640*l.* to Messrs. Hansard.

TITHE COMMUTATION ACT.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — I wish to ask my Right Honourable Friend the Member for East Kent, whether he means, to-day, to press the second reading of his Tithe Commutation Bill? My reason for this question is, that we have had the prints before us only six days; and no sufficient opportunity has yet been afforded us to make ourselves masters of its details. I really think that, looking to the state of the House, this is not a favourable opportunity for taking the second reading, and, consequently, affirming the principle of so important a measure.

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL. — I hope, in answer to my Honourable Friend, to satisfy the House that I am not unreasonable in pressing the second reading of my Bill, as I shall presently do. The order for printing the Bill was made on the 29th of January. I do not think there can be any strong ground, therefore, for the complaint, that the Bill has not been a sufficiently long time before Members. I am aware that, owing to the new system adopted for the transmission of parliamentary papers, Gentlemen who live out of town may not have received their prints of the Bill until two or three days after they would have reached those Gentlemen under the old system. In that case I can easily conceive that they may have been put to much inconvenience.

POST OFFICE.

Mr. HODGSON. — I beg to know what arrangements have been made respecting the transmission of parliamentary papers to the country? I do not quite understand them.

Mr. R. STEUART. — The arrangements were explained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night; but it was found that the Post Office would find some difficulty in carrying it into effect; and therefore some other plan, I believe, will shortly be adopted.

The SPEAKER. — So far as regards the arrangements which have been made for the convenience of Members, in this House, I may observe, that those which I directed were, of course, as conformable with the paper which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put into my hands relating to the measures to be adopted in the Post Office department.

RETURNS, &c.

British Northern Colonies. — On the motion of Mr. George Palmer, Return ordered, "of vessels which cleared out at the British Northern Colonies in the years 1836, 1837, and 1838, for the several ports in the United Kingdom; showing the names, tonnage, number of men, when and where built, length, breadth, and depth, and the port at which arrived."

Ordnance. — Estimates of the Office of Ordnance for 1840-41, presented (Address 21st January). — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

CHINA.

Mr. R. PALMER. — Having observed an advertisement, recently, in the public papers, announcing that Her Majesty's ships will be ready to take treasure out to China, I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, whether private merchant ships may, with safety, clear out for China, and with any certainty of entering their port of destination when they arrive in the Chinese seas?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I will be much obliged if the Honourable Member will suffer his question to stand as a notice for to-morrow. I will be prepared to give him a distinct answer to-morrow.

VAGRANTS' REMOVAL BILL.

On the motion of Mr. R. PALMER, read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — I hope my Honourable Friend does not propose, after the second reading of this Bill, to delay the Committee very long?

Mr. R. PALMER. — I know of nothing to occasion any delay.

TITHES COMMUTATION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL. — I beg to move the second reading of this Bill. Gentlemen are aware that under the requisitions of the existing Act on this subject, the arrangements for commutation, in any case almost, cannot be completed until the new surveys of parishes which it has been deemed necessary to have executed shall have been made. When that Act was passed, it was calculated that six months would suffice for the preparation of such new surveys. It is quite clear that that expectation has been altogether defeated. Difficulties have arisen in the practical working of the Act, — sometimes under the application of its compulsory principle, — sometim under that of its voluntary principle, which have, hitherto, prevented the su vey from being completed. Since t recess commenced in 1839, a permane principle has, indeed, been settled f founding these surveys; but the tin required for bringing it into general a plication proves to be much longer th was originally contemplated. My desi is, that the House would sanction a me in cases where the principle of tithe rent-charge to give security to the tith owner, within the intent and meani

Two or three of the clauses which rela to this object, I have inserted (I can ha no hesitation in saying) at the suggesti of the Tithe Act Commissioners. I a of opinion that such an arrangement m that Act. In a word, my principal view i to prevent tithes being taken in kin

this object may be accomplished to t satisfaction of both parties, by providin party entitled to the tithe. I now mo the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. DIVETT. — I think I shall able to show that this is a Bill ill calc lated to produce the effect which t
Right Honourable Gentleman anticipa from it. The Bill now in operation " the commutation of tithes" was pas

The Right Honourable Baronet has that his object is to prevent the takin

mitted to say, that the ample machi remain on its present footing; as it stands, I mean, under the existing Act. I know not from what manufactory this Bill comes; —I presume from the office of the Tithe Commissioners; — but I am sure it could never be brought into operation without a vastly expensive and cumbrous process. Here is one clause which declares that the landowner — in the case suggested by the Right Honourable Baronet — is to give security to the tithe-owner; and that on this being done, an order is to be issued by the Tithe Commissioner of the district to prevent the tithe being levied in kind. Why, such a course of proceeding would be sure to involve the parties in endless differences. Let it be remembered, that the expenses of the Tithe Commission which we have established are already about 15,000*l.* a-quarter, or 60,000*l.* per annum; but, if the Right Honourable Baronet's Bill be carried, this charge, large as it is, will be enormously increased. I need not particularise any collateral evidence to prove that such increase of expense must be the result of bringing the Bill into operation. he fact is apparent. I am aware that e Right Honourable Baronet has told us t some of the main clauses have reived the sanction of the Tithe Comssioners; but I cannot think that that cumstance, in itself, affords a sufficient tification for any Honourable Member come down to this House, and ask its sent to a measure which must entail eavy burden on the public resources. ropose, as an amendment, that the be read a second time this day six nths.

r. FOX MAULE. — Sir, since the t Honourable Gentleman last brought question before the House, I have ght right to refer his proposition to Tithe Commissioners; and I am ined by one of those gentlemen, on lf of his colleagues, that it meets their approval, and that, if carried gh, it will have the effect of relieving from a great portion of the difficulties which they have to contend, — while, d of making the operation of the Commutation Act more expensive, diminish the expense. The object e Act is, to effect the commutation hes into a rent charge more speedily could otherwise be accomplished. It te true, as observed by my Honour- Friend behind me, that in most cases mposition has been accepted cheer- by the tithe payers; but still there n some few instances of vexatious ence to the old system of paying in kind, which some Act, like the present, can alone prevent. It is not to be expected that a great measure like that for the commutation of tithes could be made perfect at once, without requiring a supplementary Bill, in order to give its provisions more complete effect. On these grounds, I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. GOULBURN. — Sir, I confess that I very much doubt whether this Bill will answer any of the good purposes expected by the Honourable Gentleman opposite. It appears to me that the Bill will apply to extremely few cases in which the landowner is owner of the whole land in the parish. The Bill provides, that in case of a parish intending to compound for its tithes, any individual landholder, who can give security, can take the whole composition into his own hands, and become liable for its payment. Now, if one person were owner of the whole land of a parish, I could understand very well that it would be worth his while to undertake such a responsibility; but if the land should be divided among many holders, does any Honourable Member suppose that any individual holder would encumber himself with the whole tithes of the parish? I cannot conceive that any man, who could rationally calculate the difficulty of collecting tithes, would undertake the responsibility. These clauses, therefore, would only apply to one or two cases; and I really cannot see the necessity of legislating for so very rare a contingency. I am also afraid that the Bill will afford facilities for further delay, and that, if it pass, many compositions, now on the eve of completion, will be postponed indefinitely. Thinking, therefore, that the measure proposed is so important in its details, I should prefer that it were at once taken up by Government, and that the House should take it into its careful consideration. As at present introduced, I must oppose its further progress.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I must say that in my opinion, sufficient time has not been given for the consideration of this measure. We are called upon to agree to the second reading of the Bill within seven days after it has been delivered to Members; and this ground, alone, is sufficient to induce me to vote with the Honourable Member for Exeter, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — As it is my intention to vote for the second reading, I wish to explain my reasons for so doing.

CHINA.

MR. R. PALMER. — Having observed an advertisement, recently, in the public papers, announcing that Her Majesty's ships will be ready to take treasure out to China, I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, whether private merchant ships may, with safety, clear out for China, and with any certainty of entering their port of destination when they arrive in the Chinese seas?

TITHES COMMUTATION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL. — I beg to move the second reading of this Bill. Gentlemen are aware that under the requisitions of the existing Act on this subject, the arrangements for commutation, in any case almost, cannot be completed until the new surveys of parishes which it has been deemed necessary to have executed shall have been made. IV.; another, the 1 Vict.; another, the 2 Vict.; and the last, the 2 & 3 Vict. Now, I believe it to be absolutely impossible to dovetail into these several measures of legislation the present Bill, consisting as it does of no less than seventy clauses. The Right Honourable Baronet has said that his object is to prevent the taking of tithes in kind; and, undoubtedly, that would be a most useful and valuable object to accomplish. But I must be permitted to say, that the ample machinery which would be put in motion by a Bill like this in my hand, would, so far from facilitating the views of the Right Honourable Gentleman, infinitely enhance the difficulty of bringing about such a result. I apprehend the matter had better remain on its present footing; as it stands, I mean, under the existing Act. I am aware that the Right Honourable Baronet has told us that some of the main clauses have received the sanction of the Tithe Commissioners; but I cannot think that that circumstance, in itself, affords a sufficient justification for any Honourable Member to come down to this House, and ask its consent to a measure which must entail a heavy burden on the public resources. I propose, as an amendment, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. FOX MAULE.—Sir, since the Right Honourable Gentleman last brought this question before the House, I have thought right to refer his proposition to the Tithe Commissioners; and I am informed by one of those gentlemen, on behalf of his colleagues, that it meets with their approval, and that, if carried through, it will have the effect of relieving them from a great portion of the difficulties with which they have to contend,—while, instead of making the operation of the Tithe Commutation Act more expensive, it will diminish the expense. The object of the Act is, to effect the commutation of tithes into a rent charge more speedily than could otherwise be accomplished. It is quite true, as observed by my Honourable Friend behind me, that in most cases the composition has been accepted cheerfully by the tithe payers; but still there remain some few instances of vexatious adherence to the old system of paying in kind, which some Act, like the present, can alone prevent. It is not to be expected that a great measure like that for the commutation of tithes could be made perfect at once, without requiring a supplementary Bill, in order to give its provisions more complete effect. We are called upon to agree to the second reading of the Bill within seven days after it has been delivered to Members; and this ground, alone, is sufficient to induce me to vote with the Honourable Member for Exeter, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

SIR E. SUGDEN.— As it is my intention to vote for the second reading, I wish to explain my reasons for so doing.

I must, with great deference to my Right Honourable Friend, say, that I think the measure will, to some extent, fail in accomplishing one of its objects — that of giving the one landholder, who is to undertake the whole responsibility of a parish, sufficient security as against the other landholders. I have another objection to the alterations proposed, and that is, that they are the suggestion of the Tithe Commissioners. I think that the duty of these gentlemen is merely to carry out the law,— not to make suggestions as to its alteration. I think, also, that to introduce measures making material alterations in the original Tithe Composition Act is objectionable. I shall vote for the motion, however, on the understanding that the Bill be read a second time now, and afterwards referred to a Select Committee up-stairs.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I am quite ready to agree to the recommendation of my Right Honourable Friend. I am sorry to say that I am not in the same happy state of agreement with the representatives of Oxford and Cambridge. I hope there is no secret combination between the two universities to defeat the Bill, as I am sure it must do them great service. My object, in proposing it, was merely to carry into effect the ends which the Legislature had in view in passing the original measure. My Right Honourable Friend objects to our saddling one landholder with the responsibility; but, in my opinion, what is everybody's business is nobody's business,—and that is, I believe, the case in many parishes at this moment. I hope, therefore, that the Honourable Member for Exeter will withdraw his opposition to the measure, and suffer the Bill to be read a second time. I, on my part, shall be ready to refer it, afterwards, to a Select Committee.

Question put,—" That the word ' now ' stand part of the question."

Main question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

SPIRIT LICENCES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Mr. GILLON. — I move that the Spirit Licences (Scotland) Bill be now read a second time.

Question put,—" That the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. PRINGLE. — My objection to the further progress of the Bill is, that it is intended to do away with the necessity which now exists in Scotland, that every keeper of an alehouse should apply to the magistrates every year for a renewal of his licence. The Honourable Gentleman opposite objected, on a former evening, to this rule, as a degradation to the alehouse keepers; but I differ from him entirely, and, as far as my experience goes, I believe that the majority of respectable alehouse keepers are of my opinion, and would prefer the continuance of the present system. That works, in fact, hardship to those, only, who are incorrect in their conduct. The Honourable Member also said that accident might prevent the alehouse keeper from renewing his licence at the specified time, in which case he would lose it altogether. The Honourable Member should recollect that there is a remedy for this, as the alehouse keeper can apply to the Commissioners of Excise. Now, what is this proposition? It is, that it shall be lawful for the officers of excise to grant licences to alehouse keepers without such persons being obliged to get fresh annual certificates from the local magistrate, unless certain information shall have been given to the officers that the person applying keeps a disreputable house. In my opinion, the effect of this alteration would be, to increase, very much, the number of public houses all over the country, and altogether to change their character. The circumstance of such houses being subject to the inspection and control of the local magistrates, is one of very great importance. Under these circumstances, I shall feel it my duty to move, as an amendment, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question put,—"That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

Mr. R. STEUART. — As the Honourable Member for Falkirk seems to have mistaken what fell from me on a former occasion, I trust I may be allowed a word or two as to what my opinion is with respect to this measure. I have no desire to take from the magistrates the power of withdrawing the licences in the event of misconduct, but merely to save the spirit seller from the hardship and annoyance of having to go annually before the magistrates to obtain a renewal of his certificate. In my opinion, the Justice of Peace Clerk should give notice to the alehouse keeper, whom it is intended to deprive of his licence, that that person should attend before the justice to have the matter investigated, and that if the charges should prove unfounded, the licence would issue as a matter of course.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — Sir, my principal objection to the measure is, because it goes to create a difference, in this respect, between the law of Scotland and that of England. I will always oppose any proposition to withdraw the power of licensing from the magistracy. Gentlemen not acquainted with Scotland may imagine that that country labours under some special grievance in this matter. Such is not the case, as the law is precisely similar in both countries. I must object to this Bill; but I should have no objection to assimilate the law of Scotland to that of Ireland, by allowing persons to obtain licences for the sale of spirits not consumed on the premises.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—I should certainly be favourable to some such measure as the present, because the mode of proceeding in Scotland, with regard to the renewal of these licences, is productive of the greatest inconvenience to the persons interested, and because I think that that inconvenience could be removed without interfering with the efficient control of the magistrates. At the same time, however, I must object to some parts of the Bill now before the House. I wish to preserve to the magistracy all the substantial powers they now possess, with regard to the withdrawal of licences; but I desire to obviate any unnecessary inconvenience to the parties who have to obtain renewals of their licences.

Mr. HERRIES. — If I understand rightly, every one seems to object to the Bill as it stands at present. Under these circumstances, I think that the least inconvenient course would be, to withdraw the Bill, and prepare another more likely to meet the wishes of all parties. Besides, I am afraid that if such a law were passed for Scotland, we should soon have to pass a similar measure for this country.

GENERAL SHARP. — I shall feel it my duty to oppose the further progress of this Bill. I understand that it provides that magistrates, intending to resist the granting of licences, must lodge complaints at the Excise Office. Magistrates cannot know anything of the conduct of publicans unless it come officially before them,—a thing which, in Scotland, where most of the judicial business is done by the county sheriff, but rarely happens. Under these circumstances, I must vote against the Bill.

Mr. GILLON. — I submit that it affords good evidence of the merits of this Bill, that its adversaries can find no means of defeating it but misrepresentation. Some Gentlemen have stated that the intention of the Bill is, to take away all control from the magistrates; but I think that any Honourable Member who has listened to the remarks of the Honourable Lord of the Treasury (Mr. R. Steuart), must have had his doubts completely removed on that subject. With this observation, I shall leave the Bill in the hands of the House, merely further saying that, if Government will take up the matter, I shall be happy to commit the further stages of the Bill to its guidance.

The House divided: — Ayes 42, Noes 60; Majority 18.

INLAND WAREHOUSING BILL.

Second reading deferred till Friday, the 21st of February.

SUPPLY. — WAYS AND MEANS.

Committees deferred till Friday.

TRANSFER OF AIDS BILL.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I move that the House do now resolve itself into committee on the Transfer of Aids Bill.

Mr. HERRIES. — With the permission of the House, I will avail myself of this opportunity to make some observations with respect to the Return that has been made of the money available for the purpose of supply in the Exchequer. It appears on the face of the Return that there is still 1,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills to be issued, which formed part of the original amount of 25,000,000*l.* permitted to be issued under the vote of the Committee of Ways and Means. Now, I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman whether this does not make up the sum of 21,000,000*l.* Exchequer bills which he said were outstanding? The Right Honourable Gentleman's predecessor (Lord Monteagle) said, on a former occasion, that the amount of the unfunded debt was 20,000,000*l.* I suppose that that sum, with the additional 1,000,000*l.* which he intends to issue, and which he is authorised to do by the vote of last year, will make 21,000,000*l.*; and, also, that he does not intend to issue any more of the remaining 4,000,000*l.* This may be obvious enough to the Right Honourable Gentleman; but it is desirable that the public out of doors should be satisfied on the point. I will also avail myself of this opportunity to advert to an observation made by the Right Honourable Gentleman on my putting a question to him, on this subject, on a former occasion. The Right Honourable Gentleman then stated that his predecessor had reduced the amount of Exchequer bills from 29,000,000*l.* to about 20,000,000*l.* It struck me, at the time, that there must be some mistake; and on looking into this matter I found that my suspicions were confirmed, as I only find 8,000,000*l.* accounted for, leaving the balance 21,000,000*l.* This, in my opinion, will be seen to be the real amount of the unfunded debt. I only wish to have the matter elucidated, and I trust that the Right Honourable Gentleman will give me some explanation. I believe that, on the former occasion, the Right Honourable Gentleman referred to a paper in his hand, which gave a statement of the amount outstanding, and issues of Exchequer bills. If the Right Honourable Gentleman agree with what I have now stated, and if it appear in the Returns that the case stands as I have described, the reduction in the unfunded debt will be 8,000,000*l.*, and not 9,000,000*l.*, as has been affirmed. This has been effected by the transfer of 4,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills to the funded debt, and by the further reduction of the same amount of Exchequer bills. When, therefore, the Right Honourable Gentleman said that the unfunded debt had been reduced to 20,000,000*l.*, he must have referred to the paper which gave the amount at the beginning of last year as 28,000,000*l.* But if we take the additional 1,000,000*l.* into the account, and the reduction that has been made, the unfunded debt will be found to be 21,000,000*l.* This amount of 1,000,000*l.* Government has been authorised by the Act to issue, and I understand that it has been or will be issued for charges incurred.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—I trust I shall be able to answer the questions of the Right Honourable Gentleman in a very few moments. The first question of the Right Honourable Gentleman was, whether it is proposed to issue the 1,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills which was granted last year? My answer to this question is in the affirmative, —that it is our intention to do so. Again, with respect to the second question, which referred to the 4,000,000*l.* in addition, which were spoken of by the Right Honourable Gentleman, I can only reply, that it never was in the contemplation of the Government to issue, under the Act of last year, any amount of Exchequer bills beyond the one million to which I have just alluded, and which we were authorised by Parliament to issue. The Right Honourable Gentleman has therefore conjectured rightly when he assumed that the Government did not intend to do so. With respect to the statement of the amount of Exchequer bills, I gave it accurately on the former occasion,—namely, that on the 5th of January, 1839, it was 29,957,000*l.*, and on the 8th of June, that year, the amount was 20,180,000*l.*; but I did not include in this statement the one million to be issued. This added, will increase the statement of the unfunded debt from 20,000,000*l.* to 21,000,000*l.*

Mr. HERRIES.—I clearly understood, when the amount of Exchequer bills was voted last year, that it would be requisite to issue 25,000,000*l.*; whereas, with the addition which I have alluded to, the whole amount required, was, it seems, 21,000,000*l.* This is an objectionable proceeding, and I trust that care will be adopted to avoid it again.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—The Right Honourable Gentleman will recollect that I stated the grounds, on a former night, on which the House was called upon to make the vote which it agreed to; and I confess that the mode in which it was done may have had the appearance of overlapping to a certain extent. I am not, however, aware of any serious inconvenience that can occur from that fact. I will only add that, under the circumstances, it was impossible to take any other course.

Mr. HERRIES.—If the Right Honourable Gentleman will look back to the state of the unfunded debt on former occasions, he will find that care was taken as to this matter when Exchequer bills were voted in the Committee of Ways and Means. If the Right Honourable Gentleman will recur to former transactions, he will readily understand what I have adverted to. This, however, is not a mere objection of form, although it now might be easily rectified; but still it is desirable that there should not be a recurrence of it. If we allow the statement to continue to appear as it does, it will give the votes on the ways and means an unsettled appearance. In the year 1839, I admit, there were some unusual circumstances, which made it unnecessary to look narrowly at the surplus expenditure. On referring, however, to the general appropriation votes, and taking the ways and means on the one hand, and the supplies on the other, there mostly will be found to be a difference in the balance between them to the amount of about 100,000*l.*; but the real difference here is nearly 4,000,000*l.* This is an incongruity which should be avoided for the future.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHE-

QUER. — The appearance on the face of the amount may be such as the Right Honourable Gentleman has described; but it will be set perfectly right in the general accounts, and no inconvenience can result from it. There are some overdue Exchequer bills not paid, and there are some sums required under the Appropriation Act. For my own part, I do not see any very serious objection to this alleged discrepancy.

Mr. GOULBURN.—This is not merely an objection of form, but one of substance. Here the House gave authority to the Treasury to issue 25,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills, and it turns out that only 21,000,000*l.* were required. Thus Government had 4,000,000*l.* more in hand than they had services to pay for. I think it improper that 25,000,000*l.* should have been taken, when a less sum would have answered the purpose.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—It was believed that more would be required.

Mr. GOULBURN.—They were wanted, then, to make up any deficiency in the revenue that might occur. On this ground, then, were we to issue 4,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills? Under circumstances such as these, we might go on increasing the amount of Exchequer bills, which we would be obliged to meet, subsequently, by a loan. If the revenue had proved much shorter than it has done, we must then have issued the whole amount of Exchequer bills that you ask for. I think that it is extremely objectionable that, under the Appropriation Act, you should get an amount of 25,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills voted, when a much less amount would have answered the purpose. This, I repeat, I think is an objection in substance, and not one merely of form.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — No doubt, the amount of Exchequer bills voted in Committee of Ways and Means was greater than it was ever supposed would be required, but the reduction might not have been such as has really occurred.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I still must say that I entertain great objections to the proceeding, and must repeat the grounds of my dissent from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The House resumed, and the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow (Thursday).

RAILWAYS.

SIR HESKETH FLEETWOOD. — Sir, I beg to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that the engineer or engineers who have been appointed, in pursuance of the Address of this House of the 14th day of August last, do, in addition to the Report thereby required to be made, report on the merits of the railway from Preston to Fleetwood, and the harbour of Fleetwood, as regards the means that will be thereby afforded for facilitating the communication by sea between London and the north of Ireland, and the west of Scotland; reference being had to existing railways. I beg to state that the object of my motion is, to take care that the town of Preston should not be excluded from participation in the advantages of this Commission. My wish is, that, the public having incurred great expense by the appointment of this Commission, the Report should be a full and complete, not a garbled, statement of all the facts.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I really do not see that the directions to the Commissioners can be reopened, or their instructions extended. Their duty is to examine into the merits of different proposed lines of railroad, with the view of effecting the most speedy mode of communication between the three capitals. If the motion of the Honourable Baronet were conceded, I do not see how we could refuse the same privilege to every railroad in the kingdom. In my opinion, it would be quite unnecessary, as, in the case of completed railways, the public have ample means of judging for themselves.

Mr. SHAW. — While on this subject, perhaps I may be allowed to ask the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what time we may expect the Commissioners' Report. I believe it was the intention of those who proposed this Commission, that there should be a survey of the seaports, with reference to the lines of railway already surveyed. I understand that the Nautical Report is ready, but that the Report with respect to the best line of railway is not yet ready. If that be the case, I see no reason why we should not have the Nautical Report laid before us. Unless the necessary information on this subject be laid before us in sufficient time, the Session will pass over without anything useful being done on this subject. I have no preference for one line beyond another; my whole object is, that we should determine on the best possible line between London and Dublin. I will not venture to offer any opinon with respect to the comparative merits of the competing lines; but I think that, as soon as possible, the requisite information ought to be afforded us, to enable us to come to a just conclusion on the subject. No one can deny that a vast improvement has already been effected with respect to the intercourse between London and Dublin; but, notwithstanding all that has been done, I understand that it is still possible to make an additional saving of six or seven hours, — which would be an object of the greatest importance. With respect to the present motion, I quite concur with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it would be advisable not to press it at present.

Mr. R. GORDON. — In reply to the observations of the Right Honourable Gentleman, I beg to state that it is not considered desirable that the naval branch of the Report should be presented until the whole Report is ready. The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman must be aware that the survey embraced two points, — one with respect to which would be the best sea-port, and another with respect to the best line of railway. Now, though there might be no difficulty in deciding what would be the best seaport, still, unless it was practicable to have a good line of railway to that port, it is plain that the object in view could not be effected. For this reason, as the two points are so intimately connected, it is considered more desirable to wait until the joint Report is ready. I am happy, however, to be able to assure the House that I expect this Report will be before them early in March.

SIR H. FLEETWOOD. — In consequence of the suggestions that have been thrown out, I beg to withdraw the motion, but on a distinct understanding with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the question shall not be prejudiced by my having consented to do so.

The motion was then, by leave, withdrawn.

RATIONAL RELIGIONISTS.

Petition of members of the branches of the Universal Community Society of Rational Religionists, for inquiry into the principles and practices of that society. — To lie on the table.

Adjourned at seven o'clock.

APPEALS.

Campbell v. Campbell. — Further and fully heard, and interlocutors affirmed, with costs.

Persse v. Persse. — In part heard, and adjourned to Monday next.

De Montmorency v. Devereux. — To be heard on Monday next.

Carrick v. Buchanan. — The respondent ordered peremptorily to answer in a week.

Todd v. Dunlop; Malone v. Malone. — Leave for recognisances to be entered into for the appellants.

Sir W. F. Eliott v. Cleghorn (second appeal). — Petition of appellant for leave to withdraw appeal without payment of costs. — Read, and referred to the Appeal Committee.

FIERS' NATURALISATION BILL.

Certificate read; petitioner took the oaths; Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

SWAIN'S NATURALISATION BILL.

Reported, without amendment; and Bill to be ingrossed.

FEE FUND OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that the Clerk Assistant had laid on the table the annual account thereof; and the same was ordered to be referred to a Committee.

RAILWAYS.

Petition of James Ward, of Falcon Place, Falcon Square, for inquiry into various plans of his own invention, stated by him to be calculated to prevent accidents on railways. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

Petition of heritors, minister, elders, and others of Rayne, objecting to the power exercised by the General Assembly, in refusing to allow presentees to officiate without the sanction of the majority of the congregation, and praying for the adoption of some measure to settle the question in dispute.

The EARL of ABERDEEN presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion,—of the minister and elders and parishioners of Meldrum: of the Reverend the Presbytery of Tain: of the congregation and inhabitants of the Quoad Sacra Parish of Houndwood: and of inhabitants of the landward part of the Parish of Rothesay; Trumisgarry; Rosskeen; and Uig. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (COLONIES).

The BISHOP of LONDON presented a petition for the protection of, — of the minister, churchwardens, and others of Ashby de la Zouch. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

The BISHOP of LONDON presented petitions against any further grant of money for the support of, — of inhabitants of Elland cum Greetland; and of members of the Shepton Mallet Church of England Lay Society. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

LORD KENYON and the BISHOP of LONDON presented petitions praying for further church accommodation, — of clergy of the Deanery of Gloucester: of members of the Windsor and Eton Church

Union Society: of inhabitants of Egham; Henlow; Knaresborough; Leckhampton; Badgeworth; Charlton, Kings; and Upton St. Leonard's: and of members of the Shepton Mallet Church of England Lay Society. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH.

The Earl of Aberdeen presented a petition, praying for further church accommodation,—of inhabitants of Kirkpatrick, Durham. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SABBATH.

The Bishop of London presented petitions for the better observance of, — of the clergy, churchwardens, and others, of Saint Paul, Covent Garden: and of the Reverend the Presbytery of Tain. —Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SOCIALISM.

The Bishop of Exeter presented a petition complaining of the alarming progress of the system, and praying for the adoption of measures for the protection of morality and religion, — of Joseph Kinder and John Sorrell, of London Street, Fenchurch Street, London Solicitors; and Daniel Edward Stephens, of Chingford, Essex, gentleman. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On presenting this petition, —

The BISHOP of EXETER said: — I would join most cordially in the prayer of the petition, but that I consider the existing laws, if properly administered, will be sufficient to put down the evil complained of, and to protect the morals of the people. And as I have no doubt, after what fell from the Noble Marquess at the head of the Home Department on a former occasion, that those laws will be rigidly enforced, I do not conceive that any new legislative measure is necessary, and I cannot therefore concur in the prayer of these petitioners.

I now, my Lords, give notice of my intention to ask a question of the Noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government, on Monday next. I should give notice for to-morrow, but that the question which is then to be brought forward is one that I hope no discordant feelings will be allowed to intrude upon. I, for one, should be the last man in the world to do or say anything that could, in the remotest degree, tend to give rise to such feelings; but, on Monday next, I will put a question to the Noble Viscount, respecting a letter which was addressed to that Noble Lord in July last, by the Rev. Andrew Irvine, minister of the parish of St. Margaret's, Leicester, respecting the extension of the principles of Socialism in that great parish.

PRISONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I rise to move the second reading of the Prisons Act Amendment Bill. The sole object of the Bill, to which I anticipate no objection, is, to enable visiting justices, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to relax some of those prison regulations which, it is found, have operated too stringently with regard to debtors, who are confined in the same prisons with criminals.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — This is a very necessary and useful Bill, and I sincerely hope it may be carried. But I would suggest that, giving this power to visiting justices alone, is rather a new principle. Heretofore those regulations have been left to the magistrates of the county at large. I do not mean to propose any amendment on the subject, but merely to call attention to it. I think it would give generally more satisfaction if the rules and regulations were to be made by the magistrates in quarter sessions assembled, when the ratepayers would hear the matter discussed, and the reasons for adopting whatever course might be decided upon. I believe there are not men in the country who perform their duty better, or more conscientiously, than the magistrates. I only throw out this suggestion as a matter of principle, in order that we may not establish a new precedent without any necessity for doing so. It appears to me, also, that the Noble Marquess has now an opportunity of attending to the remark I ventured to make the other day, as to the propriety of exempting gaolers' houses and workhouses from the payment of Queen's taxes and parochial rates. It is true, that the clauses for that object cannot be originated in this House, but they can be introduced in another place.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I have already given instructions for the introduction of a Bill upon the subject.

With regard to the other suggestions of the Noble Duke, I have only to observe, that this Bill is merely to allow the visiting justices to apply such portions of those rules and regulations to debtors as they may conceive necessary, for the discipline of the prison; by which course I think a more immediate and effectual remedy can be applied to any evil that may arise.

Read a second time (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

RAILROADS.—SUPPLY OF PURE WATER FOR THE METROPOLIS.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER.—I rise, pursuant to the notice I gave on a former evening, and also pursuant to a notice I gave at the latter end of last Session, to bring before your Lordships a question with regard to railroads, and the better supplying of the metropolis with water. Your Lordships may think it extraordinary that I should couple the two questions together; but I think, before I sit down, I shall be able to prove that my proposal to bring both these subjects before a Select Committee,—which I shall conclude by moving for,—is by no means inconsistent. My proposition has nothing to do with the general system of railroads; but it is my intention, in the first instance, to have the attention of the Committee directed to the very great danger which attends the present state of railroads. When we consider the immense heights of the banks over which the railways run, and the comparatively slight manner in which those banks are constructed, your Lordships must be aware that if any railway carriage should by accident run off of the trams, the consequences must be of the most appalling description. I think, therefore, that if by having recourse to the advice of eminent engineers, after a full examination into this important subject, means can possibly be devised by which this danger may be averted, it is an object most desirable to be attained. With this view, I intend to propose that the question shall be referred to a Select Committee, by whose labours, I think, a most important service may be rendered to the country. Fortunately, hitherto, no serious accident of the description I have mentioned has occurred; for, whenever the carriages have been driven off the rails, the thing has happened on low grounds, where the roads were level with the lands on either side. I have conversed with some very intelligent engineers on this question, and many of them think it is practicable to adopt a system by which accidents of the nature I apprehend may be prevented. That, however, will form a subject of inquiry before a Committee. Having thus briefly stated my object, with regard to railroads, I will now address myself to the other branch of my motion,—namely, the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the means of obtaining an ample supply of pure water to the inhabitants of the metropolis. Ever since I have turned my attention to both these subjects, I have had my mind made up not to take any share in, or to have anything to do with, the direction of either railway companies or water companies, because I wish to stand entirely aloof from all suspicion of interest, bias, or prejudice, in the views I may entertain respecting them; and if your Lordships will agree to the appointment of a Committee, I shall endeavour to select such Noble Lords to act upon it as may stand in a similar situation to myself in that respect,—my wish being, that the Committee should be formed entirely of persons having no interest whatever in these companies. The question respecting the supply of pure water for the metropolis is, undoubtedly, one of much greater importance—affecting, as it does, the health and lives of the inhabitants—than that relating to railways. It is a subject, also, which has already engaged the attention of both Houses of Parliament; but, notwithstanding that an inquiry before a Select Committee of the House of Commons has taken place, and a Report been made thereon, still, nothing satisfactory has been done in pursuance of that inquiry. Your Lordships are aware that the great object is to obtain a sufficient supply of pure water. Although a sufficient supply might be obtained from the River Thames, yet, magnificent as that river in itself is, it is hardly possible to obtain pure water from it, owing to the number of filthy drains which flow into it from all parts in the vicinity of London. Many attempts have been made by the great monopolies—which the water companies really are—to obviate this grievous evil. The Chelsea Water Company have formed a large filtering bed, composed of sand, which, to a certain extent, has, I believe, been successful; but I am afraid it has not succeeded altogether. The Grand Junction Company were at first so situated that it was impossible for them to obtain water in a state of purity, having introduced their "dolphin" near one of the most offensive drains that could possibly be found. Whatever efforts, therefore, that company may make, it must be obvious that so long as that drain exists in the vicinity of their works, no pure water can be supplied by them from that immediate part of the river. When this subject was discussed before a Committee, on a former occasion, this company undertook to make a very large expenditure, to the extent, I believe, of 100,000*l.*, with a view to remove the objection then urged, by carrying pipes up the river as far as Kew, and obtaining a supply of purer water there; and in this attempt they have, I believe, succeeded to a certain extent. Another company — called the Grand Junction and West Middlesex Company—have adopted a similar plan, which has likewise, to a certain degree, succeeded. But it is impossible to suppose, even after all the money that has been thus expended, or after all the pains taken by the use of powerful machinery for throwing up the water to some hundred feet in height, that anything like pure and wholesome water can be obtained within such a distance of London, from a stream like the Thames, into which hundreds of the most offensive drains are constantly pouring their pernicious contents. If, then, any means can be devised by which a purer description of water may be obtained, your Lordships must feel that, for the sake of the health and happiness of the metropolis, it is most desirable that those means should be ascertained and adopted. To what, then, have your Lordships to look for a supply of pure water? To nothing but the springs that surround this great metropolis. There are many springs within the circuit of ten or twelve miles, and particularly one on the north side of the metropolis, from which there is a very great fall, and from which a supply of pure water may be had. Undoubtedly, if a supply of pure water could be obtained within the metropolis itself, it would be all that your Lordships or the inhabitants could require. And I am aware that, some year or two ago, a company was formed for the purpose of furnishing water from springs under the metropolis itself, by sinking what are termed "Artesian wells;" and if all which that company professed to accomplish could be verified, it would completely answer every purpose that could be desired. But I very much fear that the plan was impracticable.

Another company — I am not sure of the name, but I believe it is called the London and Westminster Water Company — have also put forth a prospectus for doing what would undoubtedly prove a great blessing to the metropolis — bringing not only pure water, but an ample supply of it, to the inhabitants. This company state that they have taken a piece of land, between two and three miles in extent one way, and a mile and a half the other, at a place called Bushy Heath, near Watford, and within ten or twelve miles of London, where, by boring, water of a very fine and pure description may be raised to within eighteen feet of the surface. This land, they state, is upwards of 160 feet above the level of the city of London, and, consequently, the water would flow without any sort of machinery being employed. Thus the great expense which is now incurred by the existing companies would be avoided. The water I have tasted, and it is, certainly, of a very excellent quality. I understand that it is raised through a soil composed of light sand and gravel; that the springs are very near chalk hills, and that the quantity that can be supplied would be sufficient to meet all the wants of the metropolis. For the supply of water thus obtained at Watford, a reservoir is to be formed at the Eyre Arms, in the neighbourhood of St. John's Wood — a place, no doubt, well known to your Lordships, since it is the spot which was selected for the principal rehearsals of the splendid "passage of arms," afterwards celebrated with so much magnificence, and so gallant a display of modern chivalry, at Eglintoun. The distribution thence to every part of the metropolis would be attended with little difficulty and little expense. It is true that, if any plan could be adopted for cutting off the sewers which now empty themselves into the Thames, the supply of water from the river might be considered pure enough to meet the wants of the inhabitants; but I apprehend that that, even if it could be done at all, could be accomplished only at a vast expense. Upon the whole it appears to me that the only chance of obtaining a wholesome and proper supply of water is from some of the springs which take their rise to the northward of the metropolis. I now conclude, my Lords, by moving that a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration the present state of railroads, in regard especially to the means of security against unforeseen dangers; also, to take into consideration the present supply of water to the metropolis.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — Understanding that the Noble Marquess does not intend to pledge himself or the House to any remedial measures that may be suggested, either with regard to the dangers of railway travelling, or to the inconveniences resulting from the nature of the supply of water to the metropolis, I am of opinion that, if the inquiry now proposed be not attended with any positive advantage,— of which, I own, I do not see any very great probability, — it certainly cannot be accompanied by any possible disadvantage; and, for that reason, I shall not feel it necessary to oppose it. Unquestionably, everybody must feel that the more the system of railways is extended, the greater should be the care of the Legislature to adopt every means in its power of preventing a recurrence of those accidents by which human life may be placed in danger. The question of the supply of water to the metropolis is an extremely difficult one, but one, from its importance, well worthy the attention of the Legislature. It would, perhaps, be more for the convenience of the House, if the consideration of the two subjects were separated.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — I confess I looked with some degree of curiosity at the notice of the Noble Marquess, which connects two objects in themselves so different, and between which I certainly must say the Noble Marquess has not shown the slightest connection. In addition to that, I do not think the Noble Lord,— as far, at least, as the first part of his motion goes — has given sufficient reason for instituting an inquiry on the subject; an inquiry, too, which I confess appears to me one of great difficulty, seeing that it is an inquiry into the means of security from dangers which are unforeseen. I am not aware of any danger existing, or of any accidents occurring, to such a degree as to call for this sort of inquiry. The fact is quite the reverse. The Noble Marquess has, himself, admitted that no accidents of the kind that he contemplates have as yet occurred. With what advantage, then, can your Lordships enter upon an inquiry as to the probable means of meeting a probable evil? I apprehend that the only result of our embarking upon such an inquiry will be, to excite a groundless alarm in the public mind as to the security of this particular mode of conveyance. To the second part of the inquiry proposed by the Noble Marquess, — namely, the supply of water to the metropolis, — I shall not offer any objection, feeling that that is one of great interest and importance; but, at the same time, I cannot help observing that the Noble Marquess has stated nothing very definite in support of his proposition even upon that point. A great deal of valuable information has already been collected by Committees of both Houses of Parliament on the subject, and we can scarcely expect that another Committee will elicit much new information, or lead to any very practical result. I however do not object to the inquiry upon that part of the Noble Lord's motion.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER.—With regard to railways, my object is, to ascertain whether it may not be possible to introduce some kind of machinery to prevent the possibility of such accidents as I dread upon high embankments, — occurring. I do not think we should wait until accidents actually happen, which it is evident may happen, before we devise means of security against their occurrence.

The EARL of ABERDEEN.—I would ask your Lordships whether the entering into speculations for making machinery to meet dangers that have not occurred is a usual mode of inquiry? These dangers may be possible, but they have not happened. If the Noble Lord had stated that he had a petition to present from some persons, alleging that they had invented a new kind of machinery which would guard against any contemplated danger, there would be some ground for inquiry; but the Noble Lord has only said that machinery may be made which may meet dangers that may occur. I have never heard a proposition advanced upon less practical grounds.

The EARL of ESSEX. — I beg to observe, with regard to what has fallen from the Noble Marquess respecting springs, that it is well known, if the supply be taken from a particular spot by means of Artesian wells, that it will be very liable to dry up all the immediate springs in the neighbourhood. I happen to live near Watford, and I know that the people in the immediate neighbourhood are alarmed at the idea of a supply being drawn from the springs of that district.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER. — The proposed water supply from Watford is not to be obtained through the medium of Artesian wells.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — I hope the Noble Marquess will consent to divide his motion; — to appoint a Committee to consider of the supply of water, and to leave the subject of railways alone till some specific plan can be suggested for guarding against the accidents to which the Noble Marquess has referred.

The DUKE of RICHMOND.—I also hope that the Noble Marquess will withdraw that part of his motion which relates to railways. If a Committee were granted on that subject, considerable alarm might be caused to persons having their money vested in railroads, and an opportunity given to every schemer to bring forward some new plan of machinery; which your Lordships, not being engineers, would know nothing about, and could give no opinion upon. Inquiry upon that head, therefore, cannot possibly be attended by any good, whilst it would certainly have the effect of putting the country to a very great expense. If it were possible to invent a machine to prevent accidents upon railways, the parties interested—the engineers, directors, and others, whose attention is constantly directed to the subject—would be much more likely to discover it than a Committee of your Lordships' House.

LORD REDESDALE.—I think there is also some objection to the second part of the Noble Marquess's motion; because, from the way in which the Noble Marquess has put it, it would appear that the object of the motion is, to allow certain companies to put forward their plans at the expense of the public. This would be attended by a double injustice. Suppose, for instance, that your Lordships' Committee should report in favour of the supply of water from Watford, and a Bill were to be introduced for that purpose, would you not thereby place the inhabitants of Watford under a very great difficulty, if it should be their interest to oppose such a measure?

LORD ASHBURTON.—It is certainly ridiculous to join in one motion questions so widely differing as railroads and a supply of water, and between which the Noble Marquess has not attempted to show the least connection. If your Lordships are disposed to grant a Committee on the question of supplying the metropolis with water, I only hope that no particular experiment will be sanctioned until we shall have an opportunity of giving our attention to the subject generally.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER.—I will not attempt, against the general wish of the House, to press the first part of my motion. I must, however, observe, that accidents, and serious ones, have occurred from railway trains getting off the line. The accidents of which I spoke, as not having occurred, are accidents which may arise in the same way, but (as in the case of high embankments unprotected at either side) which would necessarily be attended with more appalling results. As it is the wish of your Lordships, however, I shall limit my motion to this, "That a Select Committee be appointed to take into consideration the present supply of water to the metropolis."

Motion put, and agreed to.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The following Bills were respectively presented; read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time.

Llangerniew Inclosure Bill, — "For inclosing Lands in the Parish of Llangerniew, in the County of Denbigh."

Manchester and Salford Junction Canal Bill, — "To enable the Manchester and Salford Junction Canal Company to raise a further Sum of Money, and to alter, amend, and enlarge some of the Powers and Provisions of the Act relating to the said Canal."

Hereford Improvement Act Amendment Bill, — "To amend and render more effectual, so far as relates to the Lord Scudamore's Charity Moneys, the Provisions of an Act passed in the fourteenth Year of the Reign of His Majesty King George the Third, for improving the City of Hereford, and for other Purposes connected with the said City."

Torquay and Dartmouth Roads Bill,— "For more effectually repairing and improving certain Roads near Torquay, Paignton, Brixham, Kingswear, Newton Abbot, and Shaldon, and for making certain new Roads connected therewith, all in the County of Devon."

In the following cases, petitions for Bills were reported, and Bills ordered to be brought in.

Dronfield Inclosure, — By Mr. WILLIAM EVANS and Mr. GEORGE CAVENDISH.

Tweeddale Patent Drain Tile and Brick Company, — By Mr. COMPTON and Mr. HAYTER.

Maiden Newton Roads, — By Mr. STRANGWAYS and Mr. ROBERT GORDON.

Macclesfield and Congleton Road, — By Mr. TATTON EGERTON and Mr. EDWARD JOHN STANLEY.

Workington Harbour, — By LORD VISCOUNT LOWTHER and COLONEL LOWTHER.

Workington Improvewent, — By LORD VISCOUNT LOWTHER and COLONEL LOWTHER.

Liverpool East India Warehouse Company, — By LORD VISCOUNT SANDON and Mr. CRESSWELL.

Edinburgh Poor and Local Taxes, — By Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL and Mr. MACAULAY.

Nairnshire Roads, — By COLONEL GRANT and Mr. FRANCIS GRANT.

Marine Insurance Company, — By Mr. ALDERMAN HUMPHERY and Mr. GRIMSDITCH.

Birmingham and Derby Junction Railway and Tamworth Approach. — Petition for Bill reported, and Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. DUGDALE and Mr. SCHOLEFIELD.

Clyde Navigation. — Petitions complaining of non-compliance with the Standing Orders, — from John Bartholomew and Company, Hugh Cogan, and Robert Bartholomew; manufacturers of iron in and near Glasgow; Henry Monteith and Company; and Company of Proprietors of the Glasgow Waterworks. — Referred to the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills.

Upper Hayford Inclosure (No. 1.). — Petition of John Lechmere, complaining of non-compliance with the Standing Orders. — Referred to the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills.

River Weaver Tolls. — Petition of the President of the American Chamber of Commerce of Liverpool, for inquiry.—To lie on the table.

Wexford Harbour and Embankment.— Petitions complaining of non-compliance with the Standing Orders, — from Nicholas Aylward Vigors, Esq.; and James Kibblewhite, Esq.—Referred to the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

On the motion of Sir G. Grey, Report from Select Committee on Private Business (7th February) read:—

Resolved, That no Private Bill (except Divorce, Name, Naturalisation, and Estate Bills, not relating to Crown, Church, corporation, or charity property held in trust for public uses) be read a second time until six clear days after a breviate thereof shall have been laid on the table of this House, and have been printed.

Resolved, That a breviate of the amendments made in every Committee on a Bill be laid upon the table of this House, at least the day previous to that upon which the Report from the Committee shall be made, except when the Report upon the Bill may be required to lie upon the table; in which case the breviate shall be laid upon the table at least the day previous to that upon which the Report shall be taken into consideration.

Question proposed, That no petitioners against any Private Bill shall be heard before the Committee on the Bill, unless the petition shall have been presented to this House three clear days before the day appointed for the first meeting of such Committee, unless the petitioners shall complain of any matter which may have arisen during the progress of the Bill before the said Committee.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET.—The House ought to use its own discretion as to any exception from this rule that may arise. If that be understood, I have no objection to this resolution.

SIR G. GREY.—It is quite clear that the House ought to exercise such a discretion, and in any case which ought to form an exception to the rule, the appeal to the House will be still open to the parties.

Resolution agreed to.

Ordered, That the said Resolutions be Standing Orders of this House.

On the motion of Sir G. Grey, Standing Order No. 5. read, and repealed.

Resolved, That a Committee, consisting of forty-two Members (not being members of the Select Committee on Standing Orders), of whom five shall be a quorum in opposed cases, and three a quorum in unopposed cases, be appointed at the commencement of every Session, to which shall be referred all petitions for Private Bills; and such Committee shall be denominated "The Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills."

Ordered, That the said Resolution be a Standing Order of this House.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

RETURNS, &c.

Metropolitan Police.—Annual Account presented (by Act).

Horse Patrol.—Annual Account presented (by Act).

Writs of Error.—Further Return presented—of the number of writs of error brought into the Court of Queen's Bench for the last ten years (ordered 27th January).—To lie on the table.

Education (Ireland).—On the motion of Mr. Serjeant Jackson, Copies ordered—

Of any applications made by clergymen of the synod of Ulster to the Board of Education in Ireland for aid to schools connected with the synod, since the recent conference between the deputation from the synod and the board, in presence of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and of any answers returned to such applications, or of any minutes made or resolutions entered into by the board in relation thereto.

Public Bills (Scotland).—On the motion of Mr. Colquhoun, Return ordered—

Of the number of such Bills relating to Scotland as have been introduced into Parliament by the law officers of the Crown during the years 1835, 1836, 1837, and 1838; distinguishing those which have passed into law, and also those which passed through this House; and stating the expense attending the preparation and further prosecution of such Bills into or through Parliament, with the names of the persons to whom such expenses have been paid, with the amounts paid to each, and the authority by which, and the funds out of which, such payments have been made.

Quarter Sessions.—On the motion of Mr. Barneby, Address for Returns

Of all the recorders appointed to preside at the quarter sessions in each city or borough in England and Wales, stating their names, dates of appointment, and amount of salaries.

Of the days on which each of the quarter sessions have been holden in the said cities or boroughs, in the years 1837, 1838, 1839, and in the month of January, 1840; the number of days during which the court have been occupied at each quarter session; stating whether the court has been adjourned, and, if adjourned, the cause of such adjournment.

PARLIAMENTARY BURGHS (SCOTLAND).

Bill, "to provide for the better Regulation of Municipal Corporations in Parliamentary Burghs not Royal Burghs in Scotland," presented by the LORD ADVOCATE, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Thursday, 27th February, and to be printed.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented, and severally ordered to lie on the table: —

Church of England, — By Mr. BARNEBY, Mr. ALDERMAN COPELAND, COLONEL WOOD, Mr. WHITMORE, LORD EASTNOR, Mr. S. HERBERT, Mr. R. PALMER, SIR R. INGLIS, and LORD VISCOUNT SANDON, for extension, — from Broom; Askerswell; Loders; Wotton Fitzpaine; Ashburton; Okehampton; Sturminster Newton Castle; West Chelborough; Fifehead Magdalen; Sandford Orcas; Marldon; Boxgrove; Shellingston; Worfield; Higham on the Hill; Pangbourne; Swallowfield; Stoke upon Trent; Oldbury; Rowde; Edington; Hales Owen; Marston Sicca; East Coulston; Shipton Moyne; Beeching Stoke; Beard; Llanelly; Hay; Crickhowell; Abthorpe; and Keysoe.

Church Rates, — By Mr. V. SMITH, for abolition, and for the release of John Thorogood, — from Manchester (nine petitions); and Northampton.

Elective Franchise and Municipal Corporations (Ireland), — By Mr. PIGOTT, Mr. O'CONNELL, and Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN, for extension and reform, — from Freshford and Three Castles; Eirke, Furtagh, and Glashare; Dromore and Garvaghy; Tyholland; Donoughmore; Glenade; Drumragh; Killenkere; Tyrella and Drumaroad; Rathconrath and Kilmacnevin; Aughabog; Monterconnaught; Castlerahan; Croagh; Tulleroan; and Clonmel.

Flour Importation (Ireland) Bill, — By COLONEL BUTLER, — from Kilkenny, against.

Church Patronage (Scotland), — By SIR W. RAE, SIR G. SINCLAIR, Mr. MACAULAY, Mr. COLQUHOUN, and Mr. FOX MAULE, for alteration of law, — from Kinclaven; Tenandry; Ruthwell; Kirkmichael; Wick; Thurso; Tillicoultry; Lawers; Rothesay; Roderick Macfarquhar; Kingarth; Tweedsmuir; Arrochar; Rosskeen; Greenock Presbytery (moderator); Annan Presbytery (moderator and clerk); Trumisgarry; Dryfesdale; Latheron; Kinfauns; and Inverness (two petitions).

Corn Laws, — By Mr. C. VILLIERS, for repeal, — from Lancaster; and Aberagie.

Newport Riots, — By Mr. T. DUNCOMBE and Mr. HUME, for a free pardon to Frost, Williams, and Jones, — from Banbury; Edward William Twelves; and James Anderson and others.

Workhouses, — By Mr. R. PALMER, — from Abingdon union, for exemption from parochial and local taxes.

Maynooth College, against further grant, — from Long Ashton; and Saint Mary Aldermary, London.

Printed Papers, — By Mr. ERLE, — from Oxford (two petitions), for liberation of the sheriff of Middlesex.

Designs Copyright Bill, — By LORD VISCOUNT SANDON, — from Liverpool, in favour.

Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill, — By Mr. PIGOT, — from Clonmel, in favour.

POSTAGE.

Mr. WALLACE. — I hold in my hand a petition from the inhabitants of the parish of Bowden, in Roxburghshire, complaining that they have not a post office in their district, and that they experience very great inconvenience in consequence. The petitioners have made application to the authorities of the Post Office, and even offered to pay the salary of the postmaster, and to guarantee a revenue that shall cover any expenses that may be incurred; and notwithstanding this very liberal offer, no office has yet been established in their district. I will now move that this petition be printed with the Votes, and give notice that I shall, on the 27th of this month, bring the subject under the notice of the House.

Upon the question being put, — "That this petition be printed with the Votes," —

SIR G. SINCLAIR said: — I must object to the printing of this petition. I think the better course would be, to refer it to the Post Office.

Mr. WALLACE. — Sir, I am not sorry that this objection has been made. Already, Honourable Members are debarred from speaking on petitions; and now, when it is proposed that the petitions of the people shall be printed, in order to found a discussion upon them, up starts the Honourable Baronet and objects to it. If the suggestion of the Honourable Baronet should be acceded to, there would be more complaints than there are at present respecting the mode in which the House deals with petitions. I should not be sorry if my motion were lost upon a division, for it would show an anxious desire on the part of the Honourable Gentlemen on the Opposition benches to prevent the wishes of the people from being known in this House. I shall certainly divide the House upon my motion.

Mr. F. SHAW. — The speech which the Honourable Member for Greenock has just made is the very best reason that could be given for not printing such a petition. The Honourable Member does not deny that his object is to evade the order of the House, that no petition shall be printed unless there is a motion to be founded upon it. But the Honourable Gentleman has admitted that his object in getting this petition printed, is not to found a motion, but merely to create a discussion upon it. The Honourable Member has charged Honourable Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House with entertaining a wish to prevent the petitions of the people from receiving due attention. That charge is wholly unfounded. I and my Honourable Friends are, at least, as anxious that the prayer of the people should be heard in this House as the Honourable Member himself can be; but we are also anxious that the rules and orders of the House should be complied with.

Mr. WALLACE. — It is my intention to found a motion on the petition; but I thought I could not give notice until after five o'clock. I have in my hand the terms of the motion I intend to move. I will read it, now, if there be no objection; but if, as I believe the case to be, the rule is to give notice after five o'clock, I will do so then.

The SPEAKER. — After five o'clock.

SIR G. SINCLAIR. — I shall not take the sense of the House on my objection; but, if a petition like this is to be printed with the Votes, I think every other petition ought also to be printed with them.

The motion was then agreed to, and the petition ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I wish to suggest to my Honourable Friend the Member for Oxford University the expediency of postponing his motion upon the subject of church extension, which stands on the paper for Tuesday next, till a future day.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — My Noble Friend is not the only one who has requested me to postpone my motion. I feel, therefore, reluctantly compelled to yield to many very urgent solicitations from the friends of the course which I advocate, and I shall defer bringing forward the subject until after Easter.

REGISTRY OF VOTERS (IRELAND).

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I beg to give notice that on Tuesday, the 18th of February, I shall move for a "Return of the number of freemen or burgesses in each of the boroughs in Ireland entitled to vote in the election of Members to serve in Parliament for such boroughs, having obtained certificates of registry."

CORN LAWS.

Mr. PRYME. — I beg to postpone my motion relating to the Corn Duties Bill, until the Honourable Member for Wolverhampton shall bring forward his motion on the Corn Laws. I will therefore defer the motion till Thursday, the 20th February.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Mr. EWART. — I will take this opportunity to state, that I intend, on the 27th instant, to move for a copy of the warrant of His late Majesty William IV., for opening the Court of Common Pleas to the bar generally; also, for a copy of the late order of the judges for again closing the court; and, a return of the number of causes that have been heard since the order came into operation.

RELATIONS WITH CHINA.—BANKING.

MR. HUME.—When the House shall, on Friday, 21st February, go into Committee of Supply, it is my intention to move for the production of papers respecting our relations with China. I shall also take that opportunity to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he intends to introduce any measure for the regulation of the banking system?

MR. WALLACE.—I presume, Sir, I may now give notice that on Thursday, the 27th of February, I shall move that it is the duty of the Postmaster General to afford all reasonable facilities and accommodation to communities who have not a post office or a post at present, especially to such as have a desire to send their letters openly and legally, and who shall apply to the Postmaster General for the usual means of doing so:—that the case of more than one thousand inhabitants in the parish of Bowden, in the county of Roxburgh, as represented in their petition to this House, is one of great hardship, and directly in point; therefore, that the prayer of the petitioners should be granted, by the Postmaster General affording to them similar post office accommodation to that enjoyed by their neighhours in the adjoining parishes.

PRIVILEGE.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—Sir, I rise to ask the Noble Lord opposite a question respecting the sheriff who is now suffering imprisonment. The House, on the 21st of January, resolved that the sheriffs be ordered to refund the 640*l.* levied by the sale of the goods of Messrs. Hansard. One of these officers has since been released in consequence of illness. Now, I wish to know whether it is the Noble Lord's intention to keep the other gentleman in custody for the whole Session for the whole amount, as the sum was directed by the House to be levied from the two sheriffs, not one only?

LORD J. RUSSELL.—As I understand, there is but one sheriff for Middlesex, and two for London, the House committed two persons who performed the office of sheriff of Middlesex, giving them that designation. They have since ordered that one of the sheriffs should be released, on a statement being made to them that further confinement would endanger his life. I do not conceive, then, that under such circumstances, the resolution of the House is at all altered, and I still think that those persons are bound by it.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—The Noble Lord has done me the honour to place my name on the Committee on Printed Papers. I must now beg that he will place some other Honourable Gentleman on that Committee in my room, as it is not my intention to attend.

TRADE TO CHINA.

MR. G. PALMER.—Yesterday I put a question to the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, regarding the Chinese trade, which the Right Honourable Gentleman said he would answer this day. When I put that question I was not aware that any fresh accounts had been received from China. I presume that those accounts, if authentic, will prevent the Right Honourable Gentleman from giving me any answer. I beg leave, therefore, only to put the new question, whether those accounts are true or not? I shall, however, be glad, if the Right Honourable Gentleman can give me any information that may be of use to merchants engaged in the trade.

MR. LABOUCHERE.—The question which the Right Honourable Member put yesterday, was one to which I can have no difficulty in giving an answer. That question was, as I understood it, whether clearances would be granted at the Custom-house to ships going to China. My answer is, that no directions have been given to the Commissioners of the Customs to refuse clearances to ships proceeding to the coast of China. But I cannot give that answer without at the same time saying, on the part of the Government, that, in granting those clearances, it must be distinctly understood, that they do not assume any responsibility, or express any opinion, as to what occurrences may take place, or what regulations may be made by the Chinese Government by the time those ships shall arrive out, or what state of things they may find prevailing on getting out.

MR. G. PALMER.—I wish to know whether, on their arrival, any obstacles will be opposed to their entering the Chinese ports?

MR. LABOUCHERE.—Undoubtedly

the Commissioner has felt it to be his duty not to stop the trade, but to prevent, as far as he has been able, British subjects from placing themselves and their property in the power of the Chinese Government; but it is impossible to say what alterations in the existing relations may have taken place before the arrival of those vessels. I have already said that clearances will be given to ships about proceeding to China; but it must not be supposed that the Government are incurring any responsibility by giving them.

Mr. HUME.—It appears to me to be absolutely necessary for the protection of British property, that the merchants should be informed what is the true nature of the instructions sent out, by which the trade may be affected.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

Mr. SHAW.—I hope the Noble Lord does not mean to take the Committee on the Irish Municipal Corporations Bill on Monday next. That Bill has only this day been placed in the hands of Honourable Members, and it contains not less than 119 clauses.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—No one can think it unreasonable to proceed with the second reading to-morrow, as the principle of the Bill has repeatedly received the sanction of Parliament; but I shall not object to postpone the Committee till Monday se'nnight, or even a more distant day.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. T. PARKER.—I wish to put a question to the Government respecting the Commercial Treaty with France, as to which negotiations are now pending. It is stated that Mr. Porter, one of the Commissioners engaged in the negotiations, has returned to this country; and I find that it has been asserted by one of the French journals, that the conferences are at an end; and that it is determined that this country shall make large concessions. I beg to know whether it is true that Mr. Porter has returned, and that a treaty has been concluded, or is about to be concluded, between the two countries; and, finally, in how short a time the President of the Board of Trade will be able to lay the treaty before the House?

Mr. LABOUCHERE.—I consider that I should not be doing my duty if I entered into any premature explanation on the subject of an unfinished negotiation. Such a course would be wrong, because it would be unfair to the foreign Government with which we are negotiating. I shall, therefore, neither deny nor confirm any of the statements which the Honourable Member has mentioned as having been made. All I can say is, that the Government of this country is now, and has been for some time, engaged in negotiating a treaty with the French Government; that the British Government is sincerely desirous of promoting commercial intercourse between the two countries on fair and equitable terms; that the treaty is not yet concluded; but that when it shall be, there will be no delay in giving the necessary explanations on the subject.

PRIVILEGE—PRINTED PAPERS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I beg to present a petition from the Messrs. Hansard, stating that they have been served with a notice of a writ of inquiry of damages in the further suit commenced against them by John Joseph Stockdale, and praying the instructions of the House. I move that this petition be read.

Petition read accordingly, as follows:—

The humble petition of James Hansard, Luke Graves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, printers to this Honourable House,

Showeth,—That your petitioners were yesterday afternoon served with notice of a writ of inquiry of damages, in the further suit commenced against your petitioners in the Court of Queen's Bench by John Joseph Stockdale.

That the following is a copy of such notice:—

"In the Queen's Bench.

"Between John Joseph Stockdale, plaintiff, and James Hansard, Luke Greaves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, defendants.

"Take notice, that a writ of inquiry of damages will be executed in this cause on Thursday, the twentieth day of February instant, between the hours of eleven of the clock in the forenoon and one of the clock in the afternoon of the same day, at the office of the sheriff of Middlesex, in Red Lion Square, Holborn, in the county of Middlesex. And, further, take notice, that the same will be attended by counsel on the part of the said plaintiff.

"Dated this 12th day of February, 1840.

"Yours, &c.,
T. B. Howard, Plaintiff's Attorney,
7. Norfolk Street, Strand."

"To James Hansard Luke Graves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, the above-named defendants."

That your petitioners, in order to ascertain correctly the cause of action in such further suit, caused the declaration filed by the plaintiff in the Queen's Bench Declaration Office to be taken out, and of which declaration the following is a copy: —

"In the Queen's Bench.

"The sixth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty.

"Middlesex, to wit: John Joseph Stockdale, the plaintiff in this suit, by Thomas Burton Howard, his attorney, complains of James Hansard, Luke Graves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, the defendants in this suit, who have been summoned to answer the said John Joseph Stockdale in an action on the case. For that whereas, before and at the time of committing the grievance next hereinafter complained of, the said plaintiff was, and for a long time had been, a bookseller and publisher of books, and as such bookseller and publisher of books, had published divers and very many scientific books, and particularly in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, a certain physiological and anatomical book, written by a learned physician on the generative system, illustrated by anatomical plates. And whereas the said defendants, on the twenty-fifth day of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, did publish, and cause to be published, of and concerning the said plaintiff, in his said trade of a bookseller and publisher, in a certain book purporting to be Reports of the Inspectors of the Prisons of Great Britain, the passage following, that is to say, 'This last is a book (meaning the said physiological and anatomical book) of a most disgusting nature, and the plates are indecent and obscene in the extreme.' Whereas, in truth and in fact, the said book is purely of a scientific character; yet the said defendants, well knowing the premises, but contriving and maliciously intending to defame and injure the said plaintiff in his said trade of a bookseller and publisher, and cause it to be believed that he published indecent and obscene books, on the first day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, maliciously and falsely did publish, and cause to be published, of and concerning the said plaintiff, in his said trade and business, in a certain printed paper, purporting to be a copy of the reply of the Inspectors of Prisons for the Home District, with regard to the Report of the Court of Aldermen to whom it was referred to consider the first Report of the Inspectors of Prisons, so far as relates to the gaol of Newgate; which said copy of the reply purports to be a letter from William Crawford and Whitworth Russell, Esquires, Inspectors of Prisons for the Home District, to the Right Honourable Lord John Russell, &c. &c. &c., the false, scandalous, malicious and defamatory libel following, that is to say; — 'But we deny that that book is a scientific work (using that term in its ordinary acception), or that the plates are purely anatomical, calculated only to attract the attention of persons connected with surgical science, and we adhere to the terms which we have already employed as those only by which to characterise such a book' (meaning thereby that the said book was disgusting and obscene, as stated in the above-mentioned Report of the Inspectors of Prisons of Great Britain); and in another part of the said libel, to the tenour and effect following, that is to say; — 'We also applied to several medical booksellers, who gave it the same character. They described it as one of Stockdale's obscene books' (meaning thereby that the plaintiff was a common publisher of obscene books); that it never was considered as a scientific work;' 'that it never was written for, or bought by, the members of the profession as such;' 'that it was intended to take young men in, by inducing them to give an exorbitant price for an indecent work,' to the great injury of the said plaintiff in his said trade and business, and also of his fair fame and reputation, and to the damage of the said plaintiff of fifty thousand pounds, and therefore he brings suit, &c."

That your petitioners find, on examining the foregoing declaration with the declaration in the former action against your petitioners, in which the damages were assessed at six hundred pounds, that the cause of action is identical,—namely, for the publication of a libel of and concerning the plaintiff, contained in the Reports of the Inspectors of Prisons of Great Britain, and also in a letter addressed by the said inspectors to Lord John Russell.

That the said Reports and letter were printed by your petitioners by direction of your Honourable House.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray the instructions of your Honourable House in the matter of this their petition, and on the course they should pursue with respect to the said notice and writ of inquiry.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Luke G. Hansard.
Luke J. Hansard.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I move that this petition be taken into consideration upon Monday next, and that it be printed.

Motion agreed to.

THE SHERIFF OF LONDON.

The Sergeant-at-Arms announced that the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the city of London waited to present a petition.

The SPEAKER. — Let them be called in.

The Lord Mayor, accompanied by Mr. Alderman T. Johnson, and another member of the corporation, and attended by several members of the Common Council, then appeared and handed in a petition, which was presented at the table.

The city authorities having withdrawn, the petition was read by the clerk, as follows: —

The humble petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the city of London, in common council assembled, Showeth, — That the corporation of London have, from time immemorial, enjoyed the privilege of presenting addresses to the Sovereign on the throne; a privilege which they have always prized as among the most valuable of their rights, and which they have been accustomed to exercise upon great and important occasions which have involved the honour and happiness of the Sovereign, and the welfare of the people.

That your petitioners have unanimously voted an address of congratulation to Her Most Gracious Majesty upon her happy union with his Royal Highness Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg and Gotha.

That your petitioners are most anxious to manifest their participation in the lively satisfaction which that auspicious event has diffused throughout the nation by attending, upon the earliest possible opportunity, to lay their address at the feet of their beloved Sovereign, but they find, by the approved usage of the city, that the sheriffs of London, attended by the remembrancer, should wait upon Her Majesty, to receive Her Majesty's royal pleasure as to the period at which Her Majesty will be pleased to receive the address of your petitioners, of which, the ordinary and most respectful mode of exercising their privilege, they are unable to avail themselves, by reason of the sheriff being in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, by order of your Honourable House.

Your petitioners again humbly represent to your Honourable House that the said sheriff, in the course of conduct they pursued, were influenced only by a conscientious desire to perform what they believed to be their duty.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your Honourable House will be pleased to discharge the sheriff out of custody, to enable your petitioners to manifest their loyalty to their Sovereign in their accustomed manner, to testify their unbounded satisfaction on this auspicious occasion.

Signed (by order of the Court)
Henry Woodthorpe.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I move that the petition be printed with the Votes, and that it be taken into consideration on Friday.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I cannot agree to its being made the subject of an Order of the Day. The Noble Viscount can give a notice of motion upon the subject.

Mr. LAW. — I give notice that to-morrow, when the petition shall be printed and in the hands of Honourable Members, I will call the attention of the House to it, and ask the House to agree to its prayer.

MILITARY AND NAVAL COMMISSIONERS.

LORD GEORGE LENNOX. — Sir, I move that there be laid before this House the names of the Military and Naval Commissioners, and the date of the appointment of that Commission; also, a Return, stating the days upon which they have assembled, and the names of Commissioners that attended on each day of meeting. I beg to state to the House, that my object in bringing forward this subject is, to ascertain from the Government, or some member of the Commission, the cause of the delay of the publication of the Report. The House may perhaps have forgotten, that in February, 1837, I moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the subject of the slow promotion of officers in the navy; and that, in the year 1838, the House agreed, by a majority of 13, to address Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty would be pleased to take the case of the Royal Marines into consideration. Soon after that, the Noble Lord, then the Secretary for the Home Department, informed the House that a Commission would be issued, not only with respect to the marines, but with respect to the other branches of the service also. That Commission having been appointed, and having sat, I now desire, either that I may be informed of the cause of the delay in their proceedings, or that their Report may be at once laid before the House. I can assure the Government, and particularly the Gallant General who presides over the Ordnance department, that there is the greatest anxiety throughout both services for the publication of this Report; and that anxiety has been much increased, in consequence of the Noble Lord, the Secretary for the Colonies, having stated, some time since, in answer to a question from me, that the Commissioners had nearly finished their labours, and that their Report would speedily be forthcoming. I have been told that the Commission has not sat since the month of June last; but I consider that Her Majesty's Ministers are bound to carry the resolution of this House into effect. I do not wish now to go into the whole question of the complaints of the officers of marines; but I would mention one circumstance which, in my opinion, is worthy of notice. Unfortunately, riots have broken out in the town of Newport, but a small body of troops saved that town from destruction. No one can more sincerely rejoice than I, do at the promotion of the gallant Captain Gray, for his conduct on that occasion; and I believe that no one, either in or out of this House, thinks that, by his gallantry and bravery, he was not fully entitled to the new rank which he gained. But I will show a case of equal merit in an officer of marines, which has not been similarly rewarded. Lieutenant Park was attacked at Toronto, during the Canadian outbreak; but by his gallantry and address, although with a body of 50 men only, opposed to far superior numbers, the rebels were quickly dispersed. Sir John Colborne did not lose sight of this circumstance; but all that he could do was to confer upon Lieutenant Park the temporary rank of captain during his stay in Upper Canada; and although he expressed a wish that that rank should be confirmed in England, the authorities at the Horse Guards considered it impossible to do so. It is a gross injustice, that when marine officers distinguish themselves, the Admiralty should not have the power to reward them by promotion. As the law stands, the marine officer is the only officer who cannot receive promotion at the hands of his sovereign. Sir, I will detain the House no longer than to express my most earnest hope that some Honourable Member will give a satisfactory explanation of the delay which has occurred, and will state when it is likely that the Report will be delivered.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I have great pleasure in seconding the motion, and will take the opportunity of bearing testimony to the extreme anxiety of officers of my own profession on the subject. I think it absolutely necessary that some answer should be given to the question of the Noble Lord, — the more particularly, as the notion is very prevalent that the promotion, usually granted on a Royal marriage, would have been notified, now, in the Gazette, but for the delay which has taken place in the proceedings of the Commission. Suppose, now, that a brevet were to take place ——

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN. — There will be no brevet.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I am glad to learn that fact, because it will afford some Honourable Member an opportunity of calling for some explanation on the subject.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN. — Sir, I shall feel it my duty to oppose the motion, principally on the ground that I consider it to imply a certain degree of reflection on the members of the Commission. As a member of the Commission, I can only say, that, from the moment at which it first sat, down to the time of the conclusion of its sittings, there never was any business more anxiously or more zealously attended to, than the duties which were imposed upon it. From the first day to the last, it was most punctually attended by all the members, except one or two, whose official situations prevented their giving up their entire time to it; and two distinguished officers, one of them the companion in arms of the immortal Nelson, whom we had the misfortune to lose pending our sittings. With respect to the Noble Duke who presided, I must say that he was constantly in his place, and always prepared to give us the advantage of his great experience. Therefore it is quite unnecessary that the Returns demanded should be made, because both the names and the days of attendance of every indidual will be specified in the Report, when it shall be published. At the same time, I can very well understand that there must prevail great anxiety on the subject, and will therefore state, shortly, what has been our course of proceeding. It is now two years ago since the Commission first sat. Its members met from week to week, determining, at one sitting, what should be done at the next, and directing the proper and necessary returns to be made in order to enable them to proceed. The business was of a complicated nature, and the commissioners had to go into the most minute details. At length, in the month of June last, when they had opened each particular branch of the question, they determined to submit certain recommendations. The different parts of the Report were then submitted to the officers connected with the various branches of the service, and, finally, to the Noble Duke, who sat as the chairman of the Commission, after which it was to be brought up to this House. It is absolutely necessary that the heads of the different departments should have, each of them, an opportunity of looking over that portion of the Report which relates to their several departments before the General Report is agreed upon. I believe the only points incomplete occur on departments of the army, marines, and ordnance; and when they are complete, the Commission will shortly meet again, and will then come to a decision on the Report. But the House will agree with me in thinking that the Commissioners have been right in not too hastily coming to a decision on a question of such vast importance. When we do present our Report, I am quite sure that, at all events, all parties will give us credit for having been actuated by the utmost anxiety and zeal for the public service. Whether the Report itself will meet the views of Honourable Members, I cannot, of course, take upon myself to say; but I can confidently claim for the Commissioners this credit; that their labours have been directed by the utmost desire to promote, by every means in their power, the welfare of the services to which their inquiries have referred.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I beg that I may be allowed to disclaim all intention of casting any reflection whatever on the members of the Commission. On the contrary, I am convinced that they have acted throughout from the best motives, and in the most diligent manner.

SIR H. HARDINGE.—Sir, I am glad to hear that no censure on the Commissioners is intended to be conveyed by this motion. As one of the Commissioners, I certainly have not neglected my duty. The fact is, that many of the members of the Commission were either Cabinet Ministers, or heads of departments, and they were necessarily, from time to time, prevented attending the Commission. Of course, in their absence, the other members of the Commission did not think it expedient to proceed with the examination of witnesses, whose examination was of an important nature; and we were therefore constantly obliged to suspend our sittings. On several occasions, members of the Commission have been called away to attend Cabinet Councils, and the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, in particular, was ultimately obliged to secede altogether from the Commission, after having been repeatedly obliged to absent himself from the meetings of the Commission. The Right Honourable Gentleman has alluded particularly to the able and zealous manner in which the Duke of Wellington has assisted the Commission. To show in what way the Duke of Wellington attended to his duties, I would mention, that the draft of the Report having been sent down to Walmer Castle for his perusal, it was, although a very voluminous paper, returned by post on the following day. The Honourable and Gallant Officer has expressed an opinion, that the brevet had probably been delayed in consequence of the Commissioners not having made their report. I wish that the brevet could have taken place on the occasion of Her Majesty's wedding; but I beg to remind the Honourable Gentleman that there will shortly be another opportunity, on occasion of Her Majesty's birthday.

LORD GEORGE LENNOX. — I can assure the House, that when I gave the notice of my motion, I had not the slightest wish or intention to cast any imputation on the Commissioners; still less did I entertain the idea of casting any imputation on the Duke of Wellington. I have served under that illustrious Duke for years, abroad, and I would sooner sacrifice my life, than say anything that might appear disrespectful towards him. After what has fallen from the Right Honourable Gentleman, I will not press the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.

Mr. MACKINNON. — In fulfilment of a pledge which I gave last Session to the Committee over which I had the honour to preside, I move for leave to bring in a Bill, "to alter and amend the Laws regarding Turnpike Trusts, and to allow of Unions of the same."

Mr. FOX MAULE. — If I understand the Honourable Member aright, his present motion is made merely in fulfilment of a pledge; if so, I think his pledge was amply redeemed by his Bill of last year. There is, at this time, a Commission sitting on this question, from whom a Report may be expected in June. In all probability the House will be induced to agree to the suggestions of that Commission when embodied by the Government in a specific measure. I hope the Honourable Member will not press forward his present Bill, but leave the subject in the hands of the Government.

Mr. MACKINNON.—Sir, I must crave the indulgence of the House for a very few moments, while I state the reasons which have induced me to bring forward this Bill. In 1835 I offered observations as to the necessity for a general consolidation of turnpike trusts. In consequence of those observations, a Committee was formed in 1836, of which I was chosen chairman. We sat a considerable time, and had before us the Duke of Richmond, and several other distinguished individuals, as witnesses; and the result was, that a Report was published, strongly recommending a consolidation of the whole of the turnpike trusts. In consequence of this Report, the Honourable Under Secretary brought in a Bill, which, however, did not meet with the approval of the House. The reason of its rejection was, that it had three leading faults. The first fault was, that it united trusts that were in debt with those which were not; next, that by that mode of consolidation, the whole control would be centered in the Home Office, or the Board of Works, thus giving offence to the country gentlemen; and, third, that it would deprive the individuals who had hitherto worked the machinery of the turnpike trusts, of their justly-earned stipends. In consequence of these objections, it was found impossible, with all the influence of Government, to carry the Bill, and it accordingly fell to the ground. Subsequently I had an interview with the Honourable Under Secretary, and he stated to me that he would, if possible, bring in another Bill. The consequence of this was, that in 1839 I moved for another Committee, and, previous to our Report being issued, Government thought proper to appoint a Commission. Now, I would ask, is it a good precedent for the Government to establish, to issue Commissions for the examination of subjects at the time under investigation by a Committee of this House? Now, with every respect for the Gentlemen of whom this Commission is composed, — the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Salisbury, and another Noble Lord, — I do not see why they should supersede the labours of our Committee. Then, what I would propose is, — let the Bill of the Commission be brought in, and also the Bill of the Committee; and the House can then choose the better, or we might select the best parts of both. Under these circumstances, I cannot see any reasonable cause for objection to the introduction of the Bill. I think that, at all events, the Bill might be printed and laid on the table, to await the measure about to be brought forward, founded on the Report of the Commission.

Mr. SANFORD. — I hope that the Honourable Member will comply with the suggestion of the Honourable Under Secretary, and leave the question in the hands of the Government, as I think it of much too important a nature to be left in the hands of any individual Member.

Mr. MACKINNON. — Will the Government take the matter up?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I think it will be the duty of Government to do so.

Mr. MACKINNON. — Then I will withdraw my motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Mr. HERRIES. — In rising, in conformity with my notice, to move for certain Returns exhibiting the present condition of the finances of the country, I must begin by expressing my regret that I shall be under the necessity of requesting for a time — which shall, however, be as short as possible — the attention of the House to the very important subject which I shall endeavour to bring before you. I regret that I should be called on to make any statement of the kind on this occasion, having, until now, indulged the hope that, considering all the circumstances under which the information is called for, —which it is my intention now to ask the House to order, — the Right Honourable Gentleman would have spared me the pain, and the House the trouble, of a lengthened address on the matter, by conceding, at once, the information so required. Indeed, it is only because I entertain little or no doubt that my motion will be opposed, that I think it necessary to trouble the House with any remarks at all. In the first place, I shall request the attention of the House to the general scope of that motion; and then to the particular nature of the papers for the production of which I intend to move. And I do this for the purpose of clearing myself of—of enabling me more effectually to fulfil — my promise to the House, that I would cause them no unnecessary delay. Of all these papers, the granting of one only, I understand, is to be opposed. The general effect of the observations which I shall have to address to the House, will be, to call into question the management of the finances of the country by Her Majesty's Government; but much of what I should otherwise have to offer on the subject can, with advantage, be postponed to a future occasion. I shall, therefore, at the present time, merely call the attention of the House to one branch of the administration of the finances, — the management of the unfunded debt. With regard to this I propose to ask for an account which will enable the House, when they obtain it, to judge whether the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Noble Lord who preceded him in that office, have, or have not, properly conducted this most important branch of the public finances; and I certainly do think that I shall be able to satisfy the House and the country that in this branch of the public administration there has been great mismanagement. The only portion of my motion to which I understand there is to be any opposition, is that which calls for an account of the income of the consolidated fund (including therein the duties on sugar), and of the charges thereupon in the year 1839; distinguished under the principal heads of receipt and expenditure; and also an estimate of the same for the year 1840; showing, in each case, the surplus applicable to the supplies voted by Parliament. The objection is mainly addressed to that portion of the proposed Returns which comprises an estimate of the pecuniary resources of the country for the current year; and it is to the necessity of producing this, in reference to the present state of our financial affairs, that the chief part of my argument on this occasion will be directed.

Having now stated what I do require, I must guard myself against being misrepresented as to what I do not require. I beg distinctly to be understood as not calling upon the Right Honourable Gentleman at the present period of the Session,—before, as he would say, his financial year has expired, — to state the whole of his prospective plans as to the supplies and the ways and means of the year. The motion which I have in view does not extend to that; — what it does require is, that this House should, at the earliest opportunity, have before it a correct view of what the income of this country is to be in the present year. The income of the past year has been laid before the House in a Return, made since I gave notice of my motion. With reference to the statement of the income for the present year, I may, and no doubt shall, be told that it is not the usual custom to call on the Chancellor of the Exchequer for such a statement as this; and still less to do so at such a period of the Session as the present. But it must be remembered that the existing state of things is by no means a usual one. If the financial affairs of the country were now in their ordinary condition, instead of being, as they are, in a state peculiar and unprecedented, I might, on the present occasion, as I have in former years, and as other Honourable Gentlemen on my side of the House have done in former years, have exercised a degree of forbearance in applying to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the desired information. I must, in passing, remark, that no very good return has been made by Honourable Gentlemen opposite for this forbearance: on the contrary, they have largely abused it; so much so, that there has been, on their parts, a systematic avoidance of affording any information, when repeatedly questioned by individual Members on the subject of finance. Sometimes, notwithstanding the repeated solicitation of Honourable Members for information, July and August have been allowed to pass over without the House being placed in the situation of knowing the financial position of the country; and the information has been at last only afforded when the greater portion of Honourable Members had left town. Is not this a true picture? Such being the result of the forbearance shown on former occasions, how should we answer to our constituents were we to allow the practice to be continued during a Session unexampled as regards the financial state of the country, as this must be?

With these views, I do not hesitate to bring the question before the House. I will, as much as possible, avoid resting my case on technical financial grounds. I shall not need to have much recourse to figures, because the case which I shall have to put to the House is founded upon broad, simple, intelligible principles, requiring no figures to aid, support, or illustrate it. I would here refer to what took place in this House, on a former evening, when the Honourable Member for Kilkenny cast a reproach on Honourable Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, for not supporting him in his endeavours to press the Government on the subject of finance. The reproach was offered in very good part by the Honourable Member, and in equally good part was it received; and I will now state the motives which have influenced myself, and those around me, in refraining from pressing the Government on the subject of finances. During the last two years (I might go even further back), as is well known to those whom I have the honour to address, the moneyed interests of the country have been in a peculiarly critical condition. The mercantile classes have been labouring under deep anxiety and solicitude. Events, detrimental and dangerous in a greater degree than any which have been experienced for years before, have occurred or have been impending;—so much so, that no man who has witnessed those anxieties and those events, would be willing, in any way, to add to them. Under such circumstances, it will at once be owned that it was not desirable to press the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or to force from him statements with regard to the finances of the country, the effect of which, elsewhere, might be "much greater than any which was intended or expected from the inquiry." But, now, no necessity for any such reserve exists. Are matters, at present, in such a state as to excite reasonable apprehension that any information elicited by inquiries from this side of the House, would produce distrust or alarm, or add to that already existing? All doubt or uncertainty has been completely put an end to by declarations from the highest authorities on the subject in the country, both here and elsewhere. Nothing that I could elicit, by this or any similar motion, could have half the weight or authority, or effect on the financial condition of the country, of that which has fallen from the Noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government, and from the Noble Lord opposite, on the occasions to which I refer. The Noble Lords are, necessarily, from their position, much better judges of these financial affairs than I, or even any other Honourable Member of the House can presume to be; and they have met the question freely and without reserve; and the consequence is, that I am in a position to describe the financial position of the country in language far more forcible than any which I could otherwise hope to be able to use. I shall first refer to what has been stated in another place,—and which, I conceive, may now be referred to as a matter of history,—by the highest authority in this country,—by the first Minister of the Crown, and the first Minister, also, of that department which is peculiarly connected with the subject of this motion,—by the person within these realms the most competent, by his station and his knowledge of the subject, to inform the public with regard to the condition of our financial affairs. The observations I refer to were made on the occasion of a recent motion, and were these:—

> The subject which had been alluded to by his Noble Friend was certainly one of the most paramount importance to the country. He could not do otherwise than express his entire concurrence in the general views of his Noble Friend, and in all the facts which he had stated relative to the position of affairs both at home and abroad. He agreed in the general principles, both political and financial, expressed by his Noble Friend. He quite agreed in the wisdom of the application of the sinking fund as practised under the Administration of the Noble Duke. He also entirely agreed that it was not a satisfactory state of financial affairs to have a clear admitted deficiency. But the Noble Earl further considered it a right precept always to expect a surplus. Now, he did not agree with that; and he rather thought that when the deficiency was but small, it was not wise to burden the country with any extraordinary exactions, but to trust to its natural resources to recover itself. Still it was impossible to deny that a deficiency, year after year increasing, was a state of things which the country must boldly and decidedly apply itself, looking in the face of the difficulty and the danger, and earnestly applying itself to a remedy. For in financial difficulties and perils, as in all others, it was necessary to adopt a certain degree of boldness and courage, and to act, not entirely on set rule, but looking at the circumstances in which one is placed, and the real state of the country. His Noble Friend had said, truly, that these difficulties had been occasioned, not so much by a falling off of the revenue,—not so much by any failure of the productive resources of the country,—though of late years there had been a degree of pressure upon those powers, both in this country and in others, from which he (Viscount Melbourne) hoped that they might recover themselves by their own exertions, and the operation of the natural revenues of the country; but it must be admitted that the expenses of the country had been going on increasing in a very great degree every year, and the causes of that growth, he quite agreed with his Noble Friend, were such, that he saw very little probability, at present, of being able to effect a reduction. He (Viscount Melbourne) did not think it necessary to follow his Noble Friend through all the questions to which he had called their Lordships' attention, but he admitted, from the causes which he had stated, that he did not see any probability of being able to effect any diminution either in the military or naval force of the country.

I hope that any reduction in the military or naval establishments of the country, at a time when the safety of the State requires that they should be maintained to the utmost, will not be among the expedients resorted to by the Government to remedy the disorder in the finances. The other authority I shall quote is also one entitled to the highest consideration;—it is that of the Noble Lord the second Minister of the State—the Noble Lord who is leader in this House. On a recent occasion that Noble Lord, with a candour equal to that evinced by his Noble Colleague, informed the House that—

> He was ready to admit that the estimates which they thought necessary for the army, the navy, and the ordnance, in order to keep up the character and fame of the country, would, perhaps, require, in the present state of the finances, the imposition of fresh burdens on the country, the present revenue not being adequate to keeping them up.

We are now in such a position that it is indispensably necessary for the House of Commons to look our danger in the face, and to perform boldly the duty of laying on taxation, most dangerous and most arduous though that duty be; but I do trust we shall address ourselves to it without any other feeling save that of anxiety for the public safety; because the national interest is above all party considerations. I have already stated that I believed that my request would be objected to as unusual, and therefore could not be granted. Undoubtedly it is so; but I believe I have stated enough to satisfy the House that the unusual circumstances of the country are sufficient to justify the present demand. But is there not sufficient to justify this demand exclusive of the unprecedented state of the finances of the country? I am not wholly without precedent for this motion. I find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in former times, did not withhold information such as I now call for. I remember the time when the Earl of Ripon entered upon the office of the Right Honourable Gentleman, and during the three years which he held it; and that when I had the honour of having a humble share in the administration of the finances, in the course of February in each year, a statement of the finances for such year was laid on the table. I find, also, that when Lord Althorp was Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the early part of the first Session that he held office, — namely, on the 11th of February, — he furnished a complete calculation of the probable state of the finances for the year; and I find, too, by the printed form, that it was much such a Return as I now call for. When, also, I am told that the statement I require is unusual, — is not in such a form that it could be granted, — I cannot help recollecting that last year I was told, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, himself, that there was no objection to giving me the information in the form in which I now call for it. The Noble Lord who last year was Chancellor of the Exchequer made his budget in July, and he produced a little budget afterwards, in the month of August, to the surprise of every one. Shortly afterwards a statement of the finances for the remainder of the year was laid on the table of the House of Lords, and was subsequently furnished to this House. As far as the information given in that statement went, — and, indeed, for the manner in which it was drawn up, — I require nothing more, provided the Right Honourable Gentleman will furnish me with a Return for the year 1840 after the fashion in which it was given last year for 1839. I may be told that that paper was given late in the Session, and after the budget had been opened. This, however, does not alter the case, for the financial calculation was then given for the year to come; and, now, all that I ask for is, the statement for the financial year, ending in January next. This will be only going as far as the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it advisable to go last year. I distinctly wish to guard against the impression that I intend to deal with, or wish to interfere with, their secret intentions, which the Right Honourable Gentleman will have to disclose at the proper time. I do not ask what new taxes are to be proposed; I do not ask to be informed what the extraordinary resources of the Right Honourable Gentleman are for the emergencies in which he is placed; neither do I ask for any information as to the balance of old Exchequer bills that are out, or how the Right Honourable Gentleman intends that they shall be paid off: but, under the extraordinary circumstances of the times, and under the admitted confusion of the finances, and when it is universally admitted that no inconsiderable alarm prevails on the subject, I think that the House should be put in possession of all these Returns, on which basis a knowledge of the finances must rest, and which will furnish us with the amount of the actual income and the resources of the country. With the extraordinary alarm that prevails at the present moment, would the House of Commons feel justified to the country in allowing this information to be withheld, after the declarations that have been made to both Houses of Parliament, by the Ministers of the Crown, on the subject of the financial embarrassment of the state?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer may tell the people that the country ought to wait for this information, as he does not feel it convenient to give it at present; but I think, to say the least of it, that it is highly improper for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to resist such a motion. I am satisfied that it is impossible sufficiently to estimate the immense importance of this matter; it is impossible to estimate too highly the solicitude that prevails in the public mind on the present condition of the finances. If the Right Honourable Gentleman is aware of the public anxiety as to that condition of the public finances and the prospects of the country, in this respect, he must, I feel assured, be extremely anxious to come forward, and, if he have it in his power, to remove the feelings of alarm that prevail. There is no society into which I enter, — there are no persons with whom I converse on the subject,—amongst whom there does not exist the strongest manifestation of alarm and anxiety, and who do not feel that this matter deeply concerns the welfare, honour, and interest of the country, both at home and abroad,—who do not know and feel that, after the statements promulgated throughout the empire with respect to our financial state, and after the information that has been laid on the table, — while our expenditure is gradually and greatly increasing, and while there are no means of retrenchment, our income is not on the increase. Who is there but must feel that in the present condition of the country, at home, and abroad,—in the present state of our affairs, the finances are in—an inconvenient is too light a word to use—but in a deplorable condition? How can the Noble Lord allow this state of things to continue, when he knows that, at home, it requires more than ordinary exertion to keep down the Chartists in England, and abroad, to restrain the encroachments of foreign powers? How, when his responsibility has been immensely increased by the state of our affairs abroad, and when he has stated that it will be necessary to increase our establishments to maintain tranquillity at home, — is he prepared to meet these exigencies? If the Noble Lord can show that we do, at present, maintain adequate establishments, then, truly, it is unnecessary to explain, upon the points I have adverted to. But all persons must feel the importance of the crisis, and all persons must look at the present state of things, as regards our finances, with feelings such as I have just described. The first object I have in view is, to estimate the extent of the evil before I call upon the House to adopt the propositions which I shall submit to it. Is there any man who will say that the public of this kingdom do not possess the highest extent of information, or will deny that they are most anxious to possess the means of arriving at a sound conclusion on any subject which so deeply interests them as this does? The Government must be aware that the people of this country are more anxious than the inhabitants of any other, on a subject of this nature; and when they have been informed that it has been inferred, both in this and the other House, that there is an increasing deficiency in the public income as compared with the expenditure, they are naturally anxious to know the extent of the evil.

The House, also, should be made acquainted with the real state of the case, and be furnished with the details of the subject, so as to be able to form a correct opinion on the matter, before it is called upon to sanction any measure or motion to supply this deficiency in the finances. It is not my business to make a financial statement, and I do not now call for the means of making one; but, as the Right Honourable Gentleman has not thought proper to make any, and as he has intimated that he is not prepared to do so, I will shortly set forth what I believe are the facts of the case, from the information within my reach. I will indicate state what I believe to be the results in round numbers, in order not to press, for too long a time, on the attention of the House. On ordinary occasions, we might have waited for the information which I think necessary, now; but at present, and to use the words of the Noble Lord at the head of the Government, in another place, "in the very disagreeable state of our finances," I feel bound to show what I believe to be the exact nature of our position. In looking back, then, to the financial accounts for the last three years, I take my statement from the Return at the end of the actual year, and not the financial year in April, — for the former is still retained in the Returns laid on the table of the House. Taking, therefore, the financial accounts from January to January, and looking back to the Returns for 1837, I find that there was, then, a deficiency, on the produce of the revenue to meet the expenditure, to the amount of 726,000*l.* I find that, in 1838, there was a further deficiency of the same kind, which amounted to 440,000*l.*; thus making together the sum of 1,166,000*l.*, as the amount of the deficiency which existed at the close of 1838. In the year 1839, it appears, from the accounts recently laid on the table of the House, there was a further deficiency, which amounted to no less a sum than 1,512,000*l.*, making, together, a deficiency, at the end of the year 1839, to the large extent of 2,678,000*l.*

Under these circumstances, am I not justified in my motion, and in pressing to know the probable amount of deficiency arising during the present year? When we look at the present state of affairs, is not every one most anxious to know, from the very best authority, what are our financial expectations for the year 1840? In addition, also, to the deficiency which I have stated, it is likely, moreover, to be further increased, in consequence of the additional charge of some of the great establishments of the country. I am obliged to make the best estimates I can from the Returns on the table of the House; and from the extent of information furnished to us in these documents I am enabled to form what I believe to be a tolerably correct estimate on the subject. Taking, then, merely one of the great charges of the expenditure, I find that, in the Navy Estimates for the present year, there is an increased charge for that branch of the public service amounting to 500,000*l.* I would ask whether it was not reasonable to expect that, when a deficiency in the revenue of the country to the amount of 1,500,000*l.* was allowed to occur in the year 1839, — means would be taken to prevent such a deficiency occurring again? I wish that it may not be the case, but—I fear that there is nothing in the state of affairs at present, that will justify me in supposing that there will not be a deficiency to the same extent in the present year. For these reasons, I feel myself justified in assuming that a deficiency to this amount will occur in the year 1840. But, in addition to the deficiency of 1,500,000*l.* which arose in 1839, there is an additional charge on the revenue of the present year, for the augmentation of the navy, and therefore the sum of 500,000*l.* must be added to the former amount, which will make the deficiency for the present year amount to the sum of 2,000,000*l*. Thus, supposing that there were no ground to expect any further increased charge, or any other deficiency, the amount, at the end of the year 1840, will be found to be 4,678,000*l*. Would that this were all! but I fear it is not the utmost extent of the difficulty we shall have to sustain. I am not about to enter into any calculation as to any extraordinary expenses which were incurred last year, and which may or may not be incurred again this year. I am bound to state my views on the subject to the extent of the information before me, because I am called upon to go into the subject, and to make a statement, in consequence of the opposition made to this motion for Returns by the Right Honourable Gentleman. But I have, hitherto, made no mention of another probable cause of deficiency, which is, unquestionably, of great importance, and to which the Government has exposed the public revenue for the present year.

I have not yet said one word respecting the great question of the revenue of the Post Office. Whatever deficiency shall have occurred from this source of the revenue must be added to the amount which I have already stated, and I venture to form, to the best of my judgment, from the papers on the table, an estimate of what this will probably be, and I trust that the Right Honourable Gentleman will correct me if I am wrong; but I think I am justified in saying — and I am to some extent acquainted with the Post Office — that there will be a loss of from 1,200,000*l*. to 1,400,000*l*. by the change introduced in the system of postage. All the information that has been furnished by the authorities of the Post Office justifies this estimate; and I have been assured by persons very familiar with the subject, that my estimate of the probable loss is exceedingly moderate. If, then, we take the smaller sum, and add the 1,200,000*l*. for the deficiency in the Post Office for the year, we shall have a deficiency at the close of the year 1840, amounting, in the aggregate, to very nearly 6,000,000*l*. Is this a state of things under which the House should remain quiet? Is this a state of things which the House should pass by with feelings of satisfaction? Should it allow the Right Honourable Gentleman, at his own time and pleasure, to state to the House how he intends to deal with this increasing deficiency in the revenue? I cannot believe that the House will consent to anything of this kind; and I entertain the strongest conviction, that, when I put the motion into the hands of the Speaker, and when the question shall be put, "aye" or "no," — the "ayes" will have it. I feel that it is impossible to pass over the subject of the Post Office without some observations on the extraordinary conduct of the Government, with respect to that question. It was a proceeding which inevitably operated to produce an increase of the evil complained of — it was a most wanton aggravation of a state of things which it was their duty to change as soon as possible. At the commencement of the year 1840, and with a knowledge of the financial difficulties which then existed, and of the increased expenditure which was likely to arise — with all this knowledge, the Government chose to introduce this system. No Government ever before introduced and carried into effect a plan of the kind under such extraordinary circumstances, and in such an embarrassed state of the finances. And this was done not with any conviction of the soundness of the policy of the proceeding, but merely in consequence of the momentary circumstances in which they were placed. I say this with confidence, when I recollect the opinions that have been expressed on the subject, both here and in another place, by members of the Government, and which show me that great doubts were entertained of the success of the plan. The Noble Viscount who introduced the Bill last year into the House of Lords, among other things, said, —

> For the last year, and, indeed, for the last two years, the income of the country had not been equal to its expenditure; and this had not arisen from any falling off in the revenue, but was owing to the general increase which had arisen in the public expenditure. He might be asked, then, in the present state of the revenue, with a tendency to the increase of the expenditure, how he could venture to tamper with so large a sum as that derivable from the Post Office revenues?

This was a most natural question, and it was answered in a most extraordinary manner. The Noble Viscount proceeded, —

> He certainly felt the force of the objection, and his answer to this was, that, in the first place, the very general feeling and general concurrence of all parties in favour of the plan, and there was such a general demand from all classes of the community for a measure of this nature, that it was a very difficult matter to withstand it.

This, then, was all the apology that we had from the Prime Minister of the Crown, for aggravating our financial difficulties to the amount of 1,400,000*l*. a-year, and when he knew the enormous extent of the deficiency that already existed! He did this because he "found it a difficult matter to withstand" a general demand; and where did he find the difficulty? Not in Parliament. Would he have found the difficulty of withstanding Parliament on the subject? I know that he could have induced Parliament to withstand this inconvenient proposal, which was carried by the Noble Lord, then Chancellor of the Exchequer. He must have been aware that he could have induced the Parliament to withstand this dangerous proposition, which has been pressed upon the Government from without, and from within. If he had looked to the gentlemen of England for support, and had asked them whether they would sanction a measure which would increase the deficiency of the revenue, he would have had no deficiency of supporters! I am sure that all parties, on such an appeal being made to them, would have regarded it as a matter of sound policy to oppose such a plan until more favourable circumstances might arise for carrying it into execution. I am not speaking against the scheme itself; — I am not stating that this reduction of one branch of the revenue might not be considered under other circumstances. I offer no opinion on that point; — or as to what it might have been prudent or advisable to do on the subject when the finances of the country were in a favourable condition, and when we had a large surplus to deal with, and to insure us against any resulting deficiency in the revenue — such a surplus, for instance, as the Noble Lord opposite commended the Duke of Wellington's Government for maintaining. But, entertaining that opinion, — it was extraordinary that he could be a party to come forward with such a proposition. I do not hesitate to say, that the proposition was inconvenient and dangerous, and Lord Melbourne and his Government must have been aware of the fact, and must have known that the carrying it at that time could only add to our financial difficulty. In sanctioning such a measure, they abandoned — I had almost said — all honest policy; for the Government itself never had any confidence as to the result of this scheme. They never believed that this was a wise plan — they were never convinced that it would prove advantageous, for they resisted it strongly when it was first proposed. When the Government gave way, what was the secret influence which induced them to abandon their former conviction, as to the alleged inconvenience likely to attend the adoption of the plan? That they might keep their offices, they entered into this compact, and by this sacrifice of their opinions and principles on the subject, they might secure certain votes. In introducing that measure, the Government warned the House that there was a risk of great loss. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer brought it forward in the House with evident reluctance, and he satisfied his own conscience by the most extraordinary expedient for that purpose that ever a Minister of State consented to resort to. He told the House that he was afraid — that he knew — that this measure would be delusive in its consequences; but the remedy which he proposed as a security, was, that he would take "a pledge" from the House of giving him an equivalent to make good the revenue which he might lose! They have now lost the revenue; and, at the same time, have got rid of the pledge! Now I am desirous to be informed when the House will be called upon to redeem this pledge? Independent of this pledge, there is another very large source of deficiency in the revenue, which I trust it will be considered the duty of the House to fill up and remove during the present Session. I say that I hope,—for nothing can be so objectionable as the attempt that has recently been made to carry on the public service of the country in time of peace, by means of peace loans. I can hardly conceive anything more baneful than, notwithstanding the resources and power of the country, to exhibit England to the world in such a lamentable condition, and her finances on such a dangerous footing, as to render it necessary to carry on her Government by means of peace loans.

For my own part, if that be the system which the Right Honourable Gentleman means to pursue, I can assure him that such proceedings, with respect to our finances, shall never cease to meet with my most strenuous opposition. If I am told that it was necessary to resort to this expedient, I would remind the House that the finances of the country have been reduced to so unfortunate a state not without warning; for the Government have been constantly cautioned against this reduction by Honourable Members on this side of the House who take a prominent part in the discussions on the finances of the country. My Right Honourable Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge has never failed to repeat his cautions to the Government against the dangerous practice of sacrificing the revenue to popular demands for reduction of taxation, without considering how the deficiency ought to be made up. My Right Honourable Friend the Member for Tamworth, also, cautioned Lord Althorp on this subject, when that Noble Lord brought forward his last Budget. The language used by my Right Honourable Friend on that occasion was most emphatic, and warned the Noble Lord of the dangerous nature of the proceeding he had adopted in reducing taxes merely in consequence of a popular demand. My Right Honourable Friend added, —

> That he was sure that any one in the situation of the Noble Lord must be aware of the difficulty between repealing old taxes and imposing new ones, and that it made a great difference to a nation whether it continued to bear those burdens it was accustomed to; and taking those burdens hastily off, and imposing others to which they were not accustomed.

If the House will look back through the twenty-six years during which peace has now existed, they will, until a comparatively recent period, find that a surplus revenue has always been maintained. This has been the case during the whole of that period, until within the last five, or rather the last three years. From the year 1816 until the year 1828, when the Finance Committee sat, the revenue was maintained in such a state as to satisfy the anxiety of those who looked for a large surplus income; and this was proved, during that period, sufficient to effect a large reduction in the national debt. In the Fourth Report of that Committee, with which I am sure the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite must be familiar, it was shown that, in the interval of the peace between 1817 and 1828, there had been a reduction of 3,500,000*l.* on the charge of the public debt; while, in the same time, 26,000,000*l.* of taxes had been taken off. There was something consolatory in the view of the finances of the country at that time; and my Right Honourable Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, who then had the management of the Exchequer, took care that the revenue should not be in such a condition as to afford any chance of being exposed to the reproach of a deficient income. My Right Honourable Friend took care that the public revenue should not perish in his hands. While he held the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, he reduced the taxes by the amount of between 6,000,000*l.* and 7,000 000*l.*, and still left a surplus revenue to his successor, Lord Althorp, of about 3,000,000*l.* I believe the exact sum was 2,900,000*l.* Lord Althorp, being always an anti-surplus statesman, had ever been in favour of a small surplus revenue; and he proposed to reduce a number of taxes, but still he retained a clear surplus revenue of 500,000*l.* a-year. The only deficiency of the public revenue during the whole of the twenty-six years antecedent to the time at which Honourable Gentlemen opposite came into office, was when Lord Althorp was Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hasty reduction of taxes occasioned it; and the deficiency that arose then, to the amount of about 1,000,000*l.*, was made up by increased revenue in the following year; so that no great public inconvenience resulted from it. There was no continued deficiency from that time until 1837; that is, there was no actual and permanent deficiency of revenue.

I have already stated to the House that Lord Althorp was always opposed to having a very considerable surplus for the reduction of debt; and on introducing his first Budget, he proposed a reduction of some taxes, and a substitution of others, but so that the surplus should be reduced from 3,000,000*l.* to about 500,000*l.*, which, however, at the time, he stated was going rather too near the margin, and that there was some danger in it. But what was the conduct of Lord Althorp when he found that he could not carry some of the taxes which he proposed to substitute in lieu of those to be taken off? That Noble Lord, having a just regard for the enormous danger which might arise from having a constant deficiency in the revenue of the country, when pressed to reduce some of the taxes which he had originally proposed to do, — without having, at the same time, a surplus, — strenuously resisted the proposition. It would have been congenial to the feelings of Lord Althorp to have adopted some of these suggested reductions ef taxes; but no pressure from within or without could either compel or induce him to sacrifice such an important principle, in connection with the revenue of the country, as a surplus income, and thus put the public credit of the country in danger. The House must well recollect with what energy that Noble Lord adhered to the decided course that he had adopted when the House was taken by surprise, and agreed to a motion for the reduction of the malt tax. The Noble Lord came down the next evening to the House, and called on them to rescind that vote; and, unless that vote should be rescinded, he then manfully declared that he would not remain an hour in office and place the country in such a dangerous position as it must enter upon with a large deficiency in its revenue. Having adverted to the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so pointedly before, I think it but right to say, that the position into which the finances have been brought has not been owing to those who have had the management of the Exchequer, but the evil has arisen from the wretched policy of the Government itself. No man can have watched the proceedings of the Government, without observing that the Noble Lord at the head of the Government, in the other House, is a most reluctant executor of many of the tasks imposed on him by his supporters, and that he is forced and driven to uphold many measures, which he, himself, is really opposed to, by his colleagues in the Administration. In addressing the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite as the Minister responsible for the finances of the country, I am sure that the Right Honourable Gentleman will not urge, as a plea to exempt him from censure that he has been but recently appointed to the office which he now fills, because he has but succeeded to a department with which he had long been familiar, and with the details of which he was practically acquainted as well as his predecessor. I shall therefore now proceed to advert to what has been done during the last year or two. I do not wish to detain the House at much greater length; for I think that I have already laid sufficient foundation to justify me in calling for the papers which I require, and more particularly in the present state of the country. Looking to what I consider to be the duty of the House, I believe there never existed a more solemn obligation on them than at this time, to take proper steps to put a stop to the present financial embarrassments of the country. When I see the danger staring the country in the face, I feel that I am justified in calling upon the House, at this early period of the Session, to demand from the Government such information as shall tend to direct them in that course which it is essential to the interest of the public service should be taken.

But before I proceed further, I must observe that it is necessary I should guard the House against relying upon any authority, or upon any facts, which I may have adduced, but I would have them rest upon the statements of the members of Her Majesty's Government itself; and, when I allude to the dangerous state of the finances of the country, I would also recommend them to guard themselves against forming an exaggerated or too gloomy view of the general nature of our condition. What I have spoken of was merely to show the effect of the mismanagement of the Government, — of the want of judgment, of firmness, and of skill, which has characterised the present Administration. The people of England are not, I am happy to feel, diminished as to their resources; they are not less able now, than heretofore, to support the honour and interests of the country, and to insure its safety, by such contributions as the public service may require. I believe that our resources are unimpaired, — that, indeed, we are even more competent now, than at any former period of our history, to make greater exertions, if called upon to do so. I utterly repudiate the foolish notion that England has been laid prostrate under its seven or eight hundred millions of debt. It is quite idle to talk in this way. And, when we consider that, during the last twenty years, 40,000,000*l.* of taxation have been remitted, — and when, also, we consider our advancement in every branch of wealth, — (unless where peculiar circumstances account for an opposite result,) — we must come to the conclusion that there never was a period at which the country was better able to support its honour and interest than this. When we shall be called upon to make good the deficiencies which have arisen, I have not the slightest doubt that we shall be fully prepared to do so; and that the wisdom of Parliament will be fully able to remedy the evils which the folly of the present Government has brought upon the country. I shall now conclude by moving for "An account of the income of the Consolidated Fund (including therewith the duties on sugar), and of the charges thereupon, in the year 1839; distinguished under the principal heads of receipt and expenditure: And, also, an estimate for the same for the year 1840; showing, in each case, the surplus applicable to the supplies voted by Parliament. Account, showing the amount of the deficiency bills charged on the growing produce of the consolidated fund outstanding, unsatisfied on the 14th day of February, 1839, and the 14th day of February, 1840, respectively. Account, showing the surplus or deficiency of the net income of the United Kingdom, compared with the expenditure thereof (exclusive of the charge for a fixed sinking fund, while such was imposed by law), in each of the five years preceding the 5th day of January, 1831: and also in each of the five years preceding the 5th day of January, 1840. Account, showing the total amount of the funded or unfunded debt created, and also of the funded or unfunded debt extinguished, in each of the three years preceding the 5th day of January, 1840; distinguishing the stock created in lieu of Exchequer bills cancelled, being the produce of moneys invested by savings banks. Account of the total amount of the unfunded debt outstanding on the 5th day of January, 5th day of April, 5th day of July, and 10th day of October, in each of the years 1837, 1838, and 1839; stating the rate of interest on Exchequer bills issued at or about the same periods; the current rates of premium or discount on the same in the public market; and the prices of the Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities. Account of the total net income and expenditure of the United Kingdom, in each of the twelve years between the 5th day of January, 1828, and the 5th day of January, 1840 (in continuation of the account annexed to the Fourth Report of the Committee on Finance in 1828, wherein the same is exhibited from the year 1792). Account, showing the total sums expended for the service of the army, navy, ordnance, and miscellaneous, in each of the twelve years between the 5th day of January, 1828, and 5th day of January, 1840."

On the question being put from the chair, —

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said: — I am well aware that every person in office is, ex officio, liable to those observations and charges which, as a member of the Government, I share on the present occasion; and I am equally well aware that, in the eyes of the Opposition, there can be no motives for bringing forward such a motion as this but those of the purest patriotism. I am far from desiring to assign any other than the best motives to the Right Honourable Gentleman; but still I cannot conceal from myself — nor will I attempt to conceal from the House or the country — that, if all the ingenuity of the Right Honourable Gentleman had been called into requisition for the purpose of devising a course more embarrassing to those who are at the head of the financial affairs of the empire, he could not have been more successful than he has been in preparing and bringing forward the present motion. Before I come to the real point at issue, and before I follow the Right Honourable Gentleman in some of his observations, I will narrow the question as much as possible to the points which the House will have to discuss, by stating what part of the Returns I am ready to concede. The part of the motion to which I object is for a Return of " the estimated income of the Consolidated Fund for the year 1840." The rest of the Returns I am quite willing to give; with this understanding, — that, if I shall find further information necessary, I shall hold myself at liberty to re-move for fresh Returns. There remains, therefore, no questions as to any account whatever, which is included in these Returns relating to the past, as there is no objection on the part of Government to any Return whatever, but to that which involves, practically, that part of the Budget which comprises the income of the future year. This, however, is the principal point at which the Right Honourable Gentleman aimed. He insisted that, at this present moment, the Chancellor of the Exchequer should lay before the House an estimate of what would be the income of the future year. The Right Honourable Gentleman, in the first part of his speech, sought to justify what he admitted to be not an ordinary, but an extraordinary motion, by an allegation of what he was pleased to term a systematic evasion, on the part of Government, of any declaration as to what were their views upon finance, or what was the condition of the finances of the country. But the Right Honourable Gentleman quite upset this justification by subsequent admissions. When it served his turn to do so, the Right Honourable Gentleman commented on statements made by my Noble Friend not now in the House, and by my Right Honourable Friends around me, on the occasion of a motion for a vote of want of confidence in the Government; and, in doing so, he admitted that, in the early part of the Session, on the first opportunity, nothing could have been more candid, more fair, more open (such were the words), than the statement of both my Noble Friends (Lord Melbourne and Lord John Russell) respecting the position in which they were placed, and the course which the Government intended to pursue; and therefore, when the Right Honourable Gentleman stated that the Government displayed a systematic evasion in stating their views regarding finance, I would only ask the House to look to the facts of the case. If ever there was a moment when the Ministers of the Crown might well have shrunk from such a declaration as that which was so manfully made by my Noble Friend at the head of the Government, in this House, it was that moment when the fate of the Administration was pending. Yet, the very instant before this House went to a division on his fate as a Minister, my Noble Friend near me, in language which has been characterised by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite as most candid, fair, and open, declared to the House the difficulties of the financial circumstances of the country, and the determination of the Government to meet them with the firmness and energy which the case required. I think, therefore, I have disposed of the charge of evasion which the Right Honourable Gentleman has thought fit to urge.

The Right Honourable Gentleman says that the returns he seeks for have been furnished on former occasions; but the Right Honourable Gentleman — unintentionally, no doubt — left a wrong impression on the minds of many Honourable Gentlemen who had not closely attended to all the circumstances, or to the real facts of the precedents which he brought forward. He stated that both Lord Ripon and Lord Spencer, when they held the office which I have now the honour to fill, gave accounts of their financial expectations at an early period of each year. Now, in the first place, as regards Lord Ripon, it must be recollected that the financial year in his time began in the month of January, and not, as now, in the month of April; and consequently, the business of the House was necessarily brought forward at an earlier period of the year than now it is; but the other circumstances of the case were different. That was not a case of compulsion at all; no opposition called for the course; but the Noble Lord took that course which appeared to him to be, under the circumstances, most expedient, and best for the public service; not because he was called upon to do so, though he considered it inconvenient. Lord Spencer followed the same course, of his own free motion; but it was a course, with respect to which, at the time, if I mistake not, many objections were taken, by all parties, as highly inconvenient if it was regarded as establishing a precedent for Government's laying the financial statement for the year before the House at so early a period. Yet that is the demand of the Right Honourable Gentleman, founded on such precedents as these. These accounts, then, having never, in the warmest times of opposition, even during the war, been pressed for from Government, or granted by Government, it is for the Right Honourable Gentleman and his friends to make out a stronger case than has been made out for their production, now. In the first place, I have always understood, and I have learned from those whom I was always led to think high authorities, that the case of an individual, and the case of a country, are quite different. I always understood that it was a doctrine laid down by high authority at the other side of the House, that as regards, an individual, the first object which he ought to look at, is the amount of his income; and that having taken an account of his income, he is then bound to cut down his expenditure to meet it; but the case is quite different when you come to deal with a country. Here you are obliged to look first at what the necessities of the public service require, and then to meet those necessities; so that if you have a superfluous income, you are not at liberty to expend one sixpence more than is necessary; and if, on the other hand, there be a deficiency of income, you must still first look at the expenditure which is necessary, and having taken this into consideration, you should proceed to consider the best mode of providing the means to meet it. This was the principle stated by the Right Honourable Gentleman, himself, before the Finance Committee.

In reply to a question put to him, the Right Honourable Gentleman stated that he objected to dealing with the question of income until he had first determined upon that of expenditure. But now the Right Honourable Gentleman being on the opposite side of the House, has inverted his position, and has called upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his estimates of income long before the probable amount of expenditure could possibly be determined. Even when my Noble Friend Lord Althorp did bring forward his early financial statement at a time when it signified little even if he mistook in his calculation to the amount of a million, he expressed the difficulty he had in giving anything like an accurate calculation — a calculation upon which the House could rely; and certainly this difficulty, if it existed at that time, must be much greater, now, than it was then. The Right Honourable Gentleman has alluded to some of the difficulties which have obscured the prospects of the commercial world for some time past; but I will ask, have these prospects entirely cleared up? or, at all events, does not the Right Honourable Gentleman himself know that it is a principle that has been generally acted upon, that it is with reference to the prospects of commerce at the opening of the spring trade, that the finance Minister must, in a great measure, found his views as regards the probable productiveness of the Customs and the Excise? With respect to the Post Office, I can assure the House that nothing but a sense of public duty would induce me to withhold any information from the House on that point; but from a sense of what is due to the public service, I must decline to accede to the Right Honourable Gentleman's request, as to this particular, on the present occasion; and as I consider it my duty not to put on paper any answer to the Right Honourable Gentleman on this matter, so I shall also take care not to be led by the Right Honourable Gentleman's seductive arguments on this part of the case to give him the information in any other way, by entering into any other argument.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Those cheers from the other side with which this observation has been met, convince me that it is not entirely without intention that these lures were held out, and that, even if Honourable Gentlemen opposite were not convinced that they should embarrass Government by demanding these Returns, the Right Honourable Gentleman thought he might practise upon the inexperience of the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, and obtain that information, in the course of his speech, which he, perhaps, would not obtain otherwise, but which he wanted to possess, that he might use it for his own purposes. In what I have now said, I know very well I am exposing myself to numerous attacks from the other side of the House; I can see this in the smiles of the Honourable Gentlemen who sit opposite. I know I have so far placed myself to a disadvantage; but I know, also, that it is my duty not to be led into any such discussion: and while I feel that I am fulfilling that duty, I am altogether careless what present advantage may be taken of me by Honourable Gentlemen opposite. The information respecting the Post Office will be laid on the table of the House in the Returns which I, myself, have moved for; and until these are before us, the calculations of the Right Honourable Gentleman can have little weight. With regard to the early introduction of the universal low rate of postage, I felt it my duty, as Finance Minister, to place the Post Office question, at the earliest possible period, in such a position, that Parliament might have some months' experience of the working of the measure before I laid the financial statement of the year before them. There are plenty of reasons why I should, and might, have postponed the introduction of the low rate. I admit, that many of these reasons were strong and cogent, and I admit that it was objectionable to introduce the change in an imperfect state, at a time when the change involved inconvenience to the public service, and partial inconvenience to the public at large; but I so strongly felt that it was my duty not to evade the question, and so decidedly felt it to be expedient that there should be some months' experience of the new system before the House came to consider the financial statement, that, despite the obloquy to which I might be subjected in various quarters, I deemed it my imperative duty to introduce the change, when and as I have done, even though I admit the plan to have been in an incomplete state. I mention this to show that, at any rate, in this respect, there has been no attempt on the part of Government to evade the question of deficiency of revenue. With respect to the point which the Right Honourable Gentleman has so much pressed, it would be quite impossible for any man at the present moment to come to any fixed and fair estimate of what the result of this experiment will be.

The course which the Right Honourable Gentleman has pursued, is one which has never been pursued before, and one which is quite contrary to the principles on which public income and public expenditure ought to be balanced, not to mention the peculiar difficulties presented by the present state of the mercantile interest. Indeed, I cannot understand in what mode the Right Honourable Gentleman would wish his estimates to be framed. I know on what principles a Chancellor of the Exchequer is generally understood to come down to the House with his financial statement. He considers what he, on his own responsibility, should state to the House as to the extent to which the House might fairly go, and is not to be held responsible for the accuracy of particular figures; but he is—for not overstating the amount of income, ;—he is for stating fairly those grounds which may enable Parliament and the country to come to a just conclusion with respect to the finances of country. If the Right Honourable Gentleman were to go to the different departments to ascertain the probable revenue, I do not know on what figures he is to rely.

The Right Honourable Gentleman has further alluded to the course taken by Government respecting the general debt of the country, and he has adverted, to a statement made by a Noble Lord, a member of the Government, in another place. Moreover, the Right Honourable Gentleman praised the Government of which he himself formed a part; and with respect to the official course of the Right Honourable Member for Cambridge, sitting near him. He alluded especially to that Right Honourable Gentleman, and threw out some observations as to the course which had been pursued by former Administrations. Now, I am quite ready to admit that the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite had it in his power to reduce the debt, and that he availed himself of that power; and much of his reductions he effected, by converting permanent debt into terminable annuities. I would call the attention of the House to what has really been the course pursued,—to what has been the increase and diminution of the debt under the Administration which followed that of the Right Honourable Gentleman. Now, it is no part of my object, at present, to find fault with former Administrations, but to speak of what has been done since the accession to office of the Whig Government; and with regard to that point, I hold in my hand a statement to which I shall venture to call the attention of the House. On the 5th of January, 1831, the amount of funded capital was 757,486,997*l.*; on the 5th of January, 1839, the amount was 761,347,690*l.*, showing an increase of the funded debt of 3,860,693*l.*; on the 5th of January, 1831, the amount of capital unfunded was 27,271,656*l.*; on the 5th of January, 1839, it was 24,655,300*l.*, showing a decrease of 2,616,350*l.*, and showing together, a total increase of capital debt of 1,244,343*l.* Thus stood the course of the Whig Government, which had difficulties to deal with which no other Government had had to sustain. I will now allude to one of these circumstances peculiar to this Government, and which imposed a difficulty on this Government to which former Governments were not subject. There was an addition, under their administration, of not less than 20,000,000*l.* to the public debt, but this was effected not by any financial arrangements of the Ministry — not by any of the mismanagement of which that Right Honourable Gentleman talked so much, but it was incurred for the purpose of freeing hundreds of thousands of our fellow-men from slavery, and paid as compensation to the West Indian planters for the emancipation of their slaves.

The Right Honourable Gentleman has stated that I am bound to take on my shoulders the responsibility of those who preceded me in office. I hope, however, that the obligation will be reciprocal, and that the Right Honourable Gentleman will take upon his shoulders the responsibility of the large addition to the public debt made by those Tory Administrations which preceded that of the Whigs. Be that as it may, I am willing to take my share of any blame that may be attributed to those who passed the Negro Emancipation Act; and I would rather bear that blame, and be open to the imputation of having increased the public debt, than I would have diminished that debt by refusing to do what justice and humanity so loudly demanded. But let it not be forgotten that, notwithstanding this very serious addition of 20,000,000*l.* on account of compensation claims, there was, on the 5th of January, 1839, an increase on the capital debt of only 1,244,343*l.*; and if the 20,000,000*l.* additional were not taken into the calculation, so far from an increase, there would have been a decrease of 18,755,657*l.* It seems that I am to be held responsible for all that Lord Monteagle may have done during three years of difficulty, but that I am to assume nothing for what was done under Lord Spencer! How stood the case in 1836? On the 6th of January, 1836, the amount of funded debt was 758,549,866*l.*; on the 5th of January, 1840, it was 766,547,684*l.*, showing an increase on capital of 7,997,818*l.* The unfunded debt amounted, on the 5th of January, 1836, to 29,954,335*l.*; on the 5th of January, 1840, it amounted, including the addition of 1,000,000*l.*, to 21,688,375*l.*, showing a diminution of 8,265,960*l.* If this decrease of the unfunded debt be compared with the increase of the funded debt, it will appear that, upon the whole, there is a decrease in the amount of both capitals. So far, therefore, from having increased the debt, it appears that my Noble Friend (Lord Monteagle), during his financial career, diminished the total amount of the funded and the unfunded debt. A Government is usually liable to attack on the ground of expenditure. Upon that ground I have not to complain of Honourable Gentlemen opposite; for if any increase of income has at any time been pressed upon the Government, it was probably more owing to Honourable Gentlemen opposite than to any other cause. The Government have not been encumbered in their estimates by Honourable Gentlemen, on the other side, attempting to reduce them, because Honourable Gentlemen opposite were never too ready to cut down the estimates; but, on the contrary, were always anxious to prove that the service of the country could not be carried on with so small an expenditure as that which the Government from time to time proposed.

Such being the case,—the Government not being urged to economy by the Opposition, but rather the reverse, — I will compare the army, ordnance, navy, and miscellaneous estimates for the years 1828, 1829, and 1830, three years of an Administration which, on the contrary, has generally received the praise of having attended to economy, with the average of the estimates for the same services, and period during the nine years of Whig Government. The average of the estimates of the army, navy, ordnance, and miscellaneous services for the years 1828, 1829, and 1830, was 17,350,871*l.*; whilst the triennial average for the nine years of Whig Government, from 1831 to 1839, whilst Lord Althorp and Lord Monteagle were Chancellors of the Exchequer, inclusive of the Canada grants, was 15,461,688*l.* Now, if the Right Honourable Gentleman attacks Lord Monteagle's administration alone, he will find that the average during the time my Noble Friend was Chancellor of the Exchequer was 15,372,216*l.*, or nearly 2,000,000*l.* below the average of the expenditure in the same branches in 1828, 1829, and 1830. Even during the last year for which this information could be obtained, including the additional 1,000,000*l.* on account of Canada, the amount is but 17,219,692, which was still below the average of the Government of the Right Honourable Gentlemen opposite. It may be said that these estimates came under the observation of Parliament, and therefore that the vote of Parliament contributed to the reductions. But is this the only respect in which, during the nine years of Whig Government, attention has been paid to the expenditure of the country? I am not now going into details of particular reductions in this office or in that office, but will content myself with one great point, — namely, the difference between the amount of revenue actually received, and the amount paid into the Exchequer. In the last year before the Whigs came into office, I find that the difference between the amount collected and the amount paid into the Exchequer, without taking into account drawbacks, was 4,875,000*l.* and odd. I find that, in 1839, the last year of which the account can be got, the difference amounted to only 4,042,000*l.*, showing a reduction of 833,000*l.* in a sum under 5,000,000*l.* There may be one other point to which I ought to advert, but the Right Honourable Gentleman has relieved me from the necessity of touching upon it, — I mean the prospects of the country.

The Right Honourable Gentleman, in whose views I fully concur on this point, has stated that there has been a temporary depression arising from temporary causes, but that he looked to the prospects of the country with sanguine expectation that those difficulties would be only temporary, and a conviction that none of its real resources are diminished. Now, I consider that the product of the customs and excise is, probably, the best criterion of the state of the country; and it appears that in 1830 they amounted, together, to 36,184,000*l.*, and in 1839 to 35,093,692*l.*, showing little alteration. The total of the income of 1830 amounted to 50,000,000*l.*, and of 1839 to 47,844,000*l.* Without taking into consideration the reductions made during that period, when I look to the produce of the revenue, I find that it has kept up in a remarkable manner; and when I remember the reductions of taxation during that period, which it would be very difficult actually to estimate, but which was upwards of 6,000,000*l.*, independent of the Post Office, I cannot but consider it as a conclusive proof that the resources of the country are uninjured. During that period there has been, not only the reduction of 6,000,000*l.* of taxation, but the public have been enabled to bear the additional burden of the 20,000,000*l.* for the emancipation of the negroes, and the interest upon it of about 750,000*l.* a-year; and this new burden has been borne without any additional taxation.

With regard to the Post Office, it is, on the present occasion, unnecessary to fight over again the battle which we fought in the last Session of Parliament. But I will briefly state the ground upon which the measure was carried. It was never concealed from the House or from the public that it was not any ordinary revenue transaction. It was a case in which great and important grounds alone could justify the experiment. What were those grounds? Was it not admitted on all hands that the reduction of postage would be one of the greatest blessings that could be communicated to the public at large, with regard to commercial interests, to domestic and social purposes, to friendly intercourse, to the advancement of literature and science, and even to religious communications? The clergy were among the most anxious promoters of the scheme; and from the clergy more, perhaps, than from any other class, I have received acknowledgments of its being a benefit of the utmost importance. This is not all. Was it not a most appalling fact which appeared before the Committee, who examined all the various bearings of this question, that from one end of the country to the other, with every class and under all circumstances, there was a conspiracy to cheat the revenue? Was it, then, a mere revenue question? Was it not a question well worth consideration, whether, by taking away a portion of revenue, we could give those great benefits to the country which I sincerely believe will follow upon the measure, and will also remove the great calamity to which I have referred; for I can conceive nothing worse than that a whole people should be united to break the law. The Right Honourable Gentleman has been extremely facetious upon the subject of the resolutions moved by my Noble Friend (Lord Monteagle) last year. I will not conceal my opinion, but state frankly what I consider to be the effect of those resolutions. I think my Noble Friend was perfectly justified when he took upon himself, as a Finance Minister, to bring forward the measure of reduction — in bringing, at the same time, in the most solemn and distinct manner, under the cognisance of Parliament and of the country, the alternative which, possibly, or probably, would arise from the adoption of that measure. I do not think a Finance Minister would have been justified, when he saw that a defalcation in the revenue would be the consequence of his proposal, in not declaring, if such should be the event, that a new tax must be imposed. A Minister in such a situation is bound to bring forward, in the most open manner, the alternative in case of defalcation, and then to ask whether Parliament would, on such terms, consent to the reduction. I believe that the public ought to be consulted as to the mode in which money is to be taken out of their pockets. I believe they are the best judges of the mode in which taxation ought to be made: and if they were of opinion that the Post Office tax was exorbitant, and pressed upon their comfort, the interest of their commerce, their social intercourse, they were perfectly justified in desiring to have it altered. I believe that throughout the country the people will be prepared, in preference to suffering the re-establishment of the Post Office rates, to make an equivalent, — such an equivalent as may be necessary to make good the deficiency.

So far I concur in the course of my Noble Friend. But I am perfectly certain, neither the words of the resolution nor the Act of Parliament introduced any new duty to this House, or created any new obligation. It is the duty of the House to furnish, for the public service, what is absolutely necessary — to keep faith with the public creditor — to give to the establishments of this country sufficient force to protect its commerce and to keep up its national honour. If, unfortunately, it should turn out that, without resolutions or Acts of Parliament, the House or the country should be so lost to all those feelings, as to be willing to see the public service starved, and the public establishments sink to such a condition that neither the honour of the country abroad nor its commerce at home could be defended, — or (what I shall never anticipate) that the House should be willing to break faith with the public creditor, — then, I admit, that such a pledge as that given by Parliament last year would be of no force, and must be considered as waste paper. But I have better expectations than that this can happen. My Noble Friend in the other House and my Noble Friend in this House stated, without any of the subterfuge or systematic evasion of which they are accused, the course they would pursue. For myself, as long as I hold the office which it is now my fortune to hold, I shall not shrink from the task — however unpopular it may be — of calling on the House to redeem that pledge which I consider it is bound to redeem, and to provide for what is required for exigences of the public service.

Mr. GOULBURN. — Sir, my Right Honourable Friend who opened the subject has so fully and completely stated the grounds on which this question rests, and the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has offered so little in opposition to them, that I shall feel great difficulty in doing more than replying to a few of those minor topics which the Right Honourable Gentleman seems to consider as a sufficient answer to the motion before the House. The Right Honourable Gentleman has concluded his speech by professions, to which if he adheres, he will receive the approval of every Member of the House. The Right Honourable Gentleman has told us that it is the duty of the House to keep up the equality of the revenue and the expenditure; to furnish what may be necessary to maintain the establishments of the country; to uphold public credit, and to preserve respect to the national honour both at home and abroad. In the principle, so laid down, I most cordially concur. It is a principle which I have often endeavoured to impress on the Government, and which I now rejoice to find adopted by the Right Honourable Gentleman at the commencement of his financial career; and if the Government and the two Houses of Parliament adhere to that principle, I, for one, entertain no fear as to the result. But the Right Honourable Gentleman further tells us, that if the House did not concur in those opinions, it would be lost to every proper sense of duty. I must, however, take leave to say, that it is not upon the House alone that the maintenance of those principles and professions depends. If the Government, as they ought to, and must, have the lead in the two Houses of Parliament, manfully adhere to those principles, I entertain no fear for the House of Commons. But if, commencing a financial career with high-sounding principles, the justice of which no man can deny, the Right Honourable Gentlemen shall afterwards be found departing from those principles, until the revenue cannot maintain the establishments of the country, the House will be placed in the double difficulty of not only having to act on their sense of duty, but also to fight against the resistance and misconduct of Government. If I do not give absolute credit to the Right Honourable Gentleman, I have good ground for expressing some doubt. I well remember that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Monteagle), when he entered upon his financial administration, made professions exactly similar to those which the Right Honourable Gentleman has now made. He told the House that it was most important to avoid a deficiency of revenue, but that it was indispensable to maintain a surplus, without which there could be no reduction of taxation; but, before he left office, that Right Honourable Gentleman abandoned every one of those principles. Instead of a surplus, he had for years a large deficiency; and he consented to repeal a tax in the face—not even of a small surplus, but—of an enormous deficiency. Finally, he left the finances of the country in such a situation that there is no alternative, in the opinion of the Government themselves, but to impose new taxes to meet the deficiency which has been thus increased. I do not wish to censure that Noble Lord (Lord Monteagle) in his absence, but what I have said I will justify by the very words which were used by that Noble Lord when, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, he brought forward his first budget. Now let the House listen, and judge, from the result of the past, how far reliance is to be placed on similar professions for the future. On the 14th of August, 1835, being that period of the year when the late Chancellor of the Exchequer generally thought fit to favour us with his financial expositions, the Right Honourable Gentleman said,—

> Let not Honourable Gentlemen assume, because it might appear from the existence of an apparent surplus of 835,000*l*., that therefore it would be competent for me to propose, or that it would fall within the bounds of my duty to acquiesce in, a remission of taxation to that extent. Would to God, Sir, that it were! I can assure Honourable Gentlemen that there is no portion of the duties which a Chancellor of the Exchequer is called upon to perform that can be so agreeable to his feelings as making a proposition to Parliament for the repeal of an unpopular tax. And if those who are charged with the finances of the country find themselves compelled to resist applications of this nature pressed from time to time on them, Gentlemen ought in justice to believe that such official resistance is always reluctantly made, and that it can only be from a sense of duty that a Minister is induced to make a stern and determined stand against the proposed remission or reduction of taxation, and that he will only do so when he is convinced that such reduction or remission is fraught with danger to the permanent interests of the country.*

The Right Honourable Gentleman was then urged by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, who was, at that time, Member for Middlesex, to take off a portion of the duty on tobacco, on the ground that that particular branch of revenue would be thereby increased; and what was his reply?—

> Why, Sir, there is no experiment I should make with more pleasure than the experiment of reducing taxation for the purpose of increasing consumption. But I dare not make such an experiment at the hazard of shaking the credit of the country. When we have a bonâ fide surplus to deal with, then it may be right so to apply it. But we ought not to venture on such reductions, if by making them we place at risk too large a proportion of the public revenue.

This declaration referred to the reduction of a tax then amounting to about 800,000*l*. The same opinions were annually repeated by the Right Honourable Gentleman in 1836, 1837, and 1838; but, in 1839, in the face of a deficiency of revenue greater than had ever before existed,—he came down to the House to propose a remission of taxation, not of 800,000*l*. but of a branch of revenue producing 1,600,000*l*. Therefore, when I find the Right Honourable Gentleman commencing his financial career with high-sounding declarations, I think I am justified in looking upon those declarations with an eye of suspicion arising out of the conduct of the Government to which the Right Honourable Gentleman belongs. If, therefore, I venture to express some doubt of the reliance to be placed on the declaration now made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think I have some grounds for that doubt. The Right Honourable Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) has cautiously avoided stating to the House the real accounts which this motion proposes to call for. He has asked, How can the Right Honourable Gentleman expect an estimate of the income of the country at this period of the year? He says to us, "You always maintain that we should first settle the expenditure, and then consider the income which may be necessary." The Right Honourable Gentleman thus taunts us with having abandoned our principles. But the motion, in reality, implies no abandonment of our principles. It does not require an estimate of the whole income;—what it requires is, an estimate of the produce of the Consolidated Fund for the year, on a principle distinctly not applicable to the general account of the income of the country. The Consolidated Fund is charged with certain permanent payments, the discharge of which is essential to the credit of the country. We know that there is a great deficiency in the revenue, — the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself telling us that his means are deficient to the amount of 2,000,000*l.*; and we wish to know and see how far the Consolidated Fund will be adequate, in the ensuing year, to meet the additional charges upon it. There is one circumstance which gives us a specific right to have such an estimate. When the Right Honourable Gentleman's Noble Predecessor in office (Lord Monteagle) came down, last year, to the House, almost at the last day of the Session, and proposed a loan of 4,000,000*l.* for the purpose of funding a similar amount of Exchequer bills, the Noble Lord was asked how he meant to provide for the interest of that loan? What was the Noble Lord's answer? He said he had a Bill to introduce with respect to the Bank of Ireland, which, when passed into a law, would give him 85,000*l.* a-year to pay the interest of the loan. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, perhaps, has forgotten that, like all other measures of the present Government, the Bank of Ireland Bill was thrown out,— or, rather, abandoned, — as the price of support from those who insisted on its rejection. Thus, the contemplated means of paying the interest on the loan were lost, together with the Bank of Ireland Bill itself. Under such circumstances, have we not a right to demand a statement of the income of the Consolidated Fund? The Right Honourable Gentleman has also stated that there is no precedent for the present motion. Now, I wish to understand from the Right Honourable Gentleman whether he really means to rely on such an objection as a ground for refusing his assent to this motion; because, if that be his only objection, I shall have but little difficulty in removing the Right Honourable Gentleman's scruples on that head. I think I can convince the Right Honourable Gentleman that what we ask him to do in the present instance is, to adopt a course to which other Administrations have acceded. I could easily adduce many precedents in favour of the course proposed; but I will content myself with furnishing the Right Honourable Gentleman with but one or two on the present occasion: at the same time, I may be allowed to say that, even if there were no precedent to be found in the annals of Parliament, the present circumstances would, of themselves, be sufficient to make one. If the Right Honourable Gentleman, contrary to the general custom on his side of the House, wishes to appeal to "the wisdom of our ancestors," I will show the Right Honourable Gentleman what that wisdom has been. In 1803, a period of some difficulty, at the close of the war, when our financial operations were very much embarrassed, a Bill was introduced into this House, making considerable alterations in the Customs; and in the course of the discussion which ensued, it came to be questioned how far the proposed alteration in the law would affect the permanent interests of the country. A motion was made, on the 15th of June in that year, for an account of the computed annual interest of the Consolidated Fund as it would stand under the proposed alteration in the law, and this account was ordered without hesitation or opposition.

* See MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT, Sess. 1835, vol. iii. p. 2513-14.

But the Right Honourable Gentleman, perhaps, requires to hear of a more recent precedent. I will, therefore, now come to 1823; although, haply, the Right Honourable Gentleman will contend that the Earl of Ripon's statement is no precedent, as it supplied merely a low and general outline of his expectations, without any specific account. But was that the fact? The Earl of Ripon made a great alteration in the taxation of the country in 1823, and in the course of the discussion which ensued on the introduction of his plan, the question was put as to how far that alteration would affect the Consolidated Fund? A motion was made on the 7th of March, 1823, — an early period of the year, when all the difficulties connected with the spring trade were in existence, and when neither the imports nor exports could be ascertained. The Right Honourable Gentleman will, perhaps, tell me that that motion was made by some active Member of the Opposition, who wished to show his hostility to the Government; but be that as it may, the motion was made, as follows: — "That there be laid on the table of this House, an estimate of the probable future income of the Consolidated Fund, after allowing for the taxation to be reduced in the present Session, and after the annual charges upon the same." Now, this is exactly the motion of my Right Honourable Friend. If, therefore, the Right Honourable Gentleman intends to be guided by precedent, there are precedents enough for the motion; but the question, as I have said before, does not rest upon precedent. Precedent may be appealed to by those who wish to avoid the real merits of the question; but it has, in reality, nothing to do with the case. The question for the House to decide is, whether it is consistent with the due discharge of our duty to our constituents, and to the country — whether, in short, it is right, just, and reasonable, that we should have, at the present early period of the Session, an estimate of the income of the Consolidated Fund, with the view of making up our minds as to the nature of the preparations to be adopted with regard to any emergency that may occur, and of placing the finances of the country on a respectable footing. I might have contented myself with saying, with regard to the propriety of this motion, that it has generally been the practice to postpone motions relating to finance until later in the Session; but the Right Honourable Gentleman has himself afforded the strongest reasons for demanding the production of these papers, because he has told us, at once, that he does not intend to bring forward his financial statement for some months. He has boldly and manfully stated that his reason for making the change in the postage on the 10th of January was, that he might have some months' experience of its working before he made his financial statement. It is quite evident from this, that we shall have to wait some months for that statement. If, then, my Right Honourable Friends are to wait for that time, what hope can there be that we shall be able to effect any good, after being kept so long in ignorance of the state of our resources, and of their adequacy to meet the exigencies of the public service? A subject of the greatest importance will thus be brought forward at a late period of the Session, when Honourable Members will have neither time nor opportunity for observation or reflection upon its bearings. It is admitted upon all hands that the finances of the country are, — to use an expression of the First Lord of the Treasury, — in a state which is "extremely disagreeable" —— which means, when translated into plain English, a state of considerable difficulty and danger. If such, then, be our position, I ask of every man who hears me, whether, it is not most advisable, under the present circumstances of the country, to let this House know, and, through this House, to let the country know, the exact position in which our finances are placed? A declaration has been made by the Government, which was open, candid, and manly — I admit that; but which, at the same time, has created a great deal of — I trust exaggerated—alarm; and there is no better mode for calming the anxiety that has been produced by that declaration, than by bringing before us the state of our affairs, showing us what is really the income of the Consolidated Fund, and removing the doubts which may prevail as to its capability of paying the charges that will fall upon it. I am far from being one of those who entertain any fear or alarm as to the capability of the resources of this great country to meet any difficulties that may beset them; but in proportion as those resources are great, in the same proportion ought the Government to have — and to show that it has — the fullest confidence in their efficiency, and to abstain from refusing its consent to a motion, of which the object is, to place before the country the real state of its affairs. I do earnestly entreat the Government, then, to lay before us the condition of that important branch of our finances, — the income of the Consolidated Fund.

The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has, in allusion to some observations that fell from my Right Honourable Friend, thought it necessary to refer to what has been done, with respect to the reduction of the national debt. The Right Honourable Gentleman took credit for the administration to which he belongs, that they have left the funded and unfunded debt pretty nearly as they found it. This has been the course for the last four years. But I must say, that it is not satisfactory to my mind, nor can it be satisfactory to the mind of any man who considers the subject, that, during four years of continued peace, no progress has been made in the reduction of the debt of the country; and it must be less satisfactory to know, that, while no progress has been made in the reduction of the capital of the funded and unfunded debt, taken together, there has been an increase of annual charges on the debt, which amounts to one million of money. If we look to the charges on the debt in 1835, as compared with the charges on the debt to the year 1840, we shall find the augmentation of the charges to be from 28,700,000*l.* to 29,450,000*l.*, being an increase of 750,000*l.*, showing, that whilst we are making no exertions for the reduction of the debt, we are imposing, every year, fresh burdens on the country. When I see this, I say that unless our system be altered, we must arrive at a time at which we cannot but sink under the weight imposed upon us. The Right Honourable Gentleman has, in defiance of the Whig Administration, gone back to the year 1831; although the House has less to do with that period than with that which has more closely preceded the present moment. I admit that there has been an increase to the debt, on account of the abolition of negro slavery; but that affords an additional reason why we ought to make increased exertions to reduce the debt. We ought to calculate and to be prepared for such emergencies. We have in one year an increased expenditure, on account of the emancipation of slaves; in another, we have the expenses of an army in Canada; and in another, we have to maintain our authority in a distant possession, or to defend ourselves at home from the encroachment of some enemy; but if we go on making loans, and adding to our debt, and never look to the means of reducing it, though we may avoid ruin ourselves, yet we shall thus entail it upon posterity. The Right Honourable Gentleman, opposite, in comparing the administration of the Duke of Wellington with the present, remarked, that the Duke of Wellington had not to pay 20,000,000*l.* for the emancipation of the negroes. I know that the Duke of Wellington had not to do that; but, then, let us look to a Return made by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer himself on this point, and we shall find that the debt, which on the 5th of January, 1828, was 777,000,000*l.*, was in 1831 reduced to 757,000,000*l.*—that is, that there was a reduction of the debt in three years to the amount of 20,000,000*l.*; so that it is evident, that if the Duke of Wellington had been called upon to pay 20,000,000*l.* for the emancipation of the slaves, he would have been much better able to do so than the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, and could have done it with a due regard to the security of the resources of the empire, and without imposing fresh burdens upon the people. The Administration of the Duke of Wellington considered that it was during times of prosperity and peace that there ought to be a reduction of the debt. I do not, then, shrink from a comparison between that Administration and any other which preceded or has succeeded it. I will not, upon this occasion, enter into any argument as to the comparative expenditure of the country at the periods referred to by the Right Honourable Gentleman, because I know how irksome it is to the House to listen to long and dry details of figures and calculations. I will not contend for the reduction in the collection of the revenues, effected by the Duke of Wellington, because I will read a paragraph from a speech made by the present Lord Monteagle in 1835, whose authority upon such a question must be considered indisputable, and I will then leave it to the House to decide, whether or not the Duke of Wellington had not at that time very greatly reduced the expenditure of the country. Lord Monteagle, then Mr. Spring Rice, said,—

> It must be clear to every Honourable Gentleman who heard him, that every reduction that had heretofore been made, rendered it more and more difficult to carry reductions further. He acknowledged, with the greatest readiness and pleasure, the reductions made by the Government of the Duke of Wellington, and the difficulty created by them of carrying reductions further.

I do not deny that the Honourable Gentlemen opposite have earnestly endeavoured to carry reductions further; but I say that we have the authority of Lord Monteagle himself to show, that at the time he made these observations, it was difficult for the Government of which he was a Member to discover any means by which reductions could, with safety to the public service, be carried further than the Duke of Wellington's Government had already carried them. As to the question of our expenditure at the present time, I shall not now enter upon it; but I wish to say one or two words on the Post Office question. The Right Honourable Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has said that it is not to be considered as a question of revenue, but as a measure that has conferred the greatest blessings on society, and one calculated to prevent the universal conspiracy that previously existed to cheat the revenue; and that therefore the reduction was proposed to Parliament by the Government. Now, I beg the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to recollect the arguments that were used on this side of the House upon that subject, and which did not deny that great benefits might result from the reduction of the rates of postage. We said, as Her Majesty's Government said when a reduction on tobacco was proposed—"Do not now bring forward the repeal of the tax, without telling us how any deficit that may accrue to the revenue is to be made up." I recommend the Right Honourable Gentleman to look back to the time when Mr. Pitt, having at the same time to contend with all the difficulties of the American war, and with great objections then raised against the revenue derived from the duty on tea, came down to Parliament and coupled his reduction of the tea duty, with a distinct statement of the duty which it was his intention to propose as a substitute and equivalent for it. Mr. Pitt left it to Parliament to choose between one tax and another; and what Her Majesty's present Government ought to have done in the instance of the Post Office reduction, was, to have come down to the House and have submitted some other specific tax for its consideration, equivalent to that derivable from the postage, and have left it to the House to decide between them.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

The Right Honourable Gentleman says, that he knew that there would be a probable defalcation caused by the remission of this tax: but it is not a question of probability at all. If it were only a question of probability, there might have been some reasonable ground for a pledge on the part of the House to make good a probable deficit; but there was, at the moment the reduction took place, an acknowledged deficiency in the revenue which we had to make up, and yet Ministers did not dare to face the difficulty; but, for the sake of a little popularity, they repealed a tax, and embarrassed the country, by endangering the finances, and exposing us to the loss of one tax, at a time when we could not afford it, and to the necessary imposition of another at a time when there is an outcry against all taxes whatever. With respect to the motion now before the House, I have shown, then, that so far as precedent is concerned, we have direct and precise precedents for the course for which my Right Honourable Friend contends. We have the example of two successive Administrations acceding to a motion, calling on them to state the income of the Consolidated Fund; and if this motion be now refused, the present Government will have the merit of being the only one which, when such a motion was made, has ever thought it necessary to keep from the country the real state of its finances. It may appear to the Government to be their conscientious duty to refuse this motion; but, in common with every one who knows the finances of the country, and who is desirous of remedying the evils under which, it is admitted by the Government, that it labours, I must give my voice in favour of bringing to the public view this great branch of the national revenue; and this apparent wish of Her Majesty's Government to conceal from this House and the country the real state of affairs, until some unforeseen circumstance or other shall place them in a better position than they are at present.

Mr. HUME.—I have, Sir, to complain, that those who, on both sides of the House, have taken part in the present debate, have wandered away from the real object of the motion. In my opinion, the country ought to be obliged to any man who brings before it the real state of its revenues, or who endeavours to keep down the expenditure, so that it shall not run beyond the means of meeting it. Hitherto we have been afraid to look the difficulties of the country in the face; but the time has at length arrived when we ought at least to be prepared to encounter the effects of the position in which we are placed. Of what advantage is it that we should be told of what was done in 1831 or 1832, in comparison with the present time, when we have not the facts before us upon which we can come to a just conclusion? It is of no use to hear statements made, as to the increase or decrease of our financial income, unless we have the real amount before us. It is very well to talk of an expense of 20,000,000*l.* incurred in purchasing the emancipation of the slaves; but the increase of the capital of our debt was last year between three and four millions, and no man can possibly say that any fair conclusion can be come to, at this moment, as to what the capital of the debt may now be. We want that information which can alone enable us to judge. We are going on, from year to year, risking public credit, and with a constantly increasing deficiency of revenue; and will any man be so bold as to tell me that we have this year any prospect of a less deficiency than we have had for the last few years? Are we, then, to conceal from ourselves the real difficulties of our position? We must come to a reckoning at some time or other; and why should we now be afraid to meet those difficulties, at once? We have a deficiency which has increased to 6,000,000*l.* in three years, and, to add to our embarrassments, we are bound to consider what has occurred in China. A large portion of the Irish nation, too, has left off drinking whiskey; so that there is, under that head, to be expected a deficiency of at least half a million in the year. I have seen an account of 10,000 persons in the town of Kilkenny having ceased from drinking whiskey, and I understand that 10,000 more in the county have pledged themselves to Father Matthew not to taste whiskey, again. If that pledge be kept, as I believe it will be, in Ireland, then there will certainly be a deficiency to the amount I have stated. Every one knows that the revenue has been in a bad state for the last twenty years; and, during the whole of that time, no one measure has been passed, for which I can give any Government greater credit, than I assign to the present Government for having carried through Parliament the Penny Postage Act. I have never concealed from myself, or others, that there would be a deficiency, in consequence, in that branch of the revenue; and it may be true that the measure may prove a failure, and that we may, in the end, be seriously disappointed as to the amount of the loss we may sustain by it; but I consider that it is a measure worthy of support, and that, even if the whole revenue derivable from that source were lost, it would still be, on the whole, a great gain to the country, and that the Honourable Gentlemen opposite will not greatly advance their own cause by upbraiding the Government for carrying it. It is calculated, by the most sagacious supporters of the penny post, that it will take three or four years to make up the deficiency caused by that measure; but still it is, in my opinion, of such advantage to the public in general, as wholly to counterbalance any temporary deficit that may be occasioned by it. I think that the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has not fairly accused the present Government of neglecting the finances of the country; for if the Right Honourable Gentleman had only looked at the papers which I now hold in my hand, he would have found that, so far from any man having cause for distrusting the resources of this country, the revenue has been in a better state for the last year than it has been in for nine preceding years, and that it has kept up, in spite of all the adverse circumstances with which it has had to contend. I find that, in 1833, the revenue of the country was 46,000,000*l.*; in 1836, — an extraordinary year, and which ought scarcely to be taken into the account,— it was 48,000,000*l.*; and in 1838 it was 47,000,000*l.* But what right have Honourable Gentlemen opposite to upbraid Her Majesty's Ministers with any deficiency that has arisen? It has been said that the estimates have been increased: but who increased them? When have the Honourable Gentlemen opposite done anything but stimulate extravagance? When did they support any economical proposition?

Mr. GOULBURN. — We supported, the other day, the proposition to reduce the vote of 50,000*l.* to Prince Albert to 30,000*l.*

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.]

Mr. HUME. — True: but did you support my amendment to reduce it to 21,000*l.*? I would have given you some credit for sincerity and principle if you had supported me on that occasion. For my own part, I can only say that I would much rather vote for 30,000*l.* than 50,000*l.* any day; and I did so, when I found that there was no chance of carrying my own proposition. But let me ask whether, going back as far as November, 1830, there has been any one Gentleman on the opposite benches who has pointed out any means by which our increased expenditure might be prevented? Have you ever assisted me in any attempt to reduce the estimates? You may have done something on the Jamaica Bill,——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

— but how did you act on the Canada question? On the heads of the Honourable Gentlemen opposite be the blood that has been and may yet be shed in Canada, where hundreds of persons have lost their lives, and where there was last year, alone, an expense incurred of at least 1,000,000*l.*; and so far as I can learn, the expense of this Canadian conflict will not cost this country less than 5,000,000*l.* Now, who are to blame for that? Honourable Gentlemen opposite may fancy that they can throw the burden off their own shoulders, but I assure them they cannot do so; and Mr. Poulett Thomson is now able to offer those terms to the Canadians which they have ever sought for, and which the Noble Lord on this side of the House refused to them, as well as the Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side. I make no distinction whatever between the two parties; they have been guilty, with respect to Canada, on both sides of the House. For my own part, I hold myself, and those with whom I have acted upon that question, to be altogether blameless.

[Ironical cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I will, however, say no more than this, upon that subject, that the enlargement of the establishments urged upon the Government by the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, on that occasion, was utterly uncalled for. It is a course of conduct such as this I have described which has led to our present difficulties; and I consider that that is the proper footing upon which to put this question. There is no want of resources in the country; all our difficulties are to be ascribed to the extravagance of this House. As to our having a surplus, I must say, from past experience, that whenever I have found a

Chancellor of the Exchequer with money to spare, I have at the same time always found him extravagant; and the only way to keep him economical is to keep him short of money to spend. If that course be adopted, I have no fear for the resources of this country. I have ever endeavoured to reduce the expenditure, and to maintain the revenue of the country; and I said, no later than last Session, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to let Parliament separate leaving public credit in the state it then was. I lament, in short, the condition in which public credit has been left for the last two years, with a deficient revenue and an increased expenditure; as I cannot conceive that any greater calamity can befall the country, than that it should suffer any injury in that most important particular. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has said, that there has been no evasion on the part of any Government equal to that shown by the present, with respect to the motion before the House. But has the Right Honourable Gentleman forgotten the battle which he himself waged with me on the Dead Weight Bill? That Right Honourable Gentleman and his party then played one of the greatest tricks I know of, and by which they raised 11,000,000*l.* on a deferred annuity of 585,000*l.* for forty years, which the country is paying at this day, and all this with the idea of providing for the dead weight; the fact being, that the dead weight is absolutely heavier, this year, than it was at the time that measure was first brought forward by Lord Bexley in 1822. We may safely assert that, since the year 1830 at all events, no such delusion has been practised on the country; and had any such been attempted since that time it would most unquestionably have been successfully resisted.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

It is absurd to talk of our 40,000,000*l.* of taxes, and of 8,000,000*l.* of taxes taken off, if we continue to go on as we now do. I am always an advocate for reducing great taxes, not that I wish the revenue to be deficient, but because I have always found from experience that even where 1,000,000*l.* of taxes have been taken off, the revenue has, nevertheless, risen almost in proportion; and that, instead of being the losers of that amount of revenue, we have, in fact, only lost about 200,000*l.* I am, then, I repeat, an advocate for the removal of heavy taxes, because I am satisfied that such reduction causes no injury to the revenue, while it confers very great benefits upon the community at large. I must say, however, that this discussion, at least so far as these matters are concerned, has nothing to do with the question; and I will, therefore, now come to the question before the House.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear!"]

I admit that I have deviated from it, but it has been in order to notice what has fallen from the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite. With regard to the question itself, it is somewhat curious that the Right Honourable Gentleman should have interfered with a question which I have for twenty years been in the habit of bringing forward. I am disappointed that the Right Honourable Gentleman did not make me some acknowledgment for this: the Right Honourable Gentleman, on the contrary, has claimed merit for the novelty of this motion, when he must have known that the first thing I did, on the first night in which a Committee of Supply stood on the Orders, was to say, "Do not vote any money till it is shown what revenue you have, and what your income is." The answer of the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite to that, was, "I care not what the income is; we must have such establishments as we consider necessary for the protection and glory of the country; and, having taken the sense of the House upon that question, we will then set about providing the means." Have I not always resisted such doctrine as that? I am told that I must not look to money or means, and that if the Government wants more ships or men, or money to support or increase a church establishment, we must first determine upon the grants, and then proceed to find the means. But, Sir, that is a course which I have always opposed. My proposition is, that whenever the Government brings forward the estimates, they should state, in round numbers, what they call for, and how they are prepared to provide for it. That ought to take place on the first day of every Session on which we are called on to vote a Supply; and to this point I have again and again drawn the attention of the House. I must, then, tell the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, and the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that I am surprised at their resisting this motion. If I might venture to give them any advice, I would, by all means, recommend them to give these papers. Is it anything extraordinary that is asked for? If the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer would send for the heads of the departments of the Excise, Customs, or Stamps, he would, in a few days, be prepared to give the information required. We have only to consider in what main heads of revenue there is likely to be any deficiency; and this information I think it but fair that the House should be put in possession of. It may be said that this is a factious motion. If so, then I would say, "Defeat it by agreeing to it." I would still further say, "Do not allow that to be factious which is reasonable." I beg the Noble Lord not to appear to refuse information which is really reasonable, and which ought to be before the House. It will give the public the impression that it is wished to conceal something. A similar Return has certainly, before now, been refused, when I have moved for it; but whenever it has suited the purpose of the Government, they have always produced it. It may have been refused to me on the ground that I should make a bad use of it, by moving for reductions of taxation; and I must say I have often been refused such a Return by the Honourable Gentlemen opposite. I had, however, hoped better things of those who, now, sit on the Treasury benches. I had hoped that they would go on improving; and as I have not wished to be particularly disagreeable, I own I have not been, perhaps, quite so attentive to this portion of my duty as formerly.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear!"]

That circumstance, however, does not rescue the Honourable Gentlemen opposite from the guilt of having refused similar Returns to this. The present state of the country, and the facts stated by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, in my opinion, particularly warrant the production of this Return; and, with this opinion, and on these grounds, if the question shall go to a division, I shall give my support to the motion.

Mr. LABOUCHERE.—I am not about to enter into the wide field of discussion which has been opened by other Honourable Gentlemen, for I am content to rest the defence of the financial operations of the Whig Government, since 1831, on the speech of my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I also really feel that the point on which the House is called to decide, has no real connection with the arguments which have been brought forward. That point is a plain and simple one, and I beg to recall the attention of the House especially to it, because the speeches in the early part of the evening were not delivered to so numerous an auditory as I now see prepared to give their votes. The question is, whether the House will impose a condition on my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his management of the financial affairs of the country, such as it has never before thought fit to impose on any one of his predecessors, by agreeing to that only part of the motion which is objected to by the Government? The question is, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now to be called upon to produce an estimate of the probable receipts of the Consolidated Fund for the ensuing year? There is a broad distinction between both the precedents quoted by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, and the present instance. On both those occasions the Government was a consenting party; and those charged with the financial affairs of the country consented to the motions in both cases because they saw that no public inconvenience was likely to arise by the production of the papers required. On the contrary, in the present case, my Right Honourable Friend says that there are many difficulties which embarrass his career, difficulties which he is prepared manfully to encounter, but that those difficulties would be materially aggravated if the House were to assent to this motion. In the instances of Lord Ripon and Lord Spencer, I cannot exactly say that the Budget had been actually brought forward, but at least an important part of their financial statements had been previously submitted to the House; and I believe that, in both cases, the repeal of certain taxes had been proposed and assented to by the House. Is it fair, then, to represent these cases as parallel? So far from their situations being similar to ours, they were exactly opposite. My Right Honourable Friend says that under existing circumstances, it would be more than ordinarily difficult to give an estimate such as is required; and he has not yet stated to the House what measures he proposes, in order to meet the financial demands of the country. I ask, therefore, whether any sound parliamentary reason, or any valid ground, has been given for imposing on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, duties, which the House has never imposed upon any of his predecessors? Even the Right Honourable Gentleman who has brought forward the motion admits that it is an extraordinary course to take, and who feels the necessity of endeavouring to fortify himself by precedents, which, however, are not applicable to the occasion. There is not any very great difference of opinion on either side of the House, that I can discover, as to the financial condition of the country; and it is admitted on both sides that this condition is not calculated to excite alarm, though at the same time, with an admitted deficiency, which has been accumulating for some years, doubtless certain difficulties do exist, which it is certainly the duty of the Government to look fairly in the face. It is not, therefore, as if the Government endeavoured to conceal anything from the House or the country. My Noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies and the Government generally, have volunteered a statement that the financial condition of the country does require the utmost attention, and have pledged themselves that it shall receive it. I cannot, therefore, perceive on what ground the Right Honourable Gentleman rests his case, in pressing the House for an estimate of the receipts of the Consolidated Fund for the ensuing year,—which is, indeed, the only part of the motion objected to. My Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny has complained of some obscurity in the accounts as to the management of the funded and unfunded debt.

Mr. HUME. — No. I said that, without the necessary documents before him, no one could, from to-night's debate, make out anything about it.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I mistook my Honourable Friend, then, and can assure him that on all such matters every Return shall be made which can tend to make the public accounts more clear. I will not now trouble the House with any further remarks. My sole object in rising was, to recall the attention of the House to the only point in dispute; and, as far as that is concerned, I shall certainly oppose the motion, because I think that in most respects, it is inconvenient, unfair, and unprecedented.

SIR G. CLERK. — I almost feel it necessary to apologise to the House for venturing to address them after the able speeches of my Right Honourable Friend, who brought the motion forward, and of my Right Honourable Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, to which, hitherto, no answer appears to me to have been given. The Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, at the commencement of his address, remarked, that many persons had come into the House since the commencement of the debate. I appeal, however, to those who had not the benefit of hearing the previous speeches whether they have heard from the lips of the President of the Board of Trade one single reason for refusing this motion? That Right Honourable Gentleman founded his argument on the want of precedents, and stated that similar demands had been successfully resisted, although my Right Honourable Friend has quoted precedents in which former Governments did not object to lay before the House estimates of the income of the country for a future year. But, even, supposing, for a moment, there was no precedent, are not the circumstances of the country, with respect to its finances, so unprecedented as to demand a departure from the customary course? The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has said that when he sat on the Opposition side of the House he frequently made a similar demand of the then Government, and that it was always refused. Probably that was because the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about, in the course of a few days, to make his financial statement.

Mr. HUME. — No, no!

SIR G. CLERK. — I rather think that that was the case; but, be it as it may, I will now state to the House the reasons assigned by a Tory Chancellor of the Exchequer, in an unreformed Parliament, for assenting to that, which a Whig Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a reformed House of Commons, now thinks proper to refuse. On the 15th of February, 1824, within three weeks after the meeting of Parliament, Lord Ripon said that, in conformity with the course he had adopted the preceding year, he took the earliest opportunity of giving the House the fullest information as to the financial position of the country; — and he then proceeded to state the reasons why he thought it right to make it at that time; and he declared that though in time of war it might be impossible for the Government to present to the House an early estimate on which to found the supplies for the year, yet, in time of peace, no such difficulty could possibly exist; —further, that it was of the greatest importance to the House and the country to be acquainted with the state of the finances as early as might be, inasmuch as the interests of all were vitally involved in the subject, and mostly dependent on them. Sir, if these reasons operated at the time the Earl of Ripon made that statement, — and if he at that early period of the Session found no difficulty in submitting to the House an estimate of the probable income and expenditure for the ensuing year,—I am at a loss to know what reasons there are to prevent the Chancellor of the Exchequer from complying with the request now made. It is true, as the Right Honourable Gentleman says, that the term of the financial year has been changed; but I cannot conceive that that affords any sufficient reason for the refusal. The Noble Lord at the head of the Government lately stated, that the country was in a crisis of great difficulty and embarrassment. The Noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Russell), at the conclusion of a very long debate, a week or two ago, alluded to the same difficulties, and stated that it would be necessary to call on the House to provide additional means for the wants of the country. But in what manner did the Noble Lord make that statement? He felt that, although the 308 Gentlemen behind him were ready enough to give a vote of confidence in the Government, they might not be prepared to supply the means of meeting the exigencies of the country; and he therefore threw himself on the pity of those sitting opposite to him, and he said, " Surely you will not refuse us the means of supporting public credit." The Noble Lord, after heaping all manner of obloquy upon the Conservative party, and after charging them with disloyalty, is obliged, in the hour of his need, to come to them, and address them nearly in the same manner that Shylock says he was addressed by the Merchant of Venice, " Lend me your moneys." The Noble Lord knows that when increased exertions are necessary to meet the difficulties of the country, he will not find any obstacles thrown in his way by Honourable Members on this side of the House. I perfectly agree with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, finding himself unable to offer any arguments against the Return moved for by the Right Honourable Gentleman, has endeavoured to divert the attention of the House from the subject by instituting comparisons between the present Government and that in which the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Cambridge was at the head of the financial department. The answer of my Right Honourable Friend, however, was so satisfactory, that I have little to say on that subject. When the Right Honourable Gentleman compared the general expenditure of the present Government with that of the Duke of Wellington's in 1828, 1829, and 1830, he did not give a fair statement of the expenditure of those two Governments. The Right Honourable Gentleman chose to go into the question of averages, which suited his purpose very well, because during 1828, 1829, and 1830, there was a diminution of expense, whereas, during the last three years, there has been a great increase. The House may remember that, in 1834, the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke stated that it was impossible for any Government, however economical, to make any greater reduction, because the greater part of the burdens of the country were of a fixed and permanent nature, — that the means of reduction were limited to the votes annually passed, which did not amount to more than 16,000,000*l.*, and that a reduction of 2,000,000*l.* was a large per centage. Now, let us see what has been the conduct of the present Government during the time they have been in office. They succeeded to the estimates framed during the short administration of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, in 1836, — a year in which reduction had been carried to the greatest possible extent. The total estimate for the year ending the 5th of January, 1836, was only 13,800,000*l.*; the next year it rose to 14,392,000*l.*; in 1838, it was 15,000,000*l.*; in 1839, 16,000,000*l.*; and this year, according to a paper recently laid on the table of the House, the estimate is no less than 17,493,545*l.*; being an increase on the army, navy, ordnance, and miscellaneous service, of no less than 3,693,545*l.*, in the course of four years. And I cannot admit that that increase has been caused by anything which has been done on this side of the House, for we have uniformly opposed the policy which has led to that increase. Now, when we are told of the profligacy and expenditure of the former Government as compared with the present, let me call the attention of the House to the financial condition of the country in the year 1830, the last year of the Government of the Duke of Wellington, and contrast it with what it was the year which has just expired. The net income of the country in 1830 was 50,056,616*l.*; the income of the present year is 47,844,800*l.*, being a diminution of income 2,211,816*l.* But what was the expenditure? In 1830 it was 47,142,000*l.*, whilst, in the present year, it is no less than 49,357,000*l.*, being an increase in the expenditure of 2,215,000*l.* The result of all which is, that instead of having, as in the year 1830, a surplus of nearly 3,000,000*l.*, the income is now insufficient to meet the expenditure by no less a sum than 1,500,000*l.*, in round numbers.

After the statements which have been made as to the impolicy of trying such a dangerous experiment as the alteration of the Post Office revenue, I will not trouble the House on that subject further than to remark, that it is one of the strongest reasons why the papers should be produced at an early period, in order that the effect of the change on the finances of the country may be ascertained. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has argued that no accurate returns can be made from that department for some months; but I cannot agree with him in that respect; and I do not know why the Right Honourable Gentleman should have been so premature in bringing his plan into action, before his arrangements were completed. The Right Honourable President of the Board of Trade says, that the production of the Returns would cause inconvenience to the public service. There certainly is no unity in these objections; and therefore I feel called upon to reject them. The great difficulty of arguing for the production of the paper is, the lack of argument on the other side; for no attempt has been made to show that it would be attended with the slightest public inconvenience. I believe that the real ground of objection to the production of such document is, that it will not show our finances to be in a very gratifying state. I do not think, however, that it will produce any despondency in the country. There is no reason for entertaining any very gloomy view of our resources; and I do not believe that any evil would be produced, either on the commercial or the money market, by a fair and full statement of the probable income and expenditure: on the contrary, I am confident that it would remove much apprehension which now exists as to the loss of revenue, and the great additional expenses to be incurred this year. The Right Honourable Gentleman is not called on, at this moment, prematurely to state what taxes he intends to propose. Perhaps the better plan would be, to postpone that statement until the real deficiency in the Post Office department shall have been ascertained, when the public will have the opportunity of judging whether it would be more advisable to raise that deficiency by fresh taxes, or to revert to something like the old system. We shall then have tried the question on fair ground; and it must depend on the general feeling of the country, whether the imposition of postage is a more odious burden than the same amount of tax laid on some article of necessary consumption? I am quite at a loss to conceive on what ground the Government refuse the production of this paper; and I shall therefore support the motion of my Right Honourable Friend.

Mr. HERRIES.—Sir, I cannot allow the present discussion to close, without making two or three remarks in reply. The House is now called upon to decide, whether it will or will not require, at the hands of the Government, information which is admitted by every one to be of the greatest importance in the present circumstances of the country; and I call upon every Honourable Member who has heard the whole of the arguments, to state whether a single sound objection has been urged against the production of the paper for which I have moved. Now, what has been stated in answer to the motion? There has been no allegation of inconvenience,—there has been no allegation as to the impossibility of rendering it. I have stated that it is of the utmost importance that this paper should be produced, and no answer has been given to me; and as the Right Honourable Gentleman has expressed his determination to withhold it indefinitely, I call upon the House to insist upon its production, and not to fail in the duty which it clearly owes to the country.

Mr. WARBURTON.—Sir, ——

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

the Right Honourable Gentleman has challenged any Member to say, whether a single satisfactory reason has been given for withholding the information now required.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I rise in obedience to the challenge ——

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I consider that, at the present period of the Session, it would be quite impossible to lay before the House these estimates with any degree of accuracy; and that, if brought forward in any other shape, they would rather tend to mislead the public, than to afford any useful information. I therefore cannot call for their production.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!"]

FLEETWOOD PORT.

Mr. TOWNLEY PARKER. — Sir, in moving for a Return of the several memorials, representations, and communications, to and from the Treasury, on which Fleetwood was made an independent bonded port, and the port of Preston made a creek under Fleetwood, I believe I shall meet with no very decided opposition on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The public, I have no doubt, have been greatly deceived by the exaggerated representations which have been made as to the port of Fleetwood. Three or four years ago, any one, passing Ackerman's Repository, might have seen a representation of the town and port of Fleetwood, and very probably the Right Honourable Gentleman may have had some such veracious plan before him, when the measures of which I complain were adopted. I happen to know something of that locality, and I beg to assure the House that when that picture was exhibited, there was scarcely a single house in the town completed; and therefore I must say that, however much I admire it as a work of art, it is very far from being true to nature. Moreover, the representation of Fleetwood, to which I have referred, contributed very much to the celebrity of the locality, and to the interest which the public were invited to take in the establishment of a railroad in that vicinity. Not content with the flattering picture drawn of Fleetwood, those who were anxious to advance the interests of that place endeavoured to make the public believe that the port would become almost unexampled for trade, and would rival even Liverpool itself. In order to show what slight foundation there is for such a representation, I will just contrast the situation of Fleetwood with that of Liverpool. The town of Liverpool contains a population of about 165,000 persons, — and when I speak of Liverpool by thousands, I can only speak of Fleetwood by units. Liverpool is somewhat more than half an hour's drive, according to railroad calculation, from the great town of Manchester; and the persons who are interested in trade can easily congregate together. The port of Fleetwood has no such recommendation; — it has neither a great commercial connection, nor does it afford any such facilities for the transaction of business. Liverpool has the advantage of being connected, by different kinds of carriage, with the great manufacturing towns of Lancashire and Yorkshire, comprising a population of from 700,000 to 800,000 persons. Fleetwood has no population in itself, and its locality does not contain more than 16,000 or 17,000 individuals. In the year 1826, Fleetwood was under the port of Preston. The port of Preston has since been placed under the port of Fleetwood; and the evil which has been occasioned by the removal has been very seriously felt in the former place. With respect to the convenience of the port of Fleetwood, I do not mean to say that it is not a good port when vessels are in it, — that is to say, it is a good harbour of refuge; — but it is not one which will supersede the trade and commerce of Preston, — to which place vessels of 300 tons burden are enabled to proceed. The merchants of Preston are a very considerable body; and to show the importance of the trade of that port, I may state that the duties payable there amount to no less a sum than 200,000*l.* per annum. The only wish of the inhabitants of Preston is, that it should be an independent port, and not continue under the control of the port of Fleetwood. I have presented three memorials on the subject, praying for relief, — one from the merchants of Preston, a second from the corporation of that place, and a third from the Ribble Navigation Company, — but they have not had the desired effect. I therefore beg to move for the papers which I have mentioned, in order that the whole of the correspondence which has taken place on this subject may be laid before the public.

SIR HESKETH FLEETWOOD. — I feel particularly obliged to my Honourable Colleague for bringing this subject before the House, because I am anxious that the documents which he has asked for should be produced, in order that the whole of the circumstances may be laid before the public. My wish has been to benefit the town of Preston, which I have the honour to represent; and as this ques-question has caused considerable agitation there, I am very desirous that a full investigation should take place. I have therefore great pleasure in seconding the motion.

On the question being put, —

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said: — Sir, if the Honourable Gentleman who has brought forward the present motion had communicated to me his intention of going fully into the case, I might have been prepared to reply to some of the statements which he has made. Of course, I cannot now undertake to do so. I can only say that the Honourable Member is quite welcome to the documents for which he has moved.

Motion agreed to. Returns ordered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I rise, Sir, to move that no new business, which shall be objected to by five Members, be brought on after twelve o'clock at night. It seems to me so reasonable and just that our debates should not be prolonged beyond that hour, that I will not trespass on the attention of the House by urging any arguments in favour of the motion. It frequently happens that Bills are brought in at a very late hour, in the absence of those who are most anxious to take part in their discussion, and it is not until they see the "Votes" next morning that they are aware of what has taken place. I think that it would be a great convenience to Honourable Members, and that it would also facilitate the public business, if we were to determine not to commence any fresh business after the time I have mentioned. I believe this is the only assembly in the world which transacts its business by night. When the question of privilege was under discussion, some Honourable Members stated that it was of great importance that the public should be made acquainted with what passes in the House; but when discussions are continued to a late hour, we might as well debate with closed doors for anything the public know about the matter the next morning. I therefore maintain that, even on that ground, it would be very advantageous to lay down the rule which I now propose.

Mr. EWART. — I beg to second the motion of the Honourable Member for Salford, because I am quite convinced that the real economy of time is to begin early. I will venture to say that a great portion of the time of the House is not spent in active or useful exertion, but devoted to slumbering on the benches. It has been urged, in opposition to a motion of this kind, that many Honourable Members are unable to attend during the day, and that we should be deprived of their services if we were to depart from the custom which now prevails. Now, Sir, I cannot see any reason why those Members who are willing to devote themselves exclusively to the business of the House should be made subservient to those who come here merely to perform supplementary duties. Why should the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, the Honourable Member for Bridport, or the Honourable Member for Salford be considered subordinate to the merchants, who make the business of the House merely a supplementary part of their duty? In my opinion, the wishes of those Members ought to be consulted who make the public business their primary object, rather than the wishes of those who, in reality, are the worst Members of the House, by making their legislative subordinate to their other duties. Every intelligent foreigner is surprised at the manner in which our business is conducted. I wish to see a complete reform in this respect; — I wish to see a return to the custom of our ancestors, who discharged their duties, by day, in a far better manner than ours are now performed, by night. A complete recurrence to the old system is, perhaps, impossible in the present constitution of the House; but, as I am anxious to advocate every measure which is an approximation to a sounder system, I shall give the motion proposed by the Honourable Member for Salford my warmest support.

On the question being put, —

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said:—Sir, it does not seem to me to be necessary to pass any resolution on this subject. Where five Members object seriously to any business after midnight, it is evident that no motion can proceed. But, in a case of great importance, I think it would be unwise to give five Members such a controlling power. I cannot agree with the Honourable Gentleman who seconded the motion. I think there is no prudence in saying that persons, having other occupations, may be absent from the House, and that, in that case, the business should be transacted by those Members, only, who are able to attend during the day. As to official persons, I believe that I devote as much time to the business of this House as I possibly can. With official and parliamentary business I have been occupied about twelve hours this very day; and if I were to attend here in the morning, I must do the official business in the evening. I cannot see that any advantage would be gained by the proposed change, whilst there would be this disadvantage, — that you would lose the assistance of those Gentlemen whose duty it is to attend the courts of law, for you cannot prevent those courts from sitting during the day. On these grounds, therefore, I do not think it expedient to agree to the motion of the Honourable Gentleman.

SIR R. PEEL. — I think it unnecessary to enter into the discussion of any general question as to whether a great change ought to be made in the mode of conducting public business in this House. Some Honourable Members may think it better that the House should meet at ten o'clock in the morning; but I do not consider it requisite to embark upon that question, further than to suggest the extreme difficulty of so total a change. But I object to this motion on other grounds. It appears to give a sort of parliamentary sanction to commencing new business at half-past eleven; for, observe, the power of five Members to object does not commence until the clock has struck twelve; and what an extraordinary position we should be placed in by investing five Gentlemen with a power at twelve o'clock which they would not possess half an hour before. There is much business which I should object to commencing at half-past eleven. I might object to bringing on a motion of great importance at eleven; but all this must depend upon circumstances. If there were likely to be an adjournment of the debate, and the mover would have the opportunity of making a criminatory speech, without the possibility of an answer being given to it, I might object to proceed after half-past ten; therefore, I say, it is impossible to lay down any definite rule for the guidance of the House upon the subject. But now, assuming that the House sits till twelve, according to the present practice, if three or four Gentlemen persist in objecting to any further business, I defy a man to bring forward a motion, should the sense of the House be against him; and even suppose a small minority is overruled, are they without a remedy? Not at all; they can resort to that remedy which the forms of the House allow, — moving an adjournment. I have, further, a decided objection to giving to five Members any such power of controlling the majority. It is quite true that a single Member has the power of clearing the gallery; but, then, that is so, because the rule of the House is, — not to allow strangers to be present at all; and it is merely necessary for a Member to notice the fact of their presence in order to secure their exclusion. But to say that five men should be clothed with the absolute power of preventing the House from proceeding with any new business after a certain hour, would, in my opinion, only lead to cabals and conspiracies against the business of the House, which might have a very injurious effect. If the sense of the House be at any time in favour of commencing new business, is it right that five Members should have the power of controlling that decision? Upon these grounds I decidedly object to the motion of the Honourable Gentleman.

Mr. BROTHERTON.—Sir, the speech of the Right Honourable Baronet has only proved the reasonableness of my motion. Since the commencement of the Session, we have frequently sat very late, but that would not have been prevented by my motion, for it only applies to new business, to which I think five Members ought to have the power to object. No fixed debate of any importance would be stopped by my resolution.

The House divided: — Ayes 25, Noes 145; Majority 120.

PRINTED PAPERS.

SIR M. WOOD. — I wish to state to the House, that to-morrow morning, at eleven o'clock, the writ of inquiry, in the fresh action of "Stockdale v. Hansard," is to be signed and sealed by the officers of the Court of Queen's Bench. Now, if the House has the power to prevent this from being done, it ought to interfere before the sheriffs are again involved in the proceedings; and I call upon the House to consider the hardship of their situation. Already one of them has been nearly destroyed by the proceedings of the House.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

Honourable Gentlemen may smile, but it is no laughing matter; and I venture to say, that they would not laugh if they were in the same situation. The gentleman from whom I have received the information which I have communicated to the House, is very unwell, and he has gone into the country for the purpose of endeavouring to recruit his strength, which has been much enfeebled since his commitment, — so much so, that he was scarcely able to walk down to the water-side, as far as the indulgence of the Sergeant-at-Arms would allow him. I think the time has come when both those gentlemen ought to be liberated; but if the House is determined to continue the imprisonment of the gentleman who still remains in custody, let it not plunge the sheriffs into a fresh difficulty. The damages in the action now pending are laid at 30,000*l.*

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — No; 50,000*l.*

SIR M. WOOD. — Well, then, at 50,000*l.* To-morrow morning the writ of inquiry is to be signed and sealed; and if it should not be stopped by the House, surely you will not afterwards proceed against the sheriffs? With the view of stopping all further proceedings, I beg to move that Mr. Speaker be directed to order William Prevost and Thomas Chambre not to sign any writ of inquiry in the cause now pending of " Stockdale v. Hansard;" and that J. Punlott be directed not to seal the writ of inquiry in the said cause of "Stockdale v. Hansard."

Mr. HUME.—I beg to second the motion.

Question put.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I doubt how far this can be considered a question of privilege. I consider this an assumption of power on the part of the House, for which no precedent can be found. Under these circumstances, Sir, I wish you to favour the House with your opinion, whether this be a case of privilege, which ought to interrupt the other business on the paper, or whether it is not a motion of which notice ought to have been given?

The SPEAKER. — The motion has already been made and seconded.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I doubt whether the motion can be made in the form in which it stands at present. I do not think that the House has the power to prevent these persons from signing and sealing the writ of inquiry; but the House has the power of saying that it will consider the signing and sealing of the writ a breach of privilege, and of sending a resolution to that effect to the officers intrusted with that duty. I agree with the worthy Alderman, that it is desirable to take every step we can to stop the action, before the sheriffs are again involved in it. It is quite clear that Mr. Howard, as he is in Newgate, cannot carry on this action himself; but we have it in evidence that a clerk of his, of the name of Pearce, is carrying it on in his master's name. Now, if the House had the power to commit Howard to Newgate, they have also the power to commit Pearce, in case he persists, like his master, in setting our privileges at defiance.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.—Sir, the motion of the Honourable Baronet is of very great importance, and I wish that he had given notice of his intention to bring it forward. I will not presume to say that a matter of privilege may not be brought forward without notice; but I am bound to offer my opinion, that, in the present state of affairs, it is not expedient to agree to the motion. My colleague and myself have considered whether such a step might not be taken, but we are not yet prepared to recommend it to the House. Under these circumstances, I do not wish to enter further into the question, or to draw any contrast between the situation of the sheriffs and of these officers of the court; it would be easy to point out distinctions which might, perhaps, be relied on as a justification for taking a different course towards each, but I hope that the House will excuse me if I content myself with now moving the previous question.

Question,—"That that question be now put."

Mr. HUME. — Sir, it appears to me that when the House is informed that a writ of inquiry will be issued to-morrow, we ought, if we mean to protect our privileges, to stop every individual from proceeding. When we committed Mr. Stockdale and his attorney, we thought we should stop the action; but another individual has now come forward. If we wish to stop the proceedings, I do not think that we can do better than direct the officers not to sign and seal the writ. If we do not interfere with them, process after process will issue. I cannot see why the Attorney General should object to the resolution proposed by the worthy Baronet, which I believe would be obeyed. I have been informed that, if the Speaker had forwarded the order of the House in an official manner to the sheriffs in the first instance, they would have obeyed it; as it was, they only received a paper from Mr. Joseph Parkes, which they considered they had no right to obey. I believe that the best course would be, to pass a resolution declaring every person to be guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House who shall, in any manner, aid in the execution of any process against the House. Let such resolution be communicated to the officers of the court, and then let them proceed at their peril.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Sir, if it be correct that the sheriffs would have obeyed the former order of the House on its being communicated to them by the Speaker, I think we might save ourselves any further trouble by taking that step in the action now pending. According to the Honourable Member, all that is necessary to be done is, for the Speaker to communicate to the sheriffs the order of the House.

Mr. HUME. — The Honourable Member must have misunderstood me. I spoke of what probably would have taken place then, and not of what may be done now.

Mr. J. JONES.—Sir, if the Honourable Member for Kilkenny believes that the sheriffs received a notice which they were not bound to obey, it seems rather strange that he should have voted for their committal. At all events, after the opinion which the Honourable Member has now expressed, I congratulate those who are opposed to him on the probability of obtaining his vote for the discharge of the gentleman who still remains in confinement. If the Honourable Baronet presses this motion, he ought, first, to show that, if the parties do not sign and seal the writ of inquiry, they will be indemnified for not doing what the law requires them to do.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord what objection there can be to allowing the sheriff who is now in custody to be liberated, if he will pledge his honour to be forthcoming whenever he may be called on? In that case, he will still be a prisoner.

The gallery was cleared, but no division took place.

Mr. F. KELLY. —It is impossible for me to support the motion of the Honourable Baronet; but, at the same time, I feel bound to observe, that I do not see how Honourable Members on the other side can oppose it, consistently with the course they have hitherto taken. The principle has been recognised over and over again by the majority, that if an officer is about to take proceedings which amount to a breach of privilege, he ought to be served with a notice, that if he persist in executing what he believes to be his duty, he will be considered guilty of a breach of privilege; and the sheriffs were committed for disregarding such notice. I cannot, therefore, but feel that the motion of the Honourable Baronet is entitled to more consideration than it has received from those who advocated the former course of proceeding, because it is a direct appeal to the majority of the House, to say—whether they will not give a fair warning to certain officers who, to-morrow morning, will be called on to do an act, for doing which they may, to-morrow evening, be voted guilty of a breach of privilege and consigned to imprisonment.

The previous question, "That that question be now put," was put, and negatived.

COLONIAL PASSENGERS BILL.

Mr. VERNON SMITH. — Sir, I beg to move the second reading of the Colonial Passengers Bill. My Noble Friend (Lord John Russell), on a former evening, made a declaration of the intentions of the Government with regard to the limitation of emigration from Calcutta to the Mauritius. On a subsequent evening, the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke asked whether it was intended to bring in an Act for that purpose. We think that everything necessary for the regulation of such emigration may be introduced into the present Act, and therefore it is the intention of my Noble Friend to bring in clauses for that purpose. I therefore propose not to commit the Bill until Friday fortnight, in order to give a full opportunity for considering the subject.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — The arrangement now proposed by the Honourable Gentleman is perfectly satisfactory to me. All I desire is, that an opportunity should be given for taking the sense of the House on the order sent to India, prohibiting the emigration of Hill Coolies from that country to the Mauritius.

Mr. HUME.—I wish, Sir, to ask whether the Honourable Gentleman has any objection to lay on the table the documents containing the representations to which the Noble Lord referred on a former night, and on which that Noble Lord was induced to alter his previous opinion?

Mr. V. SMITH. — Sir, if the Honourable Member will refer to the Votes of the House, he will see that I moved for the Report of the Governor of the Mauritius, and several other documents, which will be laid on the table.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday, the 28th of February.

TRANSFER OF AIDS BILL.

Reported; to be read a third time this day.

VAGRANTS' REMOVAL BILL.

Committee deferred from Monday, the 17th of February, till Friday, the 21st of February.

RETURN.

Opium Trade.—On the motion of Sir H. Verney, Copy ordered—

FIERS' NATURALISATION.

Reported, without amendment, and Bill to be ingrossed.

PAPER.

Papers relative to the temporary occupation, by the French Government, of "King's Islet," in the Port of Mahon (1837—1839).—Delivered (by command), and ordered to lie on the table.

Account of the quantity and value of opium, woollens, cotton goods, and other articles, imported into Canton by the East India Company and private traders respectively, in each year from 1820, inclusive, to the latest time to which the same can be made out: Also,

Account of the quantity and value of tea, and of all other articles, and of treasures, exported from Canton by the East India Company and private traders, during the years above mentioned: Also,

Account of all bills drawn upon India and London by the Select Committee at Canton, in each of the above years: Also,

Account of the quantity of opium sold by the India Government, and of the quantity permitted to pass through the British territories in India, in each of the above years: Also,

Account of the net receipt from the sale of opium, and from passes granted for the transit of opium through the British territories in India, in each of the above years (the costs and charges being deducted): And, also,

Account of the exports and imports of foreign nations at the port of Canton, in each of the above years; distinguishing woollen, cotton goods, tea, treasure, and bills, and all other articles, as far as the same can be made out.

Ordered to be laid before the House.

CHURCH RATES.

Petition, praying for release of John Thorogood from Chelmsford Gaol, and for the abolition of church rates, and of the criminal jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, — of inhabitants of Beaminster.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.

Petition for inquiry concerning the regulation of their trade, — of persons representing their respective fire offices in the city of London.

EAST INDIA COMPANY.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I will take the opportunity which the present occasion affords me, of presenting to your Lordships a petition of the greatest importance, not only in consideration of the body from whom it comes, but also in consideration of the vast population to whose interests it relates. Not being prepared to originate any motion, or to express any opinion of my own, or any opinion on the part of the Government, respecting the many subjects this petition embraces, I shall confine myself to the duty of stating distinctly the substance of it to your Lordships. The petitioners are the directors of the East India Company, who, in pursuance, as they state, of the duty which they have always felt to be incumbent upon them, of promoting the interests of that population, now increased to so many millions, which is confided to their care, have thought it expedient, solemnly and distinctly, to call the attention of the Legislature of this country to the complaints existing respecting the commercial disabilities affecting those interests. Without giving any opinion as to any practical measures that might be applied to these complaints and representations, I am sure that I do no more than express, not only the feelings of the Government, but those of your Lordships, when I say, that we are at all times prepared, as far as policy and circumstances will admit, to encourage the industry of the natives of India. It is represented by the petitioners, that, although some measures have recently been taken to encourage the India trade, those measures are still, in many respects, essentially deficient, and that the India population is still deprived of the benefit which, as composing an important part of the dominions of this country, it is entitled to, being a peaceful, a loyal, an attached, and an industrious community, under the British monarchy. The first point adverted to by the petitioners is, that of the duty on sugar. They state that, although it is true that Bengal sugar is now admitted into the British possessions upon the payment of a duty equal to that paid upon West India and American sugar, yet, with respect to all the other presidencies, that measure is accompanied with so many restrictions, that their sugars are not, in fact, admitted for British consumption upon equal terms. With regard to many other commodities, the same restrictions continue to exist. They state that this circumstance is a consequence of the legal ambiguity of the term "Her Majesty's dominions," and the term "British possessions." A great many portions of the Indian empire, which deserve to be included in the facilities afforded to Indian commerce, and more especially the Mysore country, are thus deprived of that facility and encouragement. The petitioners therefore pray your Lordships to give a more extended, and, in some respects, a more definite and precise, interpretation to the term "British possessions."

Another point to which they refer is, the extent to which Indian manufactures have been extinguished by the importation of English manufactured goods. They think it is but reasonable that, if the products of English industry are admitted free of duty in India,—so Indian produce should be admitted free of duty for British consumption; or at least upon terms on a par with those applied to the produce of other parts of the British dominions. With regard to the duty on spirits, there is a greater difference between the produce of India and of the West Indies than perhaps in any other commodity; in the one case the duty being 3*s*., and in the other, I believe, 8*s*. or 9*s*. They pray that that difference may be removed, and that in this respect, also, there should be no distinction between Bengal and the other presidencies. They further state the injurious operation of the navigation laws, as affecting the population of India; and they pray that the laws may be revised with regard to the employment of native Indians in British commerce. They next advert to the large extension of the growth of tea in Assam, which holds out expectations that Assam will be able to furnish a large proportion of the supply of that article to Britain. They therefore appeal to your Lordships to consider, as that supply increases, whether it would not be fit to encourage its cultivation by a discriminatory duty on tea, the produce of British territories. These are the different topics dwelt on in the petition, all involving very important interests, and which cannot be approached without grave consideration. At the same time, I am convinced that, if your Lordships are not prepared to entertain any measure having for its object the giving immediate relief to the petitioners on the points alluded to, you will have no hesitation in assenting to the general policy of promoting, whenever you have the means of doing so with safety, the growth of the produce, manufactures, and industry of the immense mass of the industrious and loyal population of India; and that, while we have succeeded in civilising them for the purposes of war, by disciplining them and making them its effective instruments as good soldiers, we shall not be less able or willing to improve them in the arts of peace, and to assist in the development of that industry which no persons who have recently made themselves acquainted with the state of the country, and the improvement of its population, can doubt that they are capable of attaining, in the progress of time, under the fostering care of a paternal Government. I therefore hope the petition will meet the consideration of your Lordships; and as I shall not have another opportunity of bringing the subject before you, I beg that this petition may be read by the clerk.

Petition read accordingly.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I was not aware of the intention of the Noble Marquess to present that petition to-night; and, although I yesterday saw the petition in the newspapers, yet, not having been previously acquainted with it, I have not had an opportunity of giving that consideration to its subject-matter which I should be desirous of doing, before I express an opinion upon the many important topics it involves. I think it must be matter of disappointment to the petitioners, the Noble Marquess having undertaken to present the petition, that he should not have been able to broach any opinion whatever with respect to the expediency or inexpediency of complying with any one portion of its prayer. I must say, from the cursory view I have been able to take of the matter, that there appears to be a very great deal of reason in many of the complaints, and many of the demands made by the petitioners. It does seem to be a very great grievance that, at Ceylon, the cotton goods of Great Britain should be charged with a duty of 5 per cent. only, while those of India should be charged with duties varying from 10 to 20 per cent. In one point of view, however, the Indian Government have the remedy in their own hands; and, if the Imperial Parliament will not act with generosity and liberality towards India, as the Indian Government has acted with regard to British commodities imported into that country, it must be expected that that Government will act in obedience to their first duty, which is that of consulting the benefit of the people of India. If it should be found that the Imperial Parliament will not act with reciprocity towards India, the consequence will be, that the duty on British goods imported into India will be increased. While a duty of only 3½ per cent. is now imposed upon British silks imported into India, in no case is the duty on cotton goods of India, brought to an English port, less than 10 per cent.; while, on India silk piece goods the inequality is still greater, they being subjected to a duty of 20 per cent. I am willing to go a great deal further than the Noble Marquess. The Noble Marquess has said that he is prepared to do all that policy and circumstances will permit. I am ready to do all that policy and circumstances can demand. It appears to me that there is no higher duty your Lordships have to perform than that of protecting the interests of the people of India. They have no representatives of their own in the British Parliament; the Reform Bill has deprived them of that benefit. They are entirely at the mercy of the Parliament of this country, and therefore they have the highest claims upon your Lordships, and are as much entitled to the paternal cares and regard of Parliament as any portion of the people within the dominions of the Crown. I think it is really a matter of consideration whether a petition of this importance should not be referred to a Committee, for the purpose of investigating, in order to ascertain how far it might be expedient to comply with, its prayer.

Ordered to lie on the table.

ADDRESS OF CONGRATULATION TO HER MAJESTY.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — My Lords, as I am sure there will be but one feeling on the subject of the motion of which I have given notice for this evening, I shall, without further observation, move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to congratulate Her Majesty on the auspicious occasion of Her Majesty's marriage; and to assure Her Majesty of the great satisfaction which this House feels at an event which affords a fresh instance of Her Majesty's regard for the interests of her people, and of so much importance to Her Majesty's domestic happiness, and to the welfare of the country.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — Notwithstanding the certainty which the Noble Viscount has expressed, that this motion will meet with the unanimous assent of your Lordships, I am unwilling to permit this occasion to pass without giving expression to the feelings of sincere satisfaction that are felt by Noble Lords on this side of the House. I cannot help saying that the circumstances under which this connection has been formed, are most fortunate. It is very fortunate that persons in the exalted situation of Her Majesty, should be enabled to gratify those emotions of the heart, and to act under those influences, which Providence generally reserves for persons in less exalted stations of life. Upon this occasion I cannot but consider that the event has been most auspicious, and we have only to pray that the issue may be equally prosperous. It would be unpardonable in me to enlarge upon a subject on which there can be no difference of opinion; I therefore will content myself with declaring that I most cordially give my support to the motion of the Noble Viscount.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — It is not my intention to trespass long on the attention of your Lordships; but whatever appellation may be given to me by the Noble Viscount, or other Noble Lords opposite, whether that of a decided Carlist, or of any other sect, I believe there is no individual subject of the realm more anxious than myself that this auspicious event should carry with it every possible happiness to our illustrious Sovereign, and be of the greatest advantage to the country. I have offered myself to your Lordships' notice, from a circumstance connected with the illustrious Prince, now, happily for himself, and happily, I hope, for the country, united with Her Majesty. It is a circumstance which, if we can judge of the child from the sire, is one of most propitious promise. I had the honour, many years ago, when I was ambassador at Vienna, to be intimately acquainted with the illustrious father of the Prince; and I can fairly say, that among the great personages there assembled, at that time, there was not an individual of higher principles, higher character, or greater worth than his Serene Highness; and I will venture to hope, that the illustrious Prince who has been united to Her Majesty inherits all those eminent qualities which so greatly distinguished his father, whom we have the happiness to see in this country on the present auspicious occasion. I hope, also, that the Noble Viscount will give the whole House the satisfaction, on this occasion, of carrying up the Address to Her Majesty. On a former occasion, many Noble Lords were disappointed that they had not had notice, and were thus prevented from attending. It is true that on that occasion there were other points introduced, but it so happened that only about half a dozen Noble Lords went up with the Address. I hope that on the present occasion the Noble Viscount will do us justice, and allow the whole body of the House to go up, and that the Noble Viscount will give us fair notice of the time of meeting, and time of departure. I cannot forget, that the last time the whole House went up to the Throne, it was on an equally important occasion, that of upholding the Altar; and I do not think your Lordships will be less anxious to express your congratulations in support of the Throne.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I believe that on the occasion to which the Noble Marquess refers, the usual notice was given. The motion was printed in the Votes, and that is all the notice that is ever given on such occasions, and all that can be required. The same course will be pursued on the present occasion.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I can only say that many Noble Lords did not see the Votes upon that occasion until after the Address had been presented.

LORD KENYON.—Although the usual notice was given upon the occasion alluded to, still I think it is advisable, in the present instance, that we should be informed of the precise time at which the Address is to be presented, as I am sure that all Noble Lords will be anxious to attend.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I cannot say, until Her Majesty appoints a day when the Address will be received. I suppose it will be on Monday or Tuesday.

LORD KENYON.—As the House will not meet to-morrow, the day which Her Majesty may appoint cannot be notified before Monday.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Tuesday, then.

Address agreed to, nemine dissentiente, and the same was ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the whole House; and the Lords with white staves were ordered to wait on Her Majesty, to know when he would be pleased to appoint to be attended therewith.

MESSAGE TO PRINCE ALBERT.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I have now, my Lords, to move, that a message be sent to his Royal Highness Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, to congratulate His Royal Highness upon his marriage, and to express the joy and satisfaction which this House feels upon seeing the ardent wishes of a faithful people fulfilled by Her Majesty's wise and happy choice, and by her union to a Prince distinguished by a descent so illustrious, and by a character formed to support and adorn his exalted station.

Agreed to, nemine dissentiente, and the Lord President, the Marquess of Anglesey, and the Earl of Ripon were ordered to attend his Royal Highness with the said message.

MESSAGE TO THE DUCHESS OF KENT.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I have, my Lords, another motion to make, of which, I believe, there is no example. Nevertheless, I apprehend that when I state what it is, there will be no difference of opinion amongst your Lordships respecting it. The only blame I can impute to myself, in this case, is, for not having before thought of the propriety of such a step on the part of this House, and given notice of it. Considering the proximate relationship between the Royal parties, I now move your Lordships, that a message be sent to Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, to congratulate Her Royal Highness upon the marriage of Her Majesty — an event so deeply interesting to the paternal feelings of Her Royal Highness, and so conducive to the happiness of Her Majesty; and that the Lord President, the Marquess of Anglesey, and the Earl of Ripon, do attend Her Royal Highness with the said message."

PRISONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

PRINTED PAPERS.

Mr. H. T. Hope, Lord George Bentinck, and Mr. Alderman Thompson, presented petitions for liberation of the Sheriff of Middlesex, — from Gloucester City; King's Lynn; and, gentlemen who have served the office of Sheriff of Middlesex. — Ordered to lie on the table.

On presenting the petition from King's Lynn,—

LORD GEORGE BENTINCK said: — These petitioners pray that the sheriff may be discharged forthwith from custody, and that Her Majesty's subjects may be protected from the dangerous consequences of general warrants. I will merely add, Sir, that in the sentiments of the petitioners I fully concur.

Mr. ALDERMAN THOMPSON. — This, Sir, is a petition from fifteen gentlemen who have served the office of sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and who now pray your Honourable House for the release of the sheriff still retained in custody. The petitioners state that the incarceration of the sheriff is productive of great expense and inconvenience to the public, and that they fear, if it be continued, efficient and responsible persons may be deterred, hereafter, from accepting the office of sheriff.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were severally presented, and ordered to lie on the table; namely, —

Newport Riots, —By Mr. Leader, Mr. W. Williams, Mr. Hume, Mr. Godson, and Mr. Thomas Duncombe, praying for a free pardon of Frost, Williams, and Jones, — from Kidderminster; Ringmer; David Gilmore and others; Lewes; Chorley; Cheltenham; Birmingham; Shoreham; and, St. Pancras.

Printed Papers,—By Mr. Wynn Ellis, — of the mayor, aldermen, and town councillors of Leicester, praying that the House will in no way relax in their efforts to maintain their privileges.

Church of England, — By Mr. Pryme, Mr. Packe, Mr. W. Williams, Mr. Patten Egerton, Sir Edward Knatchbull, Mr. William Miles, Sir Robert Inglis, Mr. Robert Palmer, Mr. Packington, Mr. Abel Smith, and other Honourable Members, praying for extension thereof, and for the diffusion of religious instruction, — from Llandegfeth; Hinckley; Windlesham; Mynyddysllwyn; Llanvihangel Ponty Moil; Hackington; Cornwood; Kenilworth; Otley; Gayton; Heytesbury; Stourton; Bickenhill; Chilmark; Inwardleigh; Cottenham; Stratford-under-the-Castle of Old Sarum; Sturry; Tinkleton; Long Newnton; Tavistock; Shinefield; Knaresborough; Frome Deanery; Abbots Leigh; Marthal and Ollerton; Emberton; Bowdon; Cleave Prior; Stoulton; Crundale; Wendover; and Cambridge.

LORD STANLEY, on presenting the petition from Sturry, said: — This petition is signed by forty-one clergymen, all officiating within a single parish in Lancashire, the population of which is no less than 98,433. Petitioners state, that in 1831 the parish possessed church-room for only 15,000, being in the proportion of less than 1 to 6, and that in some of the townships of which the parish is composed, having 4000 and even 6000 inhabitants, there are neither churches nor schools; but that since that time additional church-room, to the extent of 10,000 persons, has been provided by the inhabitants themselves, at an expense of 47,000*l.* They pray that the Legislature will be pleased to provide increased means of religious instruction.

Mr. HUME. — Will the Noble Lord allow me just to inquire how many Dissenters there are in that parish?

LORD STANLEY. — Really, Sir, it is impossible — and, perhaps, on reflection, the Honourable Gentleman will perceive that it so — that I should be able to tell him how many members of one particular religious profession, or another, there may be in a parish containing more than 98,000 inhabitants.

Mr. MANNERS SUTTON. — In reference to the petition which has been presented by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Cambridge town (Mr. Pryme), I am desirous of saying that I most heartily concur in its prayer.

Church Patronage (Scotland), — By Mr. Fox Maule and other Honourable Members, for the amendment of the law thereon, and for the prevention of the intrusion of unacceptable ministers, — from Airth; Stirling Presbytery (moderator); Lauder Presbytery (moderator); Girthon; Reay; Torphichen; Collace; Marnoch; Inveravon; and Lochlee.

Church Rates, — for abolition thereof, — from Salford (two petitions); Chesham; Trevithin; Bradford; Witham; South Petherton; Beaminster; Redenhall cum Harleston; Tunstall; Fenton; Hanley; Burslem,; and Longton and Lane End.

Ecclesiastical Courts, — By Mr. Brotherton, Mr. A. Sanford, Mr. Hawes, Mr. Baines, Mr. Ewart, Mr. T. Duncombe, and other Honourable Members, for their abolition, and for the release of Mr. John Thorogood from his present confinement, — from Shelton; Tunstall; Fenton; Burslem, &c.; and Longton and Lane End.

Elective Franchise (Ireland), &c., — By Mr. Bridgeman, The O'Conor Don, Mr. John O'Connell, Mr. Villiers Stuart, and Mr. Redington, for extension of the franchise and municipal reform, — from Kilmacduagh, &c.; Maheracloone; Magherafelt; Roscommon; Ringogona Termonmaguik; and St. Mary's Wicklow.

County Courts, — By Mr. Pryme, — from Cambridge, in favour of a measure similar to the Bill of last Session.

Poor Law Act, — By Mr. Law Hodges, — from Horsmonden, for amendment.

Socialism, — By Mr. Hawes, — of Margaret Chappellsmith, for inquiry into the principles aud objects of Socialism.

Maynooth College, — By Sir Robert H. Inglis, against further grant, — from Bowdon and Glastonbury.

Universal Suffrage, &c., — Of John Wallace Wilson, in favour.

Corn Laws, — By Sir George Strickland, for repeal, — from Queen's Head; and Portsmouth.

Designs Copyright Bill, — By Lord Stanley, — of Hargreaves, Dugdale, and and Co., Manchester, in favour.

SALE OF BEER ACT.

On presenting a petition from Clutton union, for amendment thereof, —

Mr. WILLIAM MILES said: — This petition comes from a district containing 22,000 souls; and the petitioners are exceedingly anxious that measures should be taken to secure a strict superintendence over the beer shops of the vicinity, on the part of the local constabulary.

PRIVATE BILL COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. — It is now proper that the House should proceed to the Order of the Day on the resolutions touching the mode of conducting the private business.

The following resolutions were then read from the table, and severally agreed to: —

1. Resolved, that a Committee of Selection be appointed, consisting of the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, and of the Chairmen of the Committee of the three Sub-Committees on Petitions for Private Bills, and of whom three shall be the quorum; and that the said Committee of Selection do report from time to time to the House with respect to the proceedings on Private Bills.

2. Resolved, That no Member, whose name shall be on the list prepared under the direction of Mr. Speaker, shall be entitled to attend or vote unless he shall have previously made a declaration of his willingness to serve on the Committee on the Bill referred to the list to which he belongs.

3. Resolved, That any Member who is not included in such list shall be at liberty to make special application to the Committee of Selection, alleging that his constituents have a local interest in any Private Bill in progress, such Member making declaration of his willingness to serve on the Committee; and the Committee shall have power to add the name of such Member to the list, if the reality of such interest shall be established to their satisfaction.

4. Resolved, That the Committee of Selection shall select and add to the list such number of Members not locally interested in the Bill in progress, and in such proportion, as in the circumstances of each case shall in their judgment be necessary; such Members making declaration of their willingness to serve on the Committee.

5. Resolved, That the following shall be the several forms of declaration which every Member shall sign before he shall be entitled to attend or vote on any Committee on any Private Bill.

"No. 1. — Declaration of a Member whose name is on the list prepared under the direction of Mr. Speaker for . . . . .

"The undersigned, being one of the Members whose name is on the list prepared under the direction of Mr. Speaker, to which list the Bill for . . . . . has been committed, hereby declares, that he is willing to serve on such Committee, and that he will never vote on any question which may arise without having duly heard and attended to the evidence relating thereto.

"Memorandum. — The declaration, signed as aforesaid, must be delivered to the clerk of the Committee on the Bill before the Committee shall proceed to appoint a chairman, otherwise the Member signing the same shall not be entitled to attend or vote."

"No. 2. — The declaration of a Member whose name has been added to the list prepared under the direction of Mr. Speaker by the Committee of Selection, his constituents having a local interest in the Bill for . . .

"The undersigned, not being one of the Members whose name is on the list prepared under the direction of Mr. Speaker, to which list the Bill for . . . . has been committed, hereby declares, that his constituents have a local interest in such Bill, and that, in consequence thereof, he has applied to the Committee of Selection, and his name has been added to the list. He further declares, that he is willing to serve on such Committee, and he will never vote on any question which may arise without having duly heard and attended to the evidence relating thereto.

"Memorandum. — The declaration, signed as aforesaid, must be delivered to the clerk of the Committee on the Bill before the Committee shall proceed to appoint a chairman, otherwise the Member signing the same shall not be entitled to attend or vote."

"No. 3. — The declaration of a Member whose name has been added to the list prepared under the direction of Mr. Speaker by the Committee of Selection, his constituents having no local interest in the Bill for . . .

"The undersigned, being one of the Members selected and added to the list by the Committee of Selection, to which list the Bill for . . . . has been committed, hereby declares, that his constituents have no local interest, and that he has no personal interest in such Bill; and that he is willing to serve on such Committee; and that he will never vote on any question which may arise without having duly heard and attended to the evidence relating thereto.

"Memorandum. — The declaration, signed as aforesaid, must be delivered to the clerk of the Committee on the Bill, before the Committee shall proceed to appoint a chairman, otherwise the Member signing the same shall not be entitled to attend or vote."

6. Resolved, That as soon as possible after the sitting of the Committee of Selection, at which the name of any Member shall have been added to any list prepared under the direction of Mr. Speaker, the clerk attending the Committee of Selection shall give notice to each such Member of his name having been so added, and of the time when the Committee on the Bill shall have been appointed to meet.

7. Resolved, That the Committee Clerk shall furnish to each Member appointed to serve on a Committee on a Private Bill, who shall apply for the same, a form of one of the above declarations, according to the class of which the Member may belong; and that such application shall be made to the Committee Clerk, either in the Committee Clerk's office, previous to the time when the Committee shall have been appointed to meet, or in the committee room, previous to the door thereof being locked, as hereinafter directed.

8. Resolved, That the Committee of Selection shall in each case direct what number of the Members (not locally interested in the Bill) selected and added to the list by them, shall be a quorum of such Members.

9. Resolved, That so soon after the expiration of half an hour, and not sooner, after the time appointed for the first sitting of a Committee on a Private Bill, as there shall be present at least five Members appointed and duly qualified to serve on such Committee (including a quorum of selected Members), the clerk of such Committee shall give notice that a sufficient number of Members to proceed to business is present, and the clerk shall direct the messenger in attendance on the Committee to clear the room of all strangers, and to lock the door of the committee room; the Members shall then proceed to appoint a chairman; and that no Member shall be entitled to attend or vote on such Committee who shall not have duly delivered his declaration to the clerk previously to the time when the door shall have been so locked.

10. Resolved, That Members whose constituents have a local interest in any Private Bill, but who are not on the list to which such Bill shall have been referred, and who, in consequence, desire to be added to the Committee on the Bill, shall make especial application, either personally to the Committee of Selection, at any sitting of such Committee which shall be held prior to the day appointed for the meeting of the Committee on the Bill, or in writing, stating the nature of such interest, to be delivered at the Committee Clerks' office prior to such meeting of the Committee of Selection; and so soon as the Committee of Selection shall have decided to add the name of such Member to the list, the clerk shall notify the same in writing to the Member who shall have made the application.

11. Resolved, That no Committee on a Private Bill shall, without leave of the House, proceed to business, or continue their inquiry or deliberations, unless a quorum of selected Members shall be present; and that if at any time during the sitting of the said Committee a quorum of the selected Members shall not be present, the chairman of the Commiteee shall suspend the proceedings of such Committee until such quorum shall be present; and that if, at the expiration of one hour from the time fixed for the meeting of the Committe, or from the time when the chairman shall so have suspended the proceedings of such Committee, a quorum of the selected Members shall not be present, the chairman shall adjourn the Committee until twelve of the clock of the day on which the House shall next meet, and report forthwith to the House the circumstances of the case.

12. Resolved, That if at any time after the Committee on a Bill shall have been formed, a quorum of Members required by the Standing Orders, or by the foregoing Resolutions, cannot attend, in consequence of any of the Members who shall have duly qualified to serve on such Committee having become incompetent to continue such service by having been placed on an Election Committee, or by death, or otherwise, the chairman shall report the circumstances of the case to the House, in order that such measures may be taken by the House as shall enable the Members still remaining on the Committee to proceed with the business referred to such Committee, or as the exigency of the case may require.

COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

On the motion of Mr. GREENE, Standing Order No. 12, p. 34. read, and repealed.

Resolved, That no postponement of the first meeting of any Committee on a Private Bill shall take place unless notice be given in the Private Bill Office, and also in the Committee Clerk's Office, one clear day before the time fixed for such meeting; and such notices shall be given before six of the clock in the evening of any day on which the House shall sit, or two of the clock on any day on which the House shall not sit.

Ordered, That the said resolution be a Standing Order of this House.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Sixth Report brought up, and read.—To lie on the table, and to be printed.

PORTUGAL.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON presented a petition of British subjects, civil, naval, and military, claimants on the Government of Portugal, praying for the appointment of a Commission to investigate their claims for services rendered during the war of restoration.—To lie on the table, and to be printed.

On presenting the petition, the Noble Lord said:—To this petition are appended the signatures of more than 400 claimants, 40 of whom are officers. I take this opportunity to give notice, that, on Friday next, I shall move an Address to Her Majesty, founded on this petition.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act for naturalising Samuel Swain.

CASE OF FROST, &c.

Mr. LEADER.—I beg to renew my notice of a former evening, of a motion for an Address to the Queen, praying Her Majesty to be pleased, under the special circumstances of the case, to grant a free pardon to Frost, Williams, and Jones, and to defer it until Tuesday evening next, the 18th instant.

THE RAJAH OF SATTARAH.

Mr. HUME.—I rise to give notice that I will, on Monday next, the 17th instant, ask the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Control whether he has any objection to lay before the House the documents and despatches relating to the dethronement of the Rajah of Sattarah?

THE BANKING SYSTEM.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the question of which I have given notice, namely, — as to whether the Right Honourable Gentleman is prepared to bring forward any measure for the better regulation of the banking system, and on what day?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, I am not, at present, prepared to fix a day, but I will certainly do so next week.

GOVERNOR OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I wish to put a question to the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies. There has appeared, in the newspapers of the day, a document which professes to be a memorandum from Sir J. Harvey, the Governor of New Brunswick, giving advice to the borderers as to how they should conduct themselves in the event of a war between Great Britain and the United States. I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether this is to be considered in the light of an authentic document? I should be extremely sorry to suppose that any circumstances have occurred, since the last advices, to induce Sir John Harvey to consider himself called on to take such a step as to promulgate such a paper.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I can only say that I have not received, officially, any such document. Neither to-day nor yesterday have we received any accounts either from New Brunswick or Canada.

SIR R. PEEL. — Then I will ask the Noble Lord whether anything has recently occurred which renders it probable that any further communications will be made, on the part of Her Majesty, of papers or official documents, in reference to the discussions pending between this country and the United States on the subject of that colony?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government, at present, to lay any further papers on the table; but I will consider the request of the Right Honourable Gentleman, and will then communicate to him whether I find myself able to lay any documents on the table, or not. The Right Honourable Gentleman and the House must have seen the statements which appeared in the American papers, as to the correspondence that had taken place between Her Majesty's Minister at Washington and the Secretary of State for the United States. That correspondence has occupied some time, the first communication of Her Majesty's Minister at Washington having been dated so far back as the 12th of November. The correspondence is not, at present, terminated; and I do not think it would be wise to lay it upon the table.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, I have no wish to press for the production of any official documents. I have only been afraid that the document to which I refer might be authentic; and, if it have been really issued by Sir John Harvey, I do fear, when a public officer, holding so important a situation, gives advice to the borderers as to how they shall conduct themselves in the event of a war with the United States, that there must be considerable danger impending of that great calamity.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Thinking that, if that alarm be well grounded, communications must have taken place between the two Governments, I concluded that the Noble Lord might probably see reason to lay them before the House.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — We have really received no intelligence, which would justify the Government in producing the papers that I have just referred to. If the document which has appeared in the newspapers be genuine, some steps must have been taken in order to call for it, of which the Government is not yet aware.

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

SIR R. PEEL. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord, as the Noble Viscount the Secretary for Foreign Affairs is not in his place, when the papers which have been so long promised respecting the state of our relations with China will be produced. It does appear to me, seeing what is the state of the public mind, and considering the nature of the intelligence just received, that it is of the utmost importance to have before us whatever documents can be communicated to Parliament on this subject.

[Loud cries of "Hear!"]

Apart from other considerations, as the papers have been promised, I do trust that no time will be lost in communicating them to the public.

THE CANADAS.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I will now beg to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies whether it is the intention of Government to bring in any measure for the union of the two Canadas? and, if so, at what period it is likely to be brought forward? I want to know, also, whether all the Returns respecting the numbers of the various religious denominations in Upper Canada, part of which were sent home by Sir G. Arthur last year, are yet received, and whether the Noble Lord has any objection to lay them on the table? I am anxious, moreover, to ask the Noble Lord whether Sir G. Arthur has retired from the Government of Upper Canada, as I have observed a statement to that effect in a newspaper? and, if the statement be true, whether Sir G. Arthur has been superseded, or has resigned?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — With respect to the first question, I have already frequently stated that the Governor General of Her Majesty's North American Provinces had obtained the consent of the Council of Lower Canada to the union of the two provinces; and afterwards the consent of the Legislative Council and Assembly of Upper Canada to that measure. According to the last accounts which I have received, the Governor General was still, at the date of them, occupied with the details of a Bill for that purpose; the Chief Justice of Lower Canada was expected every day. The Governor General hoped to send home the draught of a Bill by the packet which would leave New York on the 1st of February. I have not yet, of course, received that Bill; but as soon as it shall have arrived, it will be taken into immediate consideration by Her Majesty's Government; and I expect that, in the course of next month, I shall be able to introduce a Bill for the union of these two great provinces. With respect to the next question of the Honourable Member, I have directed the papers relating to the religious denominations in Upper Canada to be prepared, in order that they may be laid before the House. I apprehend that there are still some wanting; but everything that has been received will be presented. The Returns are not yet entirely ready, and I much doubt whether any means could be used to make them more perfect at present. Sir G. Arthur will, however, lay before the Assembly the means he thinks best calculated for that purpose. As to the last question, I have not the least reason to suppose that Sir G. Arthur is about to relinquish the Government of Upper Canada. I have no information from that Governor intimating any desire to be relieved from the duties of his office; and with respect to any despatches sent from home, they have all been couched in terms of approbation of the prudence by which the conduct of the gallant general in Upper Canada has been marked. I cannot, therefore, have any doubt that there is no truth in the report alluded to by the Honourable Member.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I wish to know whether the additional Returns from all parts of the province have been received, and will be laid on the table?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — They have been received, and will be laid on the table.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I have now, Sir, with the permission of the House, to move an Address to Her Majesty on the occasion of Her Majesty's marriage. I am sure that no argument from me will be needed to induce the House to consent, most willingly and cheerfully, to such an Address. I am sure that this House will feel, as the country has felt, that this is an occasion not only interesting to Parliament, not only interesting to Her Majesty, from its connection with her domestic happiness, but of great importance to the future welfare of these kingdoms. And allow me, with regard to this subject, to observe, that it must be a source of the greatest satisfaction to the country, to think that Her Majesty has been more fortunate, with respect to Her Majesty's marriage, than many of those who have been placed in such an exalted station; because it has been too often the case that the necessity for political alliances has made it requisite to contract marriages entirely based on political considerations, and in which the affections of the heart have been in nowise concerned. It must be a matter of great satisfaction to the people of this country to know that they have not demanded any such sacrifice from their Sovereign; and that while the political interests of the country have been consulted, they have not been obliged to ask Her Majesty to contract marriage with any person other than one on whom the affections of her heart were voluntarily and most worthily placed. With these few words, I shall at once propose the Address to Her Majesty, at the same time expressing my most sincere prayer, that the union so lately formed may last for many years, and that the blessing of Almighty God may rest upon it. I move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to congratulate Her Majesty on the auspicious occasion of Her Majesty's marriage, and to assure Her Majesty of the cordial joy and satisfaction which this House feels at an event which is a fresh instance of Her Majesty's regard for the interests of her people, and of so much importance to Her Majesty's domestic happiness, and to the welfare of the country.

SIR R. PEEL. — I trust I may be permitted to perform the pleasing duty of seconding the motion proposed by the Noble Lord.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I feel that the ordinary phrases of congratulation are so trite, and so exhausted by repetition, that it will be more consistent with good taste, and I trust with sincerity, to express my feelings in a very few words. I beg, therefore, on my own part, and on that of the great party with which I have the honour to be connected, to express our most cordial congratulations to Her Majesty, and the sense of great satisfaction which we entertain that Her Majesty has been able to perform a public duty in such a manner as to reconcile its performance with the best feelings of her heart; and to join in the prayer offered by the Noble Lord, that not only the public happiness of the country, but the personal happiness and comfort of our Sovereign, may be insured by this union.

Motion put, and agreed to, nemine contradicente, and the Address ordered to be presented by the whole House; Privy Councillors humbly to know Her Majesty's pleasure when she will be attended.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I would suggest that the Noble Lord should fix a day on which the Address should be presented, in order that all Honourable Members may have an opportunity of being present at the time of its presentation.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Her Majesty's pleasure upon the subject shall be ascertained, and I will communicate Her Majesty's answer on Monday next. In the mean time, I beg to move that the Address be carried to Her Majesty by the whole House.

MESSAGE TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg, next, to move that after the Address shall have been presented to the Queen, a congratulatory Address be sent to his Royal Highness Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, to congratulate his Royal Highness upon his marriage, and to express the joy and satisfaction which this House feels upon seeing the ardent wishes of a faithful people fulfilled by Her Majesty's wise and happy choice, and by Her Majesty's union to a Prince distinguished by a descent so illustrious, and by a character formed to support and adorn his exalted station.

Mr. W. DUNCOMBE. — Perhaps the Noble Lord will allow me to take this opportunity of putting a question to him, upon a subject which has excited great interest, both in and out of this House. I desire to be informed whether it is intended that the name of His Royal Highness Prince Albert shall be inserted in the Liturgy?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I have no intimation to make to the House upon subject.

Motion put, and agreed to, nemine contradicente, and ordered, that Lord Seymour, Lord Ashley, Mr. Byng (of Middlesex), Sir George Clerk, and Sir William Somerville do attend his Royal Highness with the said Message.

ADDRESS TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF KENT.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, there is one other motion which I propose to make, of which I have given no notice, but it is for another congratulatory address, to which I think that the House will not object. I propose that a congratulatory message be sent to Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, to congratulate Her Royal Highness upon the marriage of Her Majesty; an event so deeply interesting to the maternal feelings of Her Royal Highness, and so conducive to the happiness of Her Majesty.

Resolution put, and agreed to, nemine contradicente.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL then moved that the message to Prince Albert should be carried up by Lord Seymour, Lord Ashley, Mr. Byng, Sir George Clerk, and Sir William Somerville; and that that to the Duchess of Kent should be carried up by the Earl of Lincoln, Mr. Villiers Stuart, Mr. Campbell, of Islay, Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, and Sir Matthew Wood.

The motions were carried.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I move the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill be now read a second time.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — I must enter my opposition to this measure, viewing it, as I do, in the light of a " heavy blow to Protestantism," and " a great discouragement" to all those interests which I think most essential to our national prosperity. I cannot allow such a measure to pass, without recording my conviction that it is totally unfit for the country for which it is intended. I am aware that many of my Honourable Friends have felt it to be their duty not to concur with me in my opposition to this Bill, by reason of a sort of honourable compact which is supposed to have been entered into on this subject. I was no party to that compact, and am not bound, therefore, by its terms. But even supposing that compact to be binding if observed by both parties, it is now at an end, for one of the parties to it has failed to fulfil his share in it; and it becomes, therefore, the duty of those who introduced that Bill, in pursuance of that compact, not to press it. The Honourable Member for Dublin has openly avowed his continued and determined hostility to the Irish Church. To be sure the Honourable Member is always very cautious in what he says in this House on the subject of the Church; but what he says out of the House is couched in a very different strain. I have not been inattentive to the sentiments expressed by the Honourable and Learned Member out of this House, and I certainly think the House ought to pause before they give to the Honourable Member such increased means of pursuing his hostility to the Church, as this measure, if agreed to, will place at his disposal. When the Honourable and Learned Member does not hesitate to declare that the creation of these municipal bodies will transfer to the Roman Catholics of Ireland that preponderance in the municipal administrations which is now possessed by the Protestants; and when, at one and the same time, the Honourable and Learned Member avows that he looks forward to an attack, and a successful one, on the external system of the Established Church in Ireland; I do think that those who value the Protestant connection, or the existence of the Protestant Church in Ireland, ought to pause before they give these new and extensive powers to the enemies of the establishment.

MR. O'CONNELL. — Hear, hear!

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — I am sure that I would not willingly misrepresent the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, but I think that, from his assenting cheer, I may rest convinced that he acknowledges the accuracy of my conclusions. It would be useless to enter into further details of this compact. If compact there has been, one party has broken faith, and by that means released the other. I would ask those Honourable Members who support this measure,—have reformed corporations proved such an unmixed good in this country, as to make their introduction into the sister kingdom a matter to be desired? If the corporations of Ireland have improperly exercised their functions, they are amenable to a court of law, and you have no more right to deprive them of those functions than you would have to deprive any individual corporator of his municipal rights. I know that this measure will be carried, — I know that it is in vain to resist, — but I also know that I should not be conscientiously performing my duty, did I not resist it by every means in my power. I therefore move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. LITTON. — I beg leave to second the motion. I thought it my duty to inform the Noble Lord opposite, on a late occasion, that if he would bring in a Bill truly to reform the corporations of Ireland, he should have my concurrence and support. I also thought it my duty to inform him, that, unless the Bill to be brought in by him was of the nature I had described, I should, even if I stood alone in the House, feel it my duty to oppose the second reading. I have never denied that the corporations of Ireland were in the hands of an exclusive party; but I protest against the Bill, because it goes to throw them, as completely, into the power of the other party. This is a most unjust Bill. I would be the last to object to a reform of the municipal corporations in Ireland; but this Bill is only an effort on the part of the Government to create a political engine for the encouragement of agitation, and to add to their political strength in Ireland. My objection is not merely that this Bill goes to throw the whole of the municipal authority into the hands of an exclusive party, but also that the persons into whose hands it will be thrown are of a class not likely to fairly, honestly, and impartially distribute the patronage, or faithfully to administer the pecuniary concerns of the corporations. It is, Sir, on this ground, mainly, that I oppose this Bill. We are constantly hearing an outcry against ascendancy; and still we are asked to pass this Bill, which will create an ascendancy of the most injurious kind. I may now be permitted to say a word or two on behalf of myself, and the friends with whom I act, on the subject of the compact which has been alluded to by my Honourable Friend the Member for Oxford University. I agree with my Honourable Friend in thinking that Honourable Members on this side of the House are not now bound by that compact. One condition of that compact was, that there should be a fair Tithe Bill for Ireland. The Tithe Bill which we have got was one owing entirely to ourselves; for I cannot forget that it was only in consequence of the determined resistance made by Honourable Members on this side of the House, to the proposition to give the clergy only 70 per cent., that we did obtain 75 per cent. for the clergy. And have we not had it repeated in this House, on the part of Government, that they only await the prospect of a majority to re-introduce the appropriation clause? Do we not know that, if they thought English feeling would bear it, Her Majesty's Ministers would press that measure? I would therefore put it to my Honourable Friends, whether the contract has not been broken, and whether we are not, therefore, relieved from any obligation? If it were otherwise, I am the last man who would recommend anything that could be construed into a breach of faith. I regret on this subject to have to differ from those Honourable Gentlemen with whom I have been accustomed to act, and with whom on all questions of policy, foreign or domestic, I hope on all occasions to agree; but I am afraid that this Bill is so full of infirmities that we could not hope effectually to repair it in committee, and that, therefore, I have no alternative but to oppose it altogether; although I shall, by doing so, be acting in opposition to many of my friends.

Mr. SHAW.—Sir, I will state at once, that, without pledging myself to any of the details of this measure, I intend to vote for the second reading. I feel bound, both by consistency and good faith, to take that course, because I have seen the good effects of the Irish Tithe Bill, in the increased security of the Irish Church, and the improved condition of society in Ireland. When the Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford reasons that his party is altogether free from every compact with regard to the Irish Church, because he sees that the hostility of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin to that Church is not diminished,—my answer to that reasoning is, that the Honourable and Learned Member was no party to the compact,—and that one great advantage has been gained for the Church,—namely, an Act of Parliament, by which the Church can be protected against the hostility of that Honourable and Learned Member. The Poor Law is, I believe, notwithstanding some drawbacks and difficulties, coming into useful operation; at all events, it will supply a safe criterion as to the franchise. But if I were even free from these obligations, I would call upon those Honourable Friends of mine who oppose the principle of the present measure, to state what is their own—and to propose some substitute of which I could approve, before I can lend them my support. I have not heard any one of my Honourable Friends contend that the Irish corporations can be retained in their present form: for my own part, considering the altered laws and circumstances of Ireland, I think that object is not possible or desirable; and from first to last, in all the discussions of the subject, I have never, either here or elsewhere, delivered a different opinion. I have advocated the abolition of those corporations, and still would do so, were it practicable,—maintaining, as I do, my former opinion, that their abolition would be the measure most conducive to the good government of the towns, and to the general peace and prosperity of the country, by preventing the recurrence of municipal elections, and the irritation of party contentions for ascendancy; and that the public funds would be applied for the real benefit of the inhabitants, and not to purposes of useless pageantry and show. But, after long perseverance, I, and those with whom I act, have failed to carry that measure of abolition, and in no small degree on account of those Honourable Friends who now oppose the present Bill refusing their support to that mode of settlement, — conscientiously, I freely admit, — but nevertheless preventing the settlement. What, then, is to be done? Corporations in Ireland cannot continue as they are; — abolition has been tried, and failed: and, to my mind, the only alternative which presents itself is, either to settle the question upon the principle that has been now agreed to by both Houses of Parliament, or else to leave it in its present unsettled and unsatisfactory condition, — a festering sore, inflaming the feelings of the most violent of both parties in Ireland, and the subject of constant and angry party contention in this House, to the exclusion of all useful and practical legislation for that part of the kingdom to which it relates. I am quite aware, from past experience, that I shall bring odium on myself by the part which I am now taking; the more so, by contrast with those Honourable Friends of mine with whom I generally act, but who, on this occasion, think it their duty to take a different course. But that shall not deter me from doing what I sincerely believe to be my duty. I think that exaggerated notions of the political importance of the measure have been formed on both sides, and by their reaction on each other. My greatest apprehension is, that wise and moderate men belonging to both will separate themselves from these new corporations, from a dread of that strife and animosity which their presence might greatly tend to prevent. I do not apprehend that with a bonâ fide 10*l.* franchise, what are termed Conservative opinions will eventually be overborne in these new bodies, as has been alleged by many of my friends, — provided only, that instead of indulging in unavailing regrets and bitter resentments at the past, those who hold them will exert themselves to assert that just influence to which their wealth, intelligence, and character entitle them. Nay, I would say, that it is my positive conviction, that the continuance of the Irish corporations in their present decayed and declining state, is rather an injury than a service to that great Conservative party to which I am proud to belong, and whose principles are—a firm but temperate maintenance of the civil and sacred institutions of the country; and above all, at the present moment, a determination, without giving offence to, or deriving superiority over, those of any class or creed, to support, by any or every sacrifice, the union of the Protestant Church with the State, in every portion of the United Kingdom. With these views I will vote for the second reading of the Bill, and endeavour, in the Committee, to make considerable amendments in the details, to many of which, in their present shape, I object.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — Sir, I feel, with my Right Honourable Friend, the importance of having this long vexed question settled. Her Majesty's Government have, year after year, brought in Bills to settle this question: they may have had a sincere desire to settle it, but certainly the means adopted to that end have been very ill advised. The Bill introduced last Session came down greatly amended by the other House; and I believe that, so amended, it met with the approval of Government, who would have permitted it to pass, had it not been for that overpowering influence to which they are too prone to succumb. A second Bill was brought in, and passed through this House with a rapidity which rendered discussion impossible, — a Bill with 250 clauses going through the House in two days! This Bill, as amended by the Lords, was also rejected by the Government, on the pretext that one of the Lords' amendments interfered with our privileges. For these reasons, I can hardly believe that Government have hitherto been anxious to settle this long-agitated question. But I do not think the House has had sufficient time to consider the present measure. Although it is now some time since the Noble Lord opposite brought in this voluminous Bill, it was only yesterday morning that I was put in possession of it. It is impossible that the people of Ireland can have had an opportunity of considering it. Nevertheless, the House is called upon to decide thus hastily upon it. Sir, I feel it to be my duty to lay before this House, and before the country, the grounds on which I shall vote for the second reading of this Bill. I am sincerely anxious that the question should be settled; and I hold that, after the transactions of last Session, the Conservative party are bound to consider, at once, of what would be the most proper mode to be adopted for the reconstruction of Irish corporations. It is well known, that for a long time this side of the House advocated the extinction of Irish corporations, and resisted their reconstruction; and that, during the whole of that time, a furious agitation was kept up by the enemies of the Church, which agitation has now ceased. It was said by a Noble Duke, the leader of his party in the House of Lords, last Session, that if the Poor Law Bill and the Irish Tithe Bill were passed in a satisfactory shape, he should feel himself bound to vote for the principle of a Bill for the remodelling of the Irish municipal corporations. These two measures have been passed; and, in conformity with that pledge, the party with whom I act are prepared to vote for the second reading of this measure. I am, however, bound to say, that I am well aware of the probable effects of it, if it be carried in its present shape; and, with the view to obviate them, I shall pursue such a course in committee as duty may dictate, and at all risks will follow it. I will therefore tell the Noble Lord that I will vote for the second reading of this Bill; but in doing so I shall take care to support or propose such modifications of it in committee as will prevent the most mischievous results arising. When the Government brought forward the Irish Municipal Bill, the members of Government in this House distinctly denied that it was intended by it to take the power in the corporations from one exclusive party and transfer it to another; and my Right Honourable Friend the present Master of the Rolls in Ireland, who was the law officer of the Irish Government in this House, made some powerful observations on this subject. On the second reading of that Bill, in 1836, my Right Honourable and Learned Friend said, —

> I know that it has been said, that the inevitable effect of this measure would be, to take the power out of the hands of one party, and give it to another. I am aware that this has repeatedly been said; but whatever credit may attach to my assertion, I have no hesitation in saying, that if I thought that this measure would take power from one exclusive and violent party, and give it to another equally so, — if such a party could be found,—it would not have a more determined opponent than myself. But I deny that such would be the effect of the measure.

Thus, it appears that my Right Honourable and Learned Friend anticipated my objection; and I maintain that the present measure, if it pass as it now stands, will have the effect of transferring all the power and influence in the corporations of Ireland from the Protestants to the Catholics. I, therefore, as the Irish Master of the Rolls did, on a former occasion, protest against being a party to such a proceeding, and shall therefore, in committee, propose a number of alterations to counteract the evils that must otherwise arise. Is the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies aware of the relative number of voting houses belonging to Catholics and Protestants, in the municipal corporations in Ireland, which he proposes to place in schedule A? With all possible respect to the Noble Lord, I feel that the Noble Lord cannot have been aware of the proportion the numbers bear to each other, and that the effect of the Bill will be to deprive the Protestants of all share of power in those towns. Is it not the bounden duty of the Noble Lord to inquire into the subject, and to inform the House whether this measure will produce such an effect in any town in Ireland? I can tell the Noble Lord that I have taken some trouble on the subject, and I will tell him, also, that if he will look into the Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, and the Commissioners of Municipal Boundaries, he will perceive that in nearly all those places there will be an overwhelming proportion of voting houses in the hands of Catholics. What is the chief objection to the present corporations in Ireland? It is, that they are exclusively in the hands of Protestants. This was the ground urged for the abolition of them; but would it not be most monstrous — would it not be most unjust, because they are now exclusively on our side, that you should produce such a change as to make them almost exclusive to the opposite party? This would not only be grossly and manifestly unjust, but most impolitic. Is not this a Protestant state? Is there any man in this House who contemplates that this country will ever cease to be a Protestant one? If there be, I, for one, certainly never will be a party to any measure which shall be likely to produce such a result. But I may be asked what I would do to prevent the transfer I deprecate. I will tell the House what I would propose; but first of all I must observe, that the present Bill is toto cœlo different from that which the Lords amended last year. The Noble Lord, in his Bill, proposes one qualification for the first three years, and that, after that time, it shall be entirely different; but what is this latter proposal? Why, that after three years, every person who occupies a rated house in a municipal borough shall have a vote at the election of town councillors. Is not this an essential difference from the qualification laid down in the Bill sent from the House of Lords last year? There is also no clause to continue to the freemen and burgesses in those towns the freemen, be it remembered, were Roman Catholics; and I am glad, on this occasion, to be able to appeal to the opinions of Roman Catholics in support of my arguments. The people of Galway justly complained, that the inhabitants of the rural districts, who would have the same right of voting in the election of Members of Parliament for the borough, would not, as before, be subject to their share of the corporate rates. Is it not, I ask, an anomaly, and a breach of one of the fundamental principles of the Reform Bill, — that property should be represented, — that these new burdens should be imposed upon the inhabitants, and that those who are to be cut off from the borough in all fiscal matters, and who are to bear no share in the municipal burdens, shall still, as before, exercise an influence in the parliamentary elections? This is a grievance; and I call upon my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Galway, to support me in resisting this part of the Bill. Of the eleven towns in Schedule A, there are three which have distinctly exclaimed against the present Bill. Now let me just take the case of the city of Cork, with which I happen to be well acquainted. The rural district appertaining to the city of Cork is about six or seven miles in diameter; it contains 45,000 acres, and comprises an extent of 74 square miles; — what I speak of now is what is called the county of the city of Cork. Now, of this space there are only about four miles covered with buildings, belonging to what may properly be called the town. The inhabitants of the remaining part of this district have no more connection with the city of Cork than they have with the city of London, except so far as regards their nearer proximity to the former place; they have no interest in common with the inhabitants of the city of Cork. Now, what is the fact with respect to the parliamentary electors of the county of the city of Cork? A fact, not resting upon any doubtful testimony, but which has been proved before an Election Committee of this House. It was proved before that Committee, upon the evidence of the town clerk, who produced the affidavits with respect to their registration of voters, that there were 700 of these affidavits to which the names of the parties were not signed in their own handwriting; thus showing that there were 700 voters who could not write their own names. The men were not blind, but they were unable to write; and they adopted the practice, usual in Ireland amongst those who cannot write, of having their names signed by another party, and affixing their mark. It appeared, also, that there were one eighth of the constituency of Cork who had no qualification whatever; some had never been rated at all; and others had appealed against the rate. It appeared there was one eighth of the whole electors of Cork who had not a 10*l.* qualification. I think I have sufficiently shown that there are many points of great injustice in the present Bill, which I trust will be remedied in the Committee; and to that, I, for one, shall earnestly direct my attention. I feel that I have trespassed sufficiently long upon the House, and I thank them for the attention with which I have been heard. I shall redeem the pledge which I gave on a former occasion of voting for the second reading of this Bill; but I shall oppose it in every ulterior stage, unless it shall be so amended, in committee, as to satisfy my mind that it is not a Bill for changing the corporations of Ireland from being Protestant communities—which they were intended to be — into Roman Catholic societies. I shall use my best endeavours to improve the Bill, and to make it a safe Bill; but if I fail in that, I shall feel bound to offer it my most determined opposition.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, I cannot conceal from myself, nor do I desire to conceal from the House, the delight I feel in finding myself on the same side with the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite and the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down; and with whom I shall be most happy to vote on the present occasion. I certainly did take the liberty of offering a suggestion across the House to the Honourable and Learned Serjeant, and if that had been acted upon, the Learned Member might have been spared the trouble, and the House the pleasure, of one half hour of his speech, which might then have been reserved for another occasion. The Honourable Member first declared his intention of voting for the Bill, and he afterwards adduced the towns of Cork, and Clonmel, and Galway, as arguments against the Bill. The arguments of the Honourable and Learned Member might have been very good if they had agreed with his vote; but, as it is, I confess I am better pleased with his vote than his arguments. I hope the Honourable and Learned Serjeant will give the House credit, when the Bill is in committee, for the instalment of the debate which we have this evening received from him, and allow us to escape so much on a future occasion. I am of opinion that the Bill will place those who call themselves "Conservatives" in a better position than they are at present. Many of those Gentlemen who, for political purposes, now appeal to the angry feelings and passions of certain parties, will no longer feel a necessity for so doing, but will consult the voice of the people of the cities and towns; and by pursuing that course, they will be better friends with their neighbours than ever they have been before. The Learned Serjeant has talked of Protestant meeting-houses and Catholic meeting-houses — but this is the first time I have ever heard a religion given to a house. The Honourable and Learned Member objects to the Bill, that it will take away the power from the Protestants and give it to the Roman Catholics. If the meaning of the Bill were to take power from a Protestant because he was a Protestant, and to give that power to a Catholic because he was a Catholic, I would oppose it most strenuously; but the complaint under the present system is, that the Roman Catholic does not get that power and privilege to which he is justly entitled. As a case in point, I may instance the city of Dublin, where, for forty-seven years, Roman Catholics have been eligible to be admitted to the corporation, and notwithstanding that the law so permits their admission, and that there are numbers of Roman Catholics amongst the gentry, and merchants, and the shopocracy, as they are, in the adoption of a new term, now called, and persons connected with the law, and the other liberal professions, yet, during those forty-seven years not one of them has been admitted. I hope the Learned Serjeant will excuse me when I say they have been excluded by Protestant prejudice. I should be heartily ashamed, and I should deplore it bitterly, if a Catholic corporation were to succeed in excluding Protestant wealth and respectability from civil rights because they were Protestants. Now I have shown that the Catholics have been equally admissible for forty-seven years with the Protestants, and yet none of them have been admitted, because they were Catholics. Let me be shown any provision in this Bill which gives a preference in civil rights to a man because he is a Catholic, and no one will be found more ready to expunge it than myself. The principle of the Bill is, that a certain degree of property ought to give a title to the franchise; and, whether the possessor of that property be a Protestant or a Catholic, he is equally entitled to the franchise under the Bill; and on the same principle, no matter what is his religion, he shall not have a franchise if he do not possess the property. No matter what religion a man is of, whether a Protestant or a Catholic, or even a Socialist, he may enjoy the franchise if he enjoys the property. If the greater proportion of the property were in the hands of the Protestants, why should they not have the franchise? And if, on the contrary, the greater portion of the property were in the hands of the Catholics, why should they not have it? The Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford University probably differs from me, he being of opinion that the State ought to give a superiority to the man who is of the State religion. I am ready to admit that this Bill must be considered as a bad Bill by every one who holds such opinions; but it is a good Bill in the eyes of those who think that the possessors of property in the towns ought to have the regulation of the municipal affairs of the towns, and that no one ought to inquire what religion they are of, or if any man be impertinent enough to ask such a question, that no one should be bound to answer him. I am ready to take the Bill if it should pass in its present shape, though I believe there are many who may be dissatisfied with the franchise; but I feel that individuals are bound to sacrifice their opinions in order to secure a permanent and substantial good. I must, however, say, that, if the Bill should not pass in its present shape, — if it should be altered in any of its material principles, — it will not carry with it satisfaction to the people of Ireland; and I think it is the interest of this House to give its acquiescence to the just and reasonable demands of those who will be most affected by it. The people of Ireland demand the same municipal rights as the people of England; but they are content to take the Bill, although there is a restriction in it. They agree to that restriction, as it is to last only for three years. I hope the time will soon come when we shall be able to put an end to all such restrictions. I shall, on the present occasion, feel great pleasure in voting with the Right Honourable Gentleman, and the Honourable and Learned Member opposite, in support of this Bill; and I trust we shall be able to carry it through the Committee in such a manner as will enable us to bring this long-agitated question to a satisfactory conclusion.

SIR R. PEEL. — I do not intend to enter into any discussion of the details of the Bill on the present occasion; I shall reserve that for a future opportunity.

With respect to an admission I made in a former year, I must say that I do not now see any cause to induce me to retract that admission. With respect to the newly-inserted provisions, now, at the end of three years, on the question of the second reading of this Bill, I will not enter into that point; but I reserve to myself the complete power of acting hereafter, with respect to the details, as I may think fit. The main question which we have now to decide is, shall this Bill be read a second time, or shall it not? Shall an attempt be made in the present Session to bring this long-agitated question to a conclusion? But I have a better ground for assenting to this attempt to settle the question, for I hold that we are consulting no interest in Ireland by keeping the question unsettled, if we can settle it in any proper and satisfactory manner. With respect to the first point, concerning the fulfilment of the pledge which I made last year, — for I will not call it compact, as I do not consider that I entered into any compact on any occasion with Honourable Gentlemen opposite; but I made a declaration — as to the course I intended to pursue, and that declaration, it may be thought, might have a material bearing on the course which will probably be adopted by others. I said that, if there had been a satisfactory Tithe Bill passed, and a franchise established on the rating of the Poor Law Bill, in that case we would apply ourselves to the settlement of the corporation question in a form which would be satisfactory. I have no disposition to say that the agitation with respect to the Tithe Bill releases me from the pledge implied by that declaration. I doubt the policy of making the Honourable Gentleman opposite (the Member for Dublin) of so much importance; and, so far as the operation of the Tithe Bill is concerned, I will not so far compliment the Honourable Gentleman as to say that he has such power over the Catholics of Ireland as that, at his suggestion, they would consent to unsettle the Tithe Bill. I believe that he has not such power over the Catholics of Ireland, the majority of whom have so much of good sense and too much desire to consult the tranquillity of their country, to excite any particular degree of apprehension on that point; and I do not believe that if the Honourable Gentleman was inclined to do so by agitation, he has the necessary power. I do not think any conduct of his with regard to the Tithe Bill releases me from any promise I made on a former occasion. As many of my friends may vote against me on the present occasion, and as some of them have come into Parliament since the period to which I have referred, it is necessary that I should inform those who came into Parliament since that transaction took place of the reasons why I adopt a different course with respect to the Corporation Bill from that which I pursued on a former occasion. I long entertained the opinion that it would be better for the interests of Ireland if the people of that country would generally consent to the abolition of the corporations; but when I found that course was not considered to be satisfactory, and that it was felt as a humiliation and a degradation that there should be any difference between the mode of treating the corporations in Ireland from that which had been adopted as to corporations in England, I saw that those feelings of dissatisfaction entered as an important element into the question. I had, for a long time previously, wished to state as my opinion, that, upon the whole, there would be a greater prospect of religious peace and social concord in Ireland, if an arrangement were made to provide for the local government of the towns without any municipal corporations. We tried that principle. I proposed that the existing corporations should be abolished in Ireland, and, further, that no other similar bodies should be established in lieu of them; for I conceived it impossible to proceed with the principle of self-election in Ireland after the corporations had been abolished.

My Honourable Friend the Member for the University of Oxford has, this evening, called upon us to retain the principle of self-election in Ireland, although it has been abolished in England; but, as far as my experience goes, I do not think it consistent with the maintenance of the Protestant interest in that country to maintain self-election in Ireland after it has been given up in England. Let us take the town of Galway, for instance, where the great preponderance of property is in the hands of the Roman Catholics; and I ask you, would it conduce to the Protestant interest in that town if the principle of self-election were retained, and if Protestants elected each other, to the exclusion of the Roman Catholics? I think, on the contrary, that it would provoke so strong a feeling of dissatisfaction, that any good that might result from it would be perfectly overwhelmed and overpowered by the general discontent it would produce. Then take the case of Dublin: I do not believe that it would conduce to the Protestant interest in that great city if the principle of self-election were retained, and that the Catholics were practically excluded from all share in the municipal government. We tried that principle in 1835, when we were in a powerful minority, within 20 or 25 of the Government; and, on the motion for the abolition of the corporations in 1836, we were in a minority of 64. We repeated it in 1837, and we were then in a minority of 88. Although men are in opposition, they are obliged to look to the interests of the country; and the question which then remained to be considered was, whether it was for the Protestant interests, — seeing that the public mind in England and Ireland was against the abolition of the corporations, — that we should hope to carry this principle, and fight the battle successfully, against increasing opposition in this House, and with a decreasing minority. I did not act suddenly. I took every opportunity of consulting the opinions of that great party with whom I have the honour to act. I asked them whether they thought they could rely, under the circumstances of the case, on the permanent opposition of the House of Lords in maintaining this principle; and whether, even supposing that to be the case, it was on any ground desirable that the two Houses of Parliament should be thus kept in perpetual conflict with each other? I cannot say that all agreed, for some differed; but there was almost a universal opinion amongst us that the ground was not tenable, and that the public interests and the Protestant interests of Ireland would not be advanced by it. That gave force to the declaration I made; for I made it, not as a personal declaration, but on behalf of a great majority of that party. If the Noble Lord was influenced by that declaration in any measure which he proposed, I should be sorry, indeed, to be liable to the imputation that, having got the provisions I required, I did not fulfil my part of the engagement. At the same time, if I were convinced that the public interests could be injuriously affected by the course which I am taking, I should feel myself placed in a painful dilemma; and, as a public man, should have to decide whether I should fulfil my engagement, and, in doing so, act contrary to the interests of the public service. But I am not in such a dilemma; for the declaration which I made is consistent with my conviction that I am better consulting the public interests and the Protestant interests of Ireland, by assenting to the introduction of this Bill, than if I were to refuse concession to any attempt to settle this question. I confess that I will enter into the consideration of the details of this Bill with an earnest desire to bring the question to a satisfactory settlement. I do not deny that the Roman Catholic influence must prevail to a great extent in these corporations on account of their numbers and property; but I do not anticipate any of the extreme danger that some appear to apprehend in this respect. I am sorry that the Protestant interest should not have more influence in those corporations; but I doubt whether the establishment of municipal corporations will add much to the political influence of the Catholics. That power will not materially add to their political weight. See how the case stands at present. With the corporations in the hands of Protestants, can we congratulate ourselves much upon the political results? I am convinced that more advantage would be produced by depriving those who wish to agitate of a topic of agitation; and I am satisfied to run the risk of the elective principle, in order that a great body, whom I am desirous to look upon in the light of a large community of my fellow-countrymen, may not feel a sense of degradation at having withheld from them this concession.

I now come to the more narrow view of the system, and let us see to what extent it has contributed to advance our parliamentary or political interests. In schedule A there are eleven towns: Belfast, Cork, Clonmel, Drogheda, Dublin, Galway, Kilkenny, Limerick, Londonderry, Sligo, and Waterford. Out of these eleven towns, there is only one which returns a Conservative, — namely, the town of Belfast. My Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Bandon says, that many of these towns protest against corporations, and that a great portion of the property and wealth of these towns is opposed to corporations. Well, be it so. Supposing that a great portion of the property is against the introduction of the corporations, is it not to be supposed that the influence of that property will be exerted, and that it will strive for a fair portion of the corporate offices? Take the case of Belfast, for instance; where I have no doubts, however, that they will be able to establish a very good corporation. There they will have no funds to administer, and consequently will be obliged to resort to a new taxation; and as soon as they commence to exercise their taxing power, you will then see that they will at once become unpopular. Many of these corporations will have to decide between two courses: they will neglect their duty, and leave the lamps unlighted, and the pavement unrepaired; they will neglect to attend to the comfort of the inhabitants, and then there will be comparisons made between them and the former corporation. They will then meet and determine to establish a borough rate, expecting that they will recover their popularity by this means; but when the rate comes to be levied, they will find that the imposition of the new rate has rendered them more unpopular than they were before. I apprehend that when we consider the disunion that may arise to a certain extent amongst parties now united; — the feelings of dissatisfaction that will be excited amongst one party, on discovering that the corporation has not come up to their expectations; — the discontent that will be excited towards those whose party had prevailed in the choice of the governing body; — I think, considering all these grounds, that the danger has been exaggerated with respect to these new corporations. I think, considering also the dissatisfaction that will be excited amongst the neglected candidates and their friends — the feelings of humiliation arising from having pretensions disregarded — the unpopularity arising from new taxation, — I think that, considering all these causes, our political influence will be rather increased than abated by the circumstances to which I have adverted. Now, I will take all the boroughs which at present return Members to Parliament. There are, altogether, thirty-three borough towns, having corporations which at present return Members to this House. Well; out of these thirty-three towns, there are only nine which return Conservative members. I apprehend, however, that this result ensues not so much from any danger growing out of the existence of these corporations, as from the extent to which, in many of those places, the franchise is in the hands of the Roman Catholics. I am certain that it would be inexpedient to make a provision that the elected body shall be of a particular persuasion, so long as the elective body are of a different persuasion. I do not think that there will be any risk to be encountered on account of religion. The election will always be sure to go in favour of those who profess a certain line of politics; and there will always be found men in whom the spirit of party will overrule all other feelings; and these men, representing in the corporations the feelings of the elective body, would be found quite as mischievous as any who might be debarred on account of their religious persuasion. I have already stated that in schedule A there is only one town which returns a Conservative Member to this House, and that out of the thirty-three borough towns having corporations, we have only nine Conservative Members. I know very well that it is impossible to deny that the Roman Catholics will, at first, exercise material influence in these municipal corporations; but I very much doubt whether their political influence, as distinguished from their municipal influence, will be increased by the grant of municipal corporations, when I consider how small a proportion of the municipal functions, in many towns, remains to be exercised. In the city of Dublin, for instance, the corporation will have very few corporate functions to discharge. You have already established, there, a paving board and a lighting board, and you have established, likewise, a street police, with which you have decided that the corporation shall not meddle. In fact, in Dublin you have excluded the corporation from the exercise of all municipal functions Thus, then, in everything which respects the interests of the corporation, the corporation will have scarcely any interference. We may, by refusing to read this Bill a second time, give encouragement to agitation; but I think that we ought to consent to the second reading of the Bill, as we have failed to persuade the people of Ireland that it would be for their interest, for a time at least, that they should be free from those municipal election contests, which will go far to interfere with social harmony, and to interfere with good fellowship amongst the inhabitants of many towns in Ireland. For though elections may be considered as a safety-valve for the expression of opinion, still they operate very much against this harmony of social feeling, and very much tend to interrupt it.

On these grounds, then, — first of all, of a desire to promote the interests of the Protestants of Ireland, and, secondly, of promoting the general interests of the country, — I think that this question should be brought to a final conclusion, unless there can be shown a strong necessity to the contrary. I have already stated that I did not enter into any compact with respect to this question; but this I feel, that no one could know what to depend on, if, on such occasions, the public declarations of public men were not to be adhered to. It would be a painful course if I were called upon to adhere to a declaration which I deemed to be wrong; but I feel that the declaration which I made is one in conformity with my own convictions, and that I consent to nothing in this Bill which I think ought to be amended. My own opinion is, that it is for the public interest — for the interest of Ireland, and for the interest of the Protestant party in that country—that we should seize the opportunity of settling this question, and that we shall gain no object by postponing it to another year, when we may have fresh difficulties to encounter, and a diminished chance, perhaps, of effecting a satisfactory and amicable settlement. I shall therefore vote for the second reading of this Bill, and shall enter into the Committee with the same feelings with which I give my vote to-night, and with a disposition to use my best exertions to bring this long-agitated question to an amicable, a satisfactory, and a final settlement.

Mr. W. V. STUART.—As the Honourable and Learned Member for Bandon has referred to me, with respect to the petitions from Clonmel, I certainly must say I think that the petition has been signed by respectable parties; but I do not think it of much weight, as I have reason to believe that many persons signed it under the representation, that its object was to relieve them from local taxation.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Were it not for some remarks that fell from the Honourable and Learned Member for Bandon, and the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, I should not have thought it necessary to offer any observations to the House on the present occasion. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth has stated that, with respect to this question, he entered into no compact with this side of the House, but that he made a public declaration of what were his intentions in this matter. He has repeated with perfect correctness what was the declaration which he made; and I must say that what the Right Honourable Baronet has now stated agrees, on the whole, with the declaration which he formerly made. However, the Right Honourable Baronet is mistaken if he supposes that I am prepared to agree to all the propositions with respect to this Bill which were pressed last year. There are some things which were contained in the Bill, and added by the House of Lords, last year, and some propositions which we have this evening been led to expect will be proposed in the Committee, to which I cannot give my assent. There were clauses introduced into the Bill last year, which, under a different form, and with a good deal of complicated arrangement, perpetuated these very corporations, and retained for them all that had been a matter of objection. The Honourable Member for Bandon proposed a plan, by which he would provide that half the governing body should be elected by one class of religionists, and the other half by the other, and that only half the members of the governing body should be elected by one class of the inhabitants; but, though I assisted in introducing and preparing a Bill with respect to charitable trusts, in which a principle something similar was admitted, I do not think that it would be at all advisable to introduce that principle into the Municipal Bill for Ireland. I shall therefore object to the introduction of this principle into the Bill, for I think that, in operation, it would be found to be mischievous. There could be no way more certain of perpetuating religious dissension, than that one party, being a minority, both parties in a town should each elect an equal number of town councillors, and that one set of these town councillors should belong to the Protestant party exclusively, and the other exclusively to the Roman Catholic party. In agreeing to the proposition of establishing a higher rate of franchise, I certainly do so against my own opinion, for I think that we have fixed the franchise higher than was necessary as a security for the constituency who would have to elect the governing body. However, there is nothing in that franchise which can give advantage to one party beyond another. It is merely a money value, and the franchise may be equally enjoyed by all who possess the qualification without reference to whether the individual be a Whig or a Tory, a Protestant or Roman Catholic, a Churchman or a Dissenter. I think this franchise will combine all interests. I hold, therefore, that, having decided in abolishing the principle of self-election and putting an end to religious differences, we should avoid anything that would tend to perpetuate those differences, and that would for one evil substitute another. I hope, in conclusion, that the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth will not content himself with supporting the principle of the measure. I hope that we may be able to bring this question to a satisfactory settlement in the course of the present Session. Having passed a similar measure with respect to other parts of the United Kingdom, it could not fail to be a constant source of dissatisfaction to the people of Ireland if we were to refuse to place them in the same condition, and to concede to that country a measure based upon a similar principle.

The House then divided:—Ayes 149; Noes 14; Majority 135.

The Bill was then read a second time, and committed for Monday, the 24th of February.

FLOUR IMPORTATION (IRELAND) BILL.

On the motion of Mr. LABOUCHERE, Order of the Day for second reading read.

Mr. BEAMISH. — I have to present a petition from the millers of the city of Cork, who have considerable property invested in flour mills. The petitioners state that this Bill, if passed into a law, will be very prejudicial, in fact, almost fatal, to their interests; and they pray your Honourable House that it may not be permitted to pass into a law.

Mr. W. ROCHE, Mr. E. TENNENT, and Mr. J. BLAKE, also presented petitions against, — from Dundalk; Antrim and Down; John Southwell Brown and Richard D. Spears; Carlow; David Roche and others; and Galway.

Petitions in favour were presented, — from Drogheda; and Belfast.

To lie on the table.

On the question being put, that the Bill be read a second time, —

Mr. EMERSON TENNENT said: — I rise to take the earliest opportunity of entering my protest against the second reading of this Bill. I stated in a former stage of the Bill my determination to oppose it, and not, as has been suggested, merely on the narrow ground that it is a measure affecting the interests of the millers only; but on the broader principle, and the more important one, that it would materially interrupt the current of agricultural improvement in Ireland, and, so far from benefiting either of those classes for whose advantage it purports to be introduced, the manufacturers and the poor, that it would be a direct and serious injury to both. And when Honourable Members speak of the propriety of assimilating the laws of England and of Ireland in this respect, I would beg to remind them that it is out of the very dissimilar circumstances of the two countries that the present dissimilarity in the law has arisen. This is not an Act of a recent date, or a measure of the British Parliament, which you are about to annul and to repeal; — it is an Act passed by the Parliament of Ireland long before the Union took place, which has been recognised by the Act of Union, and which has been continued and perpetuated by every Corn Act passed by the Imperial Parliament ever since. The House are aware that, down to a very recent period, Ireland was almost entirely destitute of a home manufacture of flour, but was totally dependent upon England, and that even within the last thirty years her wheat and oats, even for her own consumption, were sent to Bristol, to Liverpool, and to Glasgow to be ground, and were thence returned to her in the shape of flour and oatmeal. It was to remedy this serious want that the present law was enacted. To show the peculiar circumstances of Ireland which led to this enactment, — so far back as 1757, an Act of the Irish Parliament, "for supplying Dublin with flour," recited in its preamble that the inhabitants "had frequently been reduced to great distress" from the difficulty of procuring flour, and, in order to encourage a steady supply at home, the Act affixed a bounty to every hundred weight of Irish flour grown and manufactured in the country and brought inland to Dublin. In 1763 this bounty was increased by another Act of the Irish Parliament, and, in 1777, it was extended to seaborne flour the produce of the country. Between this period and the Union, various other advantages and inducements were held out to capitalists to incline them to vest their property in mills, and powers were granted to bishops, corporations, and incapacitated persons, to enable them to demise lands on long leases for the building of flour mills; public money was advanced to erect mills in districts where private capital could not be found; and at length, in an Act passed in the year 1783, entitled "An Act for regulating the Corn Trade, promoting Agriculture, and providing a regular Supply of Corn," the present law, prohibiting the importation of foreign flour, was for the first time introduced. It would seem as if the previous policy, and its encouragement to the millers, had been found successful, and that the trade was so increasing as to hold out a prospect of its being adequate to the entire supply of the home market, and, in consequence, the eighteenth clause prohibiting foreign flour, was inserted, in these words: —

> And be it enacted, for the further encouragement of corn mills in this country (Ireland), that no corn or grain ground into meal or flour, or made into bread or biscuit, shall at any time be imported into this kingdom, except from Great Britain, and of British growth and manufacture, under penalty of the forfeiture of all such meal, flour, &c., and a sum of 5*l.* for every cwt. thereof.

In 1792 the penalty was still farther increased by the forfeiture of the vessel, and such continued to be the law till the period of the Union in 1800. In every act and proceeding of this Legislature since, the same policy has been recommended and continued. In 1801 and 1802 a Committee of the House of Commons, which sat upon the question of the corn intercourse with Ireland, specially reported the existence of this enactment, and recommended its continuance; and in the Corn Law passed in that year, as well as in those of 1804, 1806, 1815, 1822, and 1828, the protection was recognised and perpetuated; and in the discussions upon the latter Bill in the House of Commons the right of Ireland to this protection was strenuously insisted upon by Sir John Newport and Mr. Spring Rice; and in the House of Lords a motion of Earl Stanhope, by way of amendment, to exclude foreign meal and flour even from England also, was supported by Lord Ellenborough, the Marquess of Salisbury, and others, on the specific grounds of the duty incumbent on the Legislature to protect and encourage the agriculture of Ireland, through the promotion of its milling trade. The natural effect of the confidence thus inspired into the Irish capitalist by the assurance given him of steady protection was the building of a vast number of mills; and so striking is the contrast exhibited, in this particular, now as compared with the condition of Ireland at the Union, when there was scarcely such a thing as a flour mill to be found, that, by a Return in 1835, it appeared that there was no less a number than 1882 corn and flour mills then registered in that country — (that Return was imperfect even then, and the number has been since increased) — and that Ireland, which, at the time of the Union, was an importing country, exported to England, in 1825, 599,124 cwts. of flour and meal, and, in 1835, 1,984,480 cwts., being an increase of 1,390,356 cwts. within ten years; and, within the same period, an increase in the tonnage of shipping employed in that trade, alone, of no less than 69,267 tons, being the difference between 29,956 tons in 1825, and the raw material, — by importing, not the flour, but the wheat, with which to mix and amend the quality of his own grain. And it is a matter well known to practical men, that the quality of flour can most effectually be improved, not by attempting to mix the two flours, which it is almost impracticable to incorporate, but by mixing the two wheats in the hopper, or by dressing them off together in the final process of grinding. With a view to this process, the millers of Ireland are, at the present moment, large holders of foreign wheat; — one gentleman, in my neighbourhood, has this year imported 6500 qrs.; others in Belfast are similarly situated; and I have heard of one miller in the south of Ireland who holds not less than 100,000*l.* worth of unground corn. By this means, even in defective harvests, the supply is maintained in Ireland, not only abundant, but of superior quality. I have been given to understand that, in a memorial forwarded to the Board of Trade from one baking establishment in Belfast, this measure, now under consideration, has been pressed upon the attention of the Right Honourable Gentleman on the ground that flour of good quality cannot now be procured in Belfast. A petition from the same town has likewise been presented to the House; but that, with more caution, abstains from making so absurd an assertion. As to that memorial from the one baking-house, in order to meet it, I hold in my hand a memorial signed by twenty of the first bakers in Belfast, all of whom state that having learned that such an allegation has been made as that a supply of sound flour cannot be had in Belfast, they feel it their duty to give it an instant and direct contradiction, as, not only in this season but in other similar defective harvests, they have had an abundant supply of the best flour, ground from foreign wheat, imported specially by the millers around them. The argument for the Bill, therefore, from the necessity of importing flour to amend the quality of Irish wheat, fails utterly, inasmuch as it cannot be advantageously mixed when ground, whilst wheat can, most readily, be imported for that purpose, and all the profits of its manufacture into flour be retained at home, instead of being given to foreigners. The import has been larger in the present year. But, in the event of the admission of foreign flour, what is to compensate the miller for his inevitable loss upon the stock of wheat so laid up for the season's demand? And observe, too, that this stock must, to a great extent, be provided beforehand, in almost every year, whatsoever be the harvest, inasmuch as Ireland being an exporting country, the stock of home-grown grain in the hands of the farmer is generally exhausted about February in each year, or quicker, and the miller cannot, in Ireland, as he can in England — which then becomes the great depository for grain — purchase, from week to week, the quantities required for temporary demand without incurring the risk of keeping a heavy stock on hand. One evil which has been imputed to the corn laws is the amount of speculation which it necessarily entails upon the dealers in grain by the present system. But, if the trade were now to be compelled to speculation in stocks of flour instead of stocks of wheat, the evil would be multiplied one hundred fold, because wheat is an article which, with proper care, will keep sound for years, whilst flour is liable to heat, to sour, and to encounter numerous capricious changes which it is impossible to guard against, and on the least symptom of which the entire stock must be forced into the market, at any sacrifice, to insure immediate sale, — and thus an inevitable deterioration in prices must result even to the sound stocks in the hands of other holders. Now, is it any answer to a statement of facts such as these to say that the opposition to the Bill is altogether a miller's question, and that they alone are interested in resisting it? This might be a sufficient retort were the trade assailed a comparatively insignificant one, and were its petty protection pleaded in opposition to higher and more important national interests. But let the House remember that the trade in flour is now the staple manufacture of Ireland, — of equal, if not of greater value, than her linen trade; — and even if the influence of the Bill before the House were to extend no further than to the millers themselves, surely a trade which exports annually to this country close upon 2,000,000 cwt. of its chief article of food is well entitled to consideration and protection. But it is incorrect to say that the millers alone are interested. The farmer and the landowner are equally assailed through this measure. The cultivation and the growth of wheat has been found, in every instance, to be promoted by the establishment of mills. Lands, which before were in pasture or potatoes, are immediately prepared for wheat wherever the establishment of a flour-mill holds out the inducement of a ready market. This has been eminently the case in the counties of Tyrone and Armagh, in the midst of which the mills erected on the estates of Lord Caledon have given a powerful impulse to the cultivation of wheat; and a remarkable instance has occurred on the estate of my Honourable and Gallant Friend the Member for Donegal, where a flour-mill has recently been built in a district in which not a blade of wheat had been grown before; and such was the instant change, that in one week, in this year, no less a sum than 1500*l.* has been paid at the mill for wheat grown in the district immediately surrounding it. It is quite clear that any discouragement given to the prosperity or the increase of mills, such as is threatened by this Bill, must put an immediate check to all such instances of agricultural advancement. Such is the opinion of Mr. Spring Rice, who, in the debate on the Corn Bill in 1827, declared that "the establishment of mills in Ireland had been a great means of promoting the culture of wheat; and the substitution of that grain for the potato, as a general article of food, was considered, on all hands, to be a great step towards raising the moral character of the Irish peasantry. But by any encouragement given to foreign flour, in his (Mr. Spring Rice's) opinion, the milling interest of Ireland would be wholly ruined." Fortified by such an authority as this, I am quite prepared to meet any assertion from the opposite side of the House, that this is not an agricultural, but a miller's question.

But there is another and a most important class whom this measure ostensibly professes to serve, but on whom I am prepared to show that it will inflict a serious injury, — namely, the operatives, and the labouring classes in Ireland. The great outcery against the corn laws in England is based upon the assumption that they tend to render the food of the artisans of this country more expensive than that of the operatives of foreign countries with whom they have to compete. Now, I am prepared to show that such would be precisely the effect of this measure upon the operatives of Ireland. The mere cost of converting wheat into flour — the miller's profits, in short — in Ireland, and in the countries from which Ireland would be likely to import flour, would, so far as I can ascertain, be pretty nearly equal; but the country in which the corn is ground for export, would always have this advantage, that, whilst the finer sorts alone are worth exporting, the coarser and the secondary flour go to increase the quantity, and consequently, to diminish the cost, of the food of the operatives and middle classes. In addition to which, the employment afforded by the mills themselves supply great numbers, perhaps from 40,000 to 50,000 persons, in Ireland, with a ready means to purchase them; so that the native mills always combine these three recommendations, — steady wages, an increased quantity of food, and lower prices. In any country the fair proportion of value between fine and course flour can only be maintained where the entire produce of the wheat is taken into consumption. But there being but one scale of duty on all flour proposed to be imported, it follows, that the first and finest only would become a matter of import in this country, thereby augmenting the quantity, and of course diminishing the cost, of the food of the rich; whilst the foreigner, producing beyond his own consumption, and exporting only the finest qualities, reduces the value of the coarser kinds, which he retains at home, in exact proportion as he increases the relative quantity, and thereby gives a direct advantage to his own operatives over ours. At the same time, the import into great Britain producing an excess of fine flour over coarse, destroys the relative quantity of the latter, and augments its cost to the British operatives. Besides, it follows from this, that every pound of fine flour imported into Ireland would prevent the manufacture of a corresponding quantity of wheat in that country, and, of course, exclude a proportionate amount of coarse flour from entering the market. The effectual method to relieve the operative and the poor is, to diminish the price, by increasing the quantity, of the food they consume; and for this, the most obvious expedient is, the encouragement of the native mills, which afford, not only the food to be bought, but the wages wherewith to buy it. If from any adverse circumstance of defective harvests, or of unsound native grain, it became necessary to import at all, that import should be the raw material, and not the manufactured article. We should import, not the flour, but the wheat, the grinding of which secures the profits of the process to our own capitalists, instead of foreigners, — gives employment to our own operatives, instead of to others, — and augments the quantity, whilst it diminishes the cost, of the food of the middle classes; whilst every barrel of the foreign ground flour we import takes away, not only a proportion of food, but a proportion of employment from our own mechanics. Such were the views of this question, taken in 1827, by Sir John Newport. If we must be driven to import at all, let it be grain, and not flour. "If grain were imported," he said, "the worst and the middlings went to support the poor; but, where flour was imported, it was the best sort, and was consumed exclusively by the rich. In the first instance our own poor derived the benefit,—in the latter, it went to the poor of other countries; and he (Sir John Newport) was convinced the House would not consent to give away this benefit to foreigners." But I have already shown that the scale of duties and of freights upon wheat and flour respectively exhibit the balance so strongly in favour of the importation of the latter, that it would not fail to be preferred. And I would beg the attention of the House for a very few minutes, to permit me to point out the injury which would result, not only to the operative in the cost of provisions, but to the agriculturist and the farmer, by the loss of the pollard and the bran for feeding cattle,—a resource which, in towns also, is a matter of the utmost importance. According to the calculation I have already read to the House, it appears that from every five bushels of wheat manufactured in this country the poor derive 40 lbs. of coarse flour, and the farmer 50 lbs. of bran, exclusive of less valuable offal for fodder or manure,—both which items must, as a matter of course, be lost, if the flour were imported in place of the wheat. And if such is the loss upon five bushels, apply the same scale, and look at the amount of loss upon an entire cargo. A ship of 300 tons burden would carry, as I have stated, about 2800 barrels of flour, or 1500 quarters of wheat; and, in the event of the owner preferring to freight her with the latter, the produce, as consumed in England, would be as follows:—

1500 quarters at 480 lbs. the quarter, amounts to 720,000 lbs., or 6428 cwt. 2 qrs. 8 lbs. and would produce—

	lbs.		cwts.	qrs.	lbs.
Fine flour, fit for export	432,000	being	3,857	0	16
Seconds ditto	72,000	. .	642	3	12
Coarse ditto	36,000	. .	321	1	20
Bran and pollard	108,000	. .	946	1	4
Waste	72,000	. .	642	3	12
	720,000		6,428	2	8

I have shown that on the balance of freight and costs, it would be always more profitable for a speculator, should this law pass, to import flour than unground corn; and in that event the positive loss, even on a single cargo, would be no less than forty-eight tons of food for the operative, and forty-seven tons of bran to the farmer—a loss which would be avoided by allowing the law to remain as it is, and thus securing the manufacture to ourselves. I do feel that the more fully this question is investigated and scrutinised, of the more extensive importance will it prove, and the more clearly will it be discovered to be, not only a miller's, but a manufacturer's and an agriculturist's question.

I have to apologise to the House for the length at which I have ventured to address it upon this question; but the importance which I attach to it will, I hope, plead my best excuse. I see in it not merely the immediate injury of the miller, by the depreciation of his heavy stock in hand, but the permanent depreciation of his property embarked and invested in buildings and machinery. I see in it double injury to the operative, by at once augmenting the value of his food and diminishing the amount of his employment; and, above all, I see in it an inevitable blow inflicted upon the agricultural advancement of Ireland. The principle of assimilation between the laws of England and Ireland fails as an argument in this case; and though the measure may be a good one, as regards England, which is already an importing country in the article of flour, it is preposterous as regards Ireland: it is carrying coals to Newcastle, to provide for importing flour into a country which already exports nearly 2,000,000 cwt. of it every year,—unless it be meant to supplant that export. But, if not in intention, it would at least prove in operation, a heavy blow and a great discouragement to the agriculture of Ireland, which is the sole reliance and support of that country. It is on this ground that I rely on the assistance of those who represent the English agriculturists in this House, to resist it. Their security, in this country, lies in making common cause with the agriculturists of Ireland. So long as England has Ireland at her back, as a granary,—as a second Sicily, to supply all her wants,—she has an unanswerable argument in reply to those who seek to supply her with food from the Continent, that she can draw that supply from home, from an integral part of her own empire.

This answer she can have so long as Ireland is in a situation to answer her demands; but if England allows the agricultural protection of Ireland to be invaded or weakened in the least degree, every step by which Ireland shall be incapacitated from supplying her will be an approach towards a dependency on other countries for her food. The present measure is an attack upon the security hitherto enjoyed by the Irish agriculturist: it is so felt in Ireland, and I do firmly hope that I shall have the co-operation of the English agriculturists in resisting it. The Right Honourable Gentleman who introduced the Bill (Mr. Labouchere) seems to consider it a measure of limited practical importance, and operative only in peculiar seasons. I have laboured to show that the contrary is the fact, and that it would prove instantly and actively detrimental. I have endeavoured to show that it would be a violation of public faith, relying upon Acts of Parliament unrepealed for nearly half a century, — that it would cause the immediate destruction of the stock in Ireland, and the ultimate deterioration of her vested property, — that neither the duty proposed, nor the ordinary checks of freight and costs would be any protection to her, — and that, both to the operative, in the price of provisions, and to the agriculturist, in the growth of wheat, it would be a serious and instant injury. And if, in any one of these points, I have succeeded in establishing my case, I conceive I have just grounds for calling on the House to support the motion I now make, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

COLONEL CONOLLY. — I rise, Sir, to second the amendment of my Honourable Friend; and, in doing so, beg to express my surprise that it should have been attempted to consider this as solely a miller's question. Without recurring, however, to the difference between the state of a miller in Ireland and of a miller in England, I wish to state, in concurrence with the views of my Honourable Friend the Member for Belfast, that there have been few things which have contributed more to the moral and social improvement of Ireland, by the check which it has given to illicit distillation, than the gradual change which has of late years been taking place in the tillage of the land in that country, by the substitution of wheat crops for those of oats and barley. There can be no doubt that the miller would be one of the first persons who would be injured by the alteration of the law contemplated in this Bill, inasmuch as he has embarked much capital under the existing system. And as for the cry which has been raised with respect to the inferior crop of the past year, it cannot fail also to be very injurious to the country generally, but more especially to those particular interests which have embarked capital in agricultural produce, and in the encouragement of that system by which the morals of the lower classes in Ireland have been so materially improved. I cannot allow the observations which have been made with regard to the course which was adopted by the late lamented Lord Caledon upon his estates in the county Tyrone to pass over, without bearing my humble testimony to the advantages to which that course has led, in Ireland; and I call upon the county Members to join me, in testifying to the benefits it has produced, and to show how greatly it has added to the welfare of that country. The great improvement which has of late taken place in the habits of the people, and the evident decrease in the system of illicit distillation, owe their origin to the beneficial course which was adopted by that departed Nobleman. By the adoption of this Bill, the House would be injuring those very persons who have been so much benefited under the existing law; and would see, as it has already seen in 1817, very serious consequences ensue to the millers and to the agricultural interests of Ireland. And here I much deprecate that affected regard for the poor of Ireland which has been put forth as so strong an argument in favour of the importation of foreign corn into Ireland, which, it is evident, could not be brought there without, on the contrary, the very worst consequences to the poorer classes of that country. I cannot consider this proposed alteration of the law in any other light than as a blow to the agriculture of Ireland; and, though I was charged, the other night, with having made observations upon the subject which were untimed and uncalled for, I am sure that it is only necessary to have this Bill once introduced into Ireland as the law of the land, in order to insure its universal condemnation. The introduction of such a law into Ireland would at once diminish all the advantages of the present system of maintaining the poor of that country; for, if the law is to be subject to constant changes, the result, of necessity, must be, that capital will be taken away, the agriculturist will be ruined first, the miller will be the next sufferer, and the injury to the lower orders will be worse than all the rest. I deny, then, distinctly, the advantages which it is stated would result from this measure, and I consider they have been sufficiently disproved by the arguments of the speech of the Honourable Member for Belfast; and that, even if there should arise from it, at any time, a trifling advantage, it would never be such as by any means could be balanced against the frequent and general disadvantages to which it would give rise. It has been stated that one argument in its favour is, that it tends to assimilate the law of Ireland, upon this subject, to that of England; and that, I may safely say, has ever been the dearest object of my life. But what Ireland wants is, encouragement to agriculture, which is its mainstay; and if a step is to be taken by which it is shown that the capitalists would first be ruined, and then that the food and support, as well as the morals, of the poorer classes would be injured, I cannot but think that the Right Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) will shrink from the introduction into Ireland of a Bill like this. The millers of Ireland have, no doubt, been of great advantage to that country; and I will take this opportunity of saying that, so far from a measure like the present assisting the good that has been already done, Parliament will never improve, to any very great extent, the people of Ireland, except by taking such steps as will ameliorate their condition throughout. I entreat the Right Honourable Gentleman, then, to sift the bearings of this question thoroughly, before he presses upon Ireland a measure which would be of serious injury to a country that is making such great efforts to raise itself from the inferior state in which it has so long been placed. I shall have great pleasure in seconding the amendment of my Honourable Friend.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I think, Sir, that the alarm which has been expressed by Honourable Gentlemen opposite, with respect to this Bill, rests on very slender grounds. The Bill which is before the House is, in my opinion, founded on just and fair principles, and I deny that it will be injurious to the agricultural interests of Ireland. I must say that I certainly did not anticipate the opposition which the Bill has met with; and I rejoice at the discussion, because I believe it will tend to remove all misapprehensions upon the subject. I rest the defence of this Bill on two principles. First, I say, that in ordinary years, and under the ordinary circumstances of agriculture, the alteration of the law will have no particular operation; and secondly, that when circumstances shall arise to make it desirable that foreign flour should be admitted, as in the present instance, after a crop deficient both in quantity and quality, it is but just to the Irish consumer that he should be put on the same footing as the English consumer, by permitting the importation of foreign flour into Ireland, under the same protection as it is now admitted into England. It is absurd to imagine that in ordinary years, Ireland, which is a large corn and grain exporting country — the granary of England, — would, by the operation of this Bill, be flooded with foreign flour. I would call the attention of the House, for one minute, to a Return, which I hold in my hand, of Irish grain and flour exported into England since 1819, which will show at once how futile this apprehension is, and also the gratifying fact of the increasing prosperity of the Irish agricultural interest. The Return relates to the importations of wheat and wheat flour from Ireland into England from the year 1819 to 1839. It is, in round numbers, as follows: —

Years.	Quarters.	Years.	Quarters.
1819	153,000	1830	529,000
1820	403,000	1831	567,000
1821	509,000	1832	790,000
1822	463,000	1833	844,000
1823	400,000	1834	775,000
1824	356,000	1835	661,000
1825	396,000	1836	598,000
1826	314,000	1837	534,000
1827	405,000	1838	542,000
1828	652,000	1839	258,000
1829	519,000

The last being an extraordinary year. I am afraid of wearying the House with these details; but I also wish to read to the House another Return, showing the quantity of all other kinds of corn and meal exported into England from Ireland during the same period: —

Years.	Quarters.	Years.	Quarters.
1819	967,680	1830	2,215,521
1820	1,415,723	1831	2,429,182
1821	1,822,816	1832	2,990,767
1822	1,063,089	1833	2,737,441
1823	1,528,153	1834	2,792,658
1824	1,634,000	1835	2,679,438
1825	2,203,962	1836	2,958,272
1826	1,693,392	1837	3,030,293
1827	1,828,460	1838	3,474,302
1828	2,826,590	1839	2,240,250
1829	2,307,244

Now, I think that this scale of importation is quite sufficient to show that a country which can export produce to this extent has nothing to fear from the importation of foreign flour, under the same protection as in England, in all ordinary years; and I agree with the Honourable

Member for Belfast that, at such periods, to send foreign flour there would be like sending coals to Newcastle — it would turn out no profitable trade. With regard to the second ground on which I support this Bill, I would ask Honourable Members to notice how very little foreign wheat is directly imported into Ireland from foreign ports. In 1835 there was not one single quarter. In subsequent years the quantity was —

Years.	Quarters.	Years.	Quarters.
1837	. 2,587	1839	. 87,559

In this last year, as is well known, the country was placed under very peculiar circumstances, — there being, of course, from the deficiency in the harvest, a greater demand than usual. I do not pretend to say, however, that there has not been more foreign grain imported into Ireland, which has gone round to English ports first; on the contrary, I know that there is nothing to prevent English millers grinding foreign corn at Liverpool, and then importing it, in the shape of flour, into Ireland. It happened only the other day, that a cargo of foreign flour for Ireland was stopped at the Custom House; and in reply to the statement on the part of the officers of that establishment, that such a trade was illegal, it was urged that the flour had been ground in England; and I caution Honourable Members that they are now, under the present law, actually encouraging English millers to import flour into Ireland; and I have even heard, from very good authority, that lately there has arisen a considerable apprehension of a trade growing up in flour between Dublin and Liverpool. When you have one corn law for England and another corn law for Ireland, I think there can be nothing more reasonable than to put the law as to the importation of flour into Ireland on a different footing from what it is at present. When you have such a state of things as at present exists in that country, — a harvest deficient both in quantity and quality, — I think it but right to ask that the general consuming interest of Ireland shall enjoy the benefit of an importation. If there is no demand for foreign flour in that country, depend upon it there will be no supply; but if there be a demand, I do say that Irish millers ought to have the same protection as English millers; and that if the English have ever been safe under such a system of importation as that now proposed for Ireland, there is no ground for the outcry that has been raised against it in the present instance. The Honourable Member for Belfast says that we shall be encouraging the importation of stocks of flour into Ireland instead of stocks of wheat; and that stocks of flour are more subject to deterioration than stocks of grain; but I ask the House if it will consent to legislate on such grounds as these? Under these circumstances, then, I really do not know that I need trouble the House with any further observations on this subject. My opinion remains, after all that I have heard, unaltered, with respect to the Bill before the House, which I consider to be founded on principles of undoubted justice; and I cannot conceive, whatever the opinion of this House may be on the general question of the Corn Laws, that it will refuse its assent to a measure of such expediency.

Mr. SHAW. — The Right Honourable Gentleman complains that there has never been so much apprehension or alarm expressed on such slender grounds as that which is entertained on the subject of this Bill. I may, I think, fairly retort that a public measure, affecting an important branch of trade, has never before been brought forward by a Minister of the Crown, on grounds so extremely slender as those relied upon by the Right Honourable Gentleman. It is not enough for the Right Honourable Gentleman to say, "Oh! your fears are greatly exaggerated, and the operation of this Bill will be very trifling." It lies upon the Right Honourable Gentleman himself to make a case for its introduction. The Right Honourable Gentleman is about to change a law, under and upon the faith of which he admits that a new and most important trade has arisen in Ireland. In the year 1783, when the present law was enacted, there were, it was stated, but two mills in the whole of Ireland, and they have since that time increased to nearly 2000, affording a ready market to the agriculturist, occupation to the operative, and a supply of wholesome food to the surrounding poor. By the showing of the Right Honourable Gentlemen himself, there has been no demand for this measure, and but a single petition has been presented in its favour. The interest of the miller, the farmer, and the poor man are opposed to it; and under these circumstances, how can the Right Honourable Gentleman be justified in altering an existing law — deranging a system in full operation — causing great alarm in the minds of those who have already laid in a stock of foreign wheat for grinding into flour, and changing all the relations of a trade now the most flourishing in Ireland? The Right Honourable Gentleman has adduced no argument in favour of the Bill, but simply that of assimilation of the law to that prevailing in England. Such assimilation is, certainly, desirable per se; but then it is but a formal and technical good, and not for a moment to be balanced against a real and practical evil. It is true that Ireland is an exporting country, and that therefore in ordinary years the Bill would have no great effect; and therefore there is the less reason for forcing it against the general opinion of those who represent the interests of that country, for undoubtedly it would have the effect — by the possibility it would afford of importing flour in years of scarcity — of preventing those millers who, at the present time, lay in a large stock of wheat, in order to meet those years of scarcity, from purchasing at the only time they have a market in Ireland, — that is, shortly after the harvest, — owing to the poverty of the farmer, as compared with England, where a supply is at all times to be had by the miller. The Irish miller, too, now purchases foreign wheat to mix with an inferior description, while, I understand, two flours of different quality cannot be mixed with the same advantage. Under all these circumstances, then, I shall give my warmest opposition to the Bill of the Right Honourable Gentleman.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS. — It must have been very consolatory to the Gallant Colonel the Member for Donegal — who has predicted the ruin of the agricultural interest from the passing of this Bill — to have heard the Right Honourable Member for Dublin University, who has just sat down. No doubt the Gallant Colonel is not convinced by that most convincing speech of the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade; but he surely must have been convinced by that of his Right Honourable Friend below him, who says, that assimilation of the laws between the two countries is good, and that no possible harm can arise from this measure.

Mr. SHAW. — I really did not say so.

SIR D. NORREYS. — Well, at least, the utmost danger that the Right Honourable Gentleman anticipated by that was, that the millers might, possibly, feel some apprehension from its passing. To me there is another circumstance connected with this Bill which affords great consolation. The agitation which it has been attempted to raise among the country gentlemen about this Bill has utterly failed; they have become too wise to be cajoled any longer by millers and distillers, who, whenever any question is raised which affects their trade, at once try to raise the cry, "The agricultural interest is in danger." The country gentlemen have justly viewed this Bill as a question solely between the millers and the consumers, with which their interest is in no way connected. The fact is, that the millers of Ireland have greatly overrated their own importance, and have mistaken the cause for the effect. Our agriculture in Ireland would have flourished nearly as much, even had there been fewer mills. The millers should recollect that they have had nothing whatever to do with two thirds of the corn which we exported last year; that of 3,400,000 quarters of corn exported, more than 2,000,000 were exported unground. I hold it to be most absurd to say that agriculture has extended because mills have been built. Mills have been built because agriculture has extended. Mills are not built merely because there may be an eligible situation for a mill; but mills are built in eligible situations, where tillage already exists. It is no answer to tell me of the exertions made by individuals for the improvement of their property. The Gallant Colonel or Lord Caledon may have spent their 20,000*l.* or 30,000*l.* on mills, and may have seen their property improve; they may have forced an improvement by their expenditure; but I deny that such is the regular and legitimate course for capital to take.

The milling trade of Ireland has extended; but it is because capital has taken advantage of our great water power. We have rapid rivers, and a climate that amply supplies them. In other parts of the country there are also rapid rivers; but they flow through wastes, which hold out no inducement for the erection of mills. Our rivers are rapid, and flow through the most luxuriant soil: water power and tillage are with us united. But even these advantages would have failed were it not for the English merchants, and for that state of the law in England which really has been the cause of the prosperity of the Irish milling trade. Have the millers thriven through Irish prohibition, or through English protection? I contend that their prohibition has never been of the slightest service to them, or ever will be, until Irish prices shall exceed those of England. Prohibition is not always an advantage. Had the exportation of corn been prohibited, would the prices of corn have been enhanced? I think not; but the contrary: a saleable flour could not, at times, have been produced, and the prices of corn in Ireland would, probably, have fallen. Prohibition, therefore, is not necessarily an advantage. Though the millers have thus had the advantage of the state of law as it exists in England, yet they pretend to be afraid of its extension to Ireland. Have they not increased their manufacture of flour, and undersold the foreign manufacture in that market which regulates the price of flour? Have they not increased, while the returns of foreign corn and flour imported show that the state of the law does not hold out any inducement for the exportation of flour in preference to corn? Must not the price of flour, in England, on an average, be greater than that in Ireland, by freight, commission, and other charges, while they continue to export? Must not, in fact, flour be by so much cheaper in Ireland than in England? Yet, while they find themselves underselling the foreigner in the dear market, they profess to fear the competition of the foreigner in the cheaper market at home. Can anything be more absurd? It is asked, what good will this Bill do? I answer, absolute prohibition of importation is bad. Protect as much as you find requisite; but do not prohibit. Monopolies have been removed from every other trade: in many cases great suffering has ensued to individuals; still the monopoly was taken away. Why should the Irish miller alone have a monopoly, and that against his own countrymen alone? Why should we be left to the mercy of the Irish miller to give us just what sort of flour he pleases? Nay; why should we be left to the chances of the seasons, for I can conceive a long continued drought greatly to affect the price of flour in Ireland. I willingly support this Bill. I am convinced that it can do no harm, even to the millers; and that it may do much good.

Mr. HUTTON. — I shall give my support to this Bill, Sir, because I think that the removal of any prohibition is good; and that, whether there is any very great advantage to be gained by it, or not, the measure is entitled to our support, if we suppose or imagine that we are sufferers by the present system. I agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that the provisions of the Bill would not very often be called into operation; and I assure the Right Honourable and Learned Recorder opposite that, if I thought, for a moment, that the Bill would have any injurious effect upon the agriculture of the country, I would not advocate its adoption. I am willing to admit the great benefits which the Honourable and Gallant Member for Donegal and others have conferred upon their respective districts by the encouragement they have given to agriculture; but I cannot forget that, when, during the last Session of Parliament, a Bill was brought into this House which would have increased a hundredfold the consumption of paper, it was strenuously opposed by the interests likely to be affected by it: and, if every measure is to be opposed upon such a ground as that, I must say that, in my opinion, it does away with the whole force and value of such opposition. When we remember that the millers of Ireland are now a numerous class of persons, there can be no difficulty in accounting for the opposition this Bill meets with; and I do hope that the House will consider the interests of the consumers, and not be induced to throw out a Bill which, I am sure, will be hailed with pleasure by the great majority of the Irish people.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, the opponents of this Bill have asked what occasion there is for it. They have been told, more than once, that it assimilates the law of England to the law of Ireland with respect to the importation of flour; and that it will remove a restriction from Ireland which does not exist in England. Let those who advocate the restriction in Ireland attempt to introduce it into England, if it be a good restriction. This Bill goes no further than to place the corn laws of both countries on the same footing; and to that I can conceive no objection whatever. But besides this theoretic reason, there is a practical one in favour of this measure. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Shaw) is aware that the last two crops in Ireland have been exceedingly deficient in quantity and inferior in quality. The deficiency in quantity is demonstrated by the fact that, last year, Ireland did not export more than one third of the usual quantity into England. One of the advantages of this Bill is, that it will introduce a supply of good dry flour to mix with the damp flour, and thus make it more saleable and wholesome. The Right Honourable Gentleman may be an excellent miller, but he is a bad baker; and I consider the bakers of Dublin to be much better authorities on this subject than the Recorder of Dublin. They have urged on me, in the strongest terms, the absolute necessity of a supply of good flour to mix with that which is now on hand. It is absurd to talk of doing mischief to the agricultural interests of Ireland by such a measure. Year after year, Ireland has been increasing her exports of flour, until the last two years, when the crops failed. Before that time, no one dreamed of importing flour into Ireland; and, if the law had been the same as in England, it would have been totally inoperative, from the fact that Ireland, in all ordinary seasons, is not an importing, but an exporting country. No man dreams of importing an article into a country from which it is exported in large quantities. The importation of flour into Ireland, then, can never become a permanent thing, and consequently no injury can accrue to any interest at present connected with the trade in that commodity. Wheat is allowed to be imported into Ireland from abroad; and why should flour be prohibited? The reason is obvious. You want to give a miserable profit to the millers of Ireland at the expense of the rest of the community. This is solely a miller's question. From whom are they to derive their profit? From the poor Irish consumer; so that you are robbing Peter to pay Paul. The consumers in Ireland wish for a supply of foreign flour, which you refuse, although you let them import foreign corn to be ground in Ireland. If the Irish miller can grind corn as cheap as the foreigner, he will have an immense advantage on the importation of foreign wheat; but if he cannot grind wheat as cheap, why should he be allowed to grind the poor consumer? But there is an additional necessity for the present Bill in the bad quality of the flour now in use. If bad flour does not generate disease in the consumer, at all events it predisposes the body for its reception. At the present moment, typhus fever rages to a fearful extent in Ireland; and in no place is it more prevalent than in Belfast. Do those Honourable Gentlemen who oppose the Bill mean to poison the middle and upper classes with bad flour, and thereby either produce, or predispose, to that dreadful disease among them? That will be the inevitable consequence of rejecting the Bill; for, after all, the question is one of life and death in Ireland.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I ask, would Honourable Members like to use bad flour themselves? Besides, if the crop is deficient in quantity, is not that a question of life and death? I consider the importation of foreign flour to be absolutely necessary in the present condition of Ireland, and therefore I am bound to give my support to the Bill.

Mr. LITTON. — Sir, if ever there was a Bill brought in to benefit the rich at the expense of the poor, it is the present Bill. After the calculations which have been presented to the House, and after the various opinions which have been expressed as to the probable loss or gain to the agricultural interest by the passing of the present Bill, I will not advert to that subject. But I put it to the House whether any individuals in Ireland will be gainers by the Bill except those who use the finest flour? In many parts of Ireland, notwithstanding the assertions made on the other side, the consumption of seconds and thirds flour amongst the lower classes contributes greatly to their sustenance, and frequently relieves them from the misery which they would endure if that supply were not afforded them. And they would be sufferers in another point of view by the passing of the present Bill; for it would diminish, to a great extent, their employment in the only manufacture which is left to Ireland, — the manufacture of flour. Now, it has been said, there is a division of opinion in that country on the subject. But how is that manifested? I have not heard of a single petition in favour of the Bill, whilst many have been presented against it. It has also been said that the Bill will have little effect If so, why introduce it? When a law is introduced, every one expects that it is to be attended with some effect, and the effect of this will be to introduce foreign flour into Ireland. I contend, that, precisely to the extent to which you introduce that description of flour, you will deprive the poorer classes of the means of industry, and of the means of profit, which this manufacture affords to thousands and tens of thousands. In the same proportion that you introduce foreign flour, you will also deprive the lower classes of the means of that food which, in times of scarcity, has been found most beneficial for them. These are the practical grounds on which I shall vote against the Bill. And there is this additional reason, — that, on the faith of the protection held forth to the millers, many millions of capital have been laid out by them, by which the face of the country has been completely altered in many parts. We are bound to protect that interest when we find no other interest in opposition to it; and to prevent the ruin which the present measure may lead to in the case of many private individuals.

Mr. ORMSBY GORE. — Sir, I do not wish to trespass on the attention of the House; but as the debate has been exclusively confined to Irish Members, perhaps it may be necessary that some individual connected with the agricultural districts of this country should state his opinion on the present question. I look upon it as not belonging exclusively to Ireland;—I think it has reference to this country also; and therefore, as I deprecate the slightest infraction of our present corn laws, I cannot remain silent whilst such an important question is under discussion. As Ireland is an exporting country, and England an importing one, and as Ireland exports to England, it appears to me that the more facility you give to the introduction of grain, in any shape whatever, into Ireland, the greater quantity will find its way into this country, and our agriculture will have an additional evil to contend with. Before proceeding further, I cannot refrain from giving my tribute of praise to the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, for the patient manner in which he listened to the representations of the deputation which waited on him the other day; and I must say that his only anxiety was, to make himself master of the subject. But, giving the Right Honourable Gentleman all the credit that is due to him for his courtesy, I confess, with my Right Honourable Friend (Mr. Shaw), that he has adduced no arguments in support of the Bill, for he has entirely confined himself to replying to the arguments of the opponents of the measure. I think it is not fair to ask the House, without ascertaining the opinion of the people of Ireland on the subject, to abrogate laws which were passed by a Parliament resident in that country, after committees, consisting of the cleverest men in Ireland, had been sitting from 1774 down to 1783, when this prohibition was established. I must also say that no necessity has been shown to exist for the present measure, because the corn laws have worked particularly well in Ireland, notwithstanding the prohibition which is now complained of. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin says, that the Bill will benefit the poor of Ireland; but I think the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who spoke last has completely proved the contrary. If you import flour into Ireland, it must be of the finest quality, for no other kind will pay the freight; but what benefit will that be of to the Irish labourer? The habits of the English labourer are altogether different from those of the Irish labourer. The former cannot go through his labour without having flour of the finest quality; and if seconds or thirds were given to him, they would produce an internal complaint which would prevent him from working. Now, that is not the case in Ireland. It may be said, "Introduce the finest flour into Ireland, and give the Irish labourer a better chance of procuring it than he has at present." But will Honourable Gentlemen be content to raise the wages of those labourers from 6*d.* a-day to 20*d.* or 2*s.*? If they will not do that, how are the poor to obtain the finest flour? I contend, therefore, that this is not the poor man's question, but the baker's question. No one else is interested in it. The millers of Ireland are against the measure, and it is also opposed by the landowners and the labourers; and although some of the ports are said to be in favour of it, I consider that to be a matter of considerable doubt. I therefore entreat the Government and the House to pause before they destroy the last manufacture of Ireland. That country was at one time the great staple of the woollen manufacture. England, however, thought fit to transfer that manufacture to this side of the channel, and the linen manufacture was given to Ireland instead thereof. This trade, however, I regret to say, is now in a declining state. Where, I ask, does the greater proportion of the flax that is used, come from? I speak as a farmer, when I say, the best land in Europe for the growth of flax is to be found in Ireland; but still, scarcely any is grown there. In the year 1837, about 30,000 tons of flax were imported into this country from Russia. The duty on foreign flax is almost nominal; and I ask, does not that fact operate seriously against the linen trade, and the agriculture of Ireland? In the two years when the flax crop failed in Russia, Ireland made a more profitable growth of flax than she had ever done of wheat, and yet the linen trade is on the decline. The manufacture of flour is now the only one left to her, and I trust that the President of the Board of Trade will leave well alone; but if he must pass such a measure as the one now before the House, let him postpone it until those who have the deepest interest in its enactment shall have had time to express their opinions upon it. I do not speak as a delegate expressing the opinions of one class of persons, but as a Member of the Imperial Parliament, equally interested in the welfare of every part of the united empire. I say, again, let time be given to obtain an expression of public opinion upon the measure, and if that opinion be favourable to the Bill, no one will be more ready to support it than I shall be; but if the Right Honourable Gentleman presses the second reading at present, I must vote against it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Shaw) has said that my Right Honourable Friend the President of the Board of Trade has done no more than remove the objections to the Bill; and the Honourable Gentleman who succeeded almost admitted in terms that my Right Honourable Friend has silenced the alarms felt on its introduction. Now I maintain that, if the objections are removed, the reasons given in support of the measure are quite sufficient; for the measure proposed is, the removal of a restriction which does not rest on the ground of policy or necessity, and a restriction of such a kind is a positive evil. You have no right to say to the merchant, the importer, the consumer, or any class of the community, " You shall not use certain articles," unless you can show good grounds for imposing a restriction on its use. Therefore, I contend that when the objections are removed, a sufficient reason is given for removing the restriction. If the people of Ireland wish to import or use foreign flour, they ought to have the option of so doing. It is a question of self-interest which each man must decide for himself. You may tell him that he would be ill-advised to use foreign flour, and that he can procure cheaper and better at home; but you cannot teach him that, by legislation. With respect to any danger to be apprehended by the agriculturist or the miller from the operation of this Bill, I think that was completely negatived by the details of the Honourable Gentleman who first addressed the House. He actually showed, with the greatest minuteness, by a number of statistical details, that such danger cannot exist;—he showed that it was better for the people of England to consume the flour ground by the millers in Ireland than to obtain it from a great distance, with the hance of deterioration, besides a considerable duty; — he showed that the interests of the people of England and the people of Ireland are the same in this respect; — he showed that the people of England import a considerable quantity of Irish flour, but very little foreign flour; so that there is no danger in a measure which does not take away the duty on foreign flour imported into England, but only removes the prohibition against admitting flour into Ireland. The Honourable Member said the reasons were twofold: first, the duty on foreign flour imported into England; and, secondly, the near neighbourhood of Ireland. Now, neither of these are affected by the Bill of my Right Honourable Friend, for he does not propose to alter the duty on foreign flour coming into England, nor does he propose to remove Ireland any further from this country than she is at present! I think, therefore, that the present Bill rests upon the general principle, that you ought not to impose restriction or prohibitions without very strong reasons. Mere restriction for the sake of restriction, preventing the subjects of the land from consuming that which they like, merely because you fancy it is their interest, is wanton, useless, and mischievous legislation; and it matters not whether that legislation was introduced a few years ago, or in the year 1788. I think the Irish millers have nothing to fear from a Bill of this kind, and that they may safely rely on their natural resources, their skill, and their energy: and, under these circumstances, it is my intention to support the Bill.

Mr. SHAW. — The Noble Lord must have misunderstood what I said. I did not admit that the Right Honourable Gentleman had answered the objections to the Bill; and I contend that he has shown no reason whatever for changing the existing law.

Mr. BEAMISH. — Sir, as a proprietor of mills, and looking at the whole question of this prohibitory law, I think it quite unavailing as a protection to the branch of trade in which my capital is invested. It is true, that many of the millers have petitioned against the measure, and one petition has been signed by sixty millers, who have invested upward of 200,000*l*. in the trade; but I believe they have been frightened by an imaginary evil. At the same time, I do no think the measure now proposed has bee generally called for, throughout the country; and therefore I would suggest that i ought not to come into operation until ou present stocks are consumed. I believ there is no general complaint of the poverty of the flour. The cry that has bee raised on this subject has emanated fro a few individuals in Dublin, Belfast, an two or three other places, and not fro the community at large. As the prese prohibitory law is useless, I think it woul be better to repeal it; but I trust, as said before, that the Right Honourab

Gentleman will not let the new Bill come into operation before the millers have worked up their present stock.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I am happy to be able to add my testimony to that already given of the kindness with which the Right Honourable Gentleman received the deputation which waited on him yesterday. I did not presume to offer any opinion upon the subject when it was last under discussion, because I thought there might be some reasons for the proposition of the Right Honourable Gentleman; but since that time I have received communications from Limerick, Cork, and various other parts of Ireland, all deprecating this measure. I have not heard that it is called for by any class in that country, and if any petitions have been sent in its favour they must be very few in number. Considering that capital has been laid out to an enormous extent by the millers, I trust the House will pause before it passes a Bill of this description, which must have an ex post facto operation. There are now 2000 mills in Ireland, giving employment to an immense number of persons, most of whom will be deprived of their bread if this Bill receives the sanction of the House. The Honourable Gentleman opposite, who has advocated the removal of this prohibition upon principle, has nevertheless candidly admitted that the alteration ought not to be suffered to have a deteriorating effect on the large stock of flour already on hand. I quite agree with the Honourable Gentleman that the millers of Ireland ought to be permitted to work off that stock, and also that they should be allowed time to collect and express their opinions on the effects of the measure.

Mr. W. ROCHE. — I hope the Right Honourable Gentleman will consent to postpone the Bill, in order to afford the people of Ireland an opportunity of expressing their sentiments on the subject. I have always supported such alterations in the law as I have deemed consistent with the general interests of the country; but this measure has been brought forward so abruptly and unexpectedly, that I should recommend its postponement until the next Session.

Mr. CALLAGHAN. — Sir, in consequence of an observation which has fallen from my Honourable and Learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Jackson), I am induced, though very reluctantly, to trouble the House with a few observations. My Honourable and Learned Friend has received a petition signed by sixty millers — who are my constituents — against the Bill. I, too, have been asked by them to oppose it, and I am anxious to state why I cannot comply with their request. The objections of the Honourable Member for Belfast, who leads the opposition to this Bill, resolve themselves into three grounds. The first is, that it is a measure introduced without any public demand. That may be a good reason to urge against the introduction of a measure of a doubtful character; but when the principle of free trade is so generally acknowledged, this Bill, which comes fairly under the description of a measure for the abolition of an unjust restriction, cannot be found fault with, on the plea that the community is indifferent to its object. The next observation of the Honourable Gentleman was, that the duty on foreign flour is calculated, in reference to wheat, on too favourable a scale. He says, "Whereas, the duty is taken on five bushels of foreign wheat, consisting of 196 lbs., the duty on the same quantity of Irish is calculated on 180 lbs. to the five bushels." The comparison, however, does not tell, for the only question is, whether, at the time the first proportion was struck, 196 lbs. were considered equal to five bushels of foreign wheat. The next objection to the Bill is, that it is calculated to do extensive injury to mill owners. Now, though I have been a miller, and still possess several mills (without working any of them myself), I do not feel at all apprehensive that this Bill will prove injurious to that interest. I know well, and can assert without hesitation, that the improved condition of that interest is not the result of prohibition. I recollect the time when Irish flour met with no favour in the English market, — when it was a sufficient objection to any description of flour that it was Irish; but the wants of the population of Lancashire and Cheshire have quite altered our circumstances, and instead of flour from my country being now rejected, it is sought after. It is to that circumstance, and to that alone, that the Irish millers ought to attribute their prosperity. I am not afraid that the importation of foreign flour will injure the Irish miller in his own market. The foreigner will not send his flour to Ireland when he sees the Irish miller export flour, for the purpose of profit, to England. It is absurd to suppose that the foreigner will seek a trade with a country where the price is low, and neglect England, where the price is high. There is one point, which is the subject of general complaint amongst mercantile men in Ireland, which has not been adverted to by those who have preceded me. The manufacturer of the north complains that when he exports his goods to America, he cannot get flour into his own port in return, but is obliged to pay the charges and commission attending the transfer from English bonding houses. The Irish merchant claims this advantage, not for the purpose of selling the flour for home consumption, but with the view of sending it into England, where it is more valuable. I am glad to be able to state that, with the spread of knowledge, there is a growing confidence in the principles of free trade, and in the abolition of all distinctions. And I must say that, whether as to corn or anything else, I am content with the laws which the English people think good enough for themselves. I entreat the Government, if they are not very much pressed, to put off the operation of this Bill for as long a period as they can; because I must admit that the representations of sixty intelligent mill owners are entitled to some consideration. I am convinced, however, that the more the subject is considered, the less apprehension they will entertain with respect to a measure of this nature. The Irish mill-owners, I think, would much more essentially promote their interests, by demanding the power of grinding foreign corn for exportation to our colonies, instead of allowing that trade to be monopolised, as it notoriously is, by mill owners on the Continent.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — Sir, I am decidedly against any postponement of this measure, which I consider likely to be very advantageous to the people of Ireland. This cannot be considered in any other light than as a miller's question, and their obvious intention is, as has already been stated, to grind the faces of the poor. The discussion which has taken place reminds me of the fact that about eighty or ninety years ago, every person in Manchester was compelled to have his corn ground at a town's mill, kept by two persons of the name of Bone and Skin. The monopoly was found to be exceedingly oppressive, and the following epigram was written on the subject: —

Bone and Skin,
Two millers thin,
Would starve us all, or near it;
But be it known
To Skin and Bone,
That flesh and blood can't bear it.

Mr. F. FRENCH. — Sir, it is quite a mistake to suppose that the question now under consideration has never before been agitated. I beg to remind the House, that a similar measure was introduced in the year 1827, by Mr. Canning, and that it was opposed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, now Lord Monteagle, and by Sir John Newport.

[Loud cries of " Divide, divide!"]

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — Sir, I shall certainly object to any long postponement of the Bill; but, if the House now assents to its second reading, it is not my intention to take a further stage until after Easter, and ample time will then be allowed for further consideration.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Sir, I will detain the House a very few moments.

[Loud cries of " Divide, divide!"]

Is it true that this Bill is necessary for the people of Ireland? Is it true, that the wheat, in Ireland, is so bad in quality, that it is likely to produce disease amongst the people?

[Cries of " No, no!"]

I believe it has been admitted, by every Gentleman who has spoken, that the quality of the wheat is bad; and, if so, can it be used without being injurious to the constitutions of those who feed upon it? I contend, that the most urgent necessity exists for the passing of thi Bill, which ought not to be delayed single day. If it were a Bill for th benefit of the aristocracy, no obsta would be thrown in its way; and request, on the part of the friends of poor, would procure its delay until af Easter. Two Honourable Members, are interested parties, have entreated the Bill may not come into operat until a distant day. If the millers likely to suffer by a Bill of this descr tion, it would be better at once to g them compensation, than to inflict a rious injury on the entire populatio the country. But the truth is, that measure introduced into this House the purpose of cheapening or giv better food to the poor, is sure to with a most violent opposition from tain Members, if it be likely to affect landlords to even the smallest pos extent. The Honourable Gentleman posite (Mr. O. Gore) opposes the because he believes that it will lea the introduction of more flour into country; and all the other Gentlemen who think it an infraction of the present corn laws, oppose it with the utmost sincerity. The conduct of the House on the question of the corn laws, is creating in the public mind a rapidly growing feeling of indignation and disgust.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I tell Honourable Gentlemen that the days of the corn laws, as at present constituted, are numbered. The public feeling is strong against them —— and I defy all the power of the agriculturists to continue them in operation. In voting for the second reading of the Bill, I do so under the impression that it will be proceeded with as rapidly as possible; and that the Right Honourable Gentleman will prevent the millers of Ireland from sending amongst the people that food which is unfit to sustain human life. If it be true that bad food leads to the formation of disease in its most aggravated form, I shall consider that every Gentleman who votes against this Bill will vote for the establishment of typhus fever in Ireland.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

The House then divided: — Ayes 154, Noes 102; Majority 52.

Mr. ALDERMAN THOMPSON.— Sir, in bringing forward the motion of which I have given notice, for the discharge of Mr. Sheriff Evans, I will trespass as shortly as possible on the attention of the House, and endeavour to abstain from saying anything which can, in the slightest degree, give offence to those Honourable Members who originally voted for the commitment of the sheriffs, and who, on subsequent occasions, have determined to continue their imprisonment. I ground my motion on the circumstance, that the authority of the House has been sufficiently vindicated by the long confinement, and the great privations, which the sheriffs have undergone. On Tuesday last, one of these gentlemen was discharged out of custody, after evidence had been given at the bar that his health had greatly suffered, and that any further imprisonment would endanger his life; and I regret to say that, up to this moment, his health has not, in the slightest degree, improved. I do not mean to say that the health of Mr. Sheriff Evans has suffered to an equal extent, but it has been materially affected by his imprisonment, as may readily be conceived, from the nature of the room, and the time which has elapsed since his committal; and I am justified in saying that, if he is detained much longer, it is impossible to foresee what the consequences may be. Another ground on which I submit that the privileges of the House have been vindicated, is this, that the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench have decided that the return made by the House to the writ of habeas corpus was sufficient. But there is also a third ground on which I may justify my motion; and that is, the general admission of the great defects in the law of Parliament with regard to privilege, and that it is impossible that such a state of things can long continue. What is this state of parliamentary law? The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench is opposed to the resolutions of this House, and the consequence is, that if a party obey the orders and directions of that court, he is imprisoned by this House; and if he does not obey them, he will be incarcerated by the court. We were led to expect that, ere this, a declaratory Bill would have been introduced; and unless some such step be taken, those who are compelled to execute the processes of the court will be continually in danger of fine or imprisonment. In what position do we now stand? A writ of inquiry has been left with the sheriffs to summon a jury on Thursday next, for the purpose of assessing the damages in the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard," judgment having been suffered to go by default, and the damages being laid at 50,000*l.* If the sheriff do not execute the writ, he will be visited by the vengeance of the Court of Queen's Bench; and if he do execute it, he will be committed by the House. And let it be recollected, that this does not affect merely the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, but the sheriffs of every city and county in the empire. It is said, out of doors, but I cannot believe that to be the case, that one of the purposes for which the sheriff now in custody is detained, is, to ascertain the feelings of the other House as to a declaratory Bill.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I say that I do not believe it, but that impression certainly exists; and it is strengthened by the fact, that no Bill has yet been introduced, here. I believe every one admits that the sheriffs have acted in the most conscientious manner; and it ought to be borne in mind that their office is a compulsory one, and that if individuals so situated are to be subjected to this kind of treatment, it will be impossible to find any honest or respectable man willing to undertake the office of sheriff. There is one circumstance connected with the conduct of the sheriffs, which I have been requested to explain to the House. They have been charged with contumacy in presenting a petition to the House of Lords. Now, I beg to say, that it was not presented with the view of giving any offence to the House, or of setting its authority at defiance. The intention of the sheriffs was, to make the House of Lords formally acquainted with the situation in which they were placed, in order that it might lead to a conference between the two Houses, and thus afford an opportunity of rendering the law more clear and intelligible. The object of my present motion is, to appeal to the sympathy, to the humanity, and, I would say, to the justice, of the House. I have not at all entered into the question of privilege on this occasion. The House has decided that the sheriffs were guilty, and, admitting that to be so, I contend that the inconvenience and deprivation to which the sheriffs have been subjected, have sufficiently vindicated the authority of the House; and I therefore take the liberty of moving that, the authority of this House having been vindicated, it is the opinion of this House that its dignity and privileges would be best maintained by the immediate discharge of William Evans, Esquire, out of the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. DARBY. — Sir, I rise to second the motion, and I think the worthy Alderman is perfectly justified in bringing it forward, because, after the long debate which took place the other evening, I did not clearly understand the ground on which the sheriffs were detained. I confess, that I entertained the opinion that they were continued in custody because it was intended to bring a Bill into the House of Lords. The Honourable Member for Leeds, a few nights ago, asked why the sheriffs should be released, whilst Thorogood remained in custody, evidently contemplating an exchange of prisoners. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny, last night, intimated that he would not have voted for the committal of the sheriffs, had he been aware that they had not received a regular notice, when it was distinctly stated at the bar that they had received none. What, then, I ask, is the real ground for continuing the imprisonment? Do you mean to make the sheriff a sort of hostage for the safe conduct of a Bill through the other House? Such a proceeding would be most unjust and unconstitutional. In what situation are the sheriffs now? A new action has been brought, and the Attorney General, last night, stated that the law officers of the Crown had not yet made up their minds as to what ought to be done. Do you mean to allow the action to go on? And if you do, is it your intention again to implicate the sheriffs in the proceedings for doing their duty? Or do you intend to stop the action before it reaches the sheriffs? I think that the Noble Lord said it would be impossible to stop the action, and that a Bill ought to be brought in. From that moment, you admitted that you could not vindicate your privileges through the sheriffs, and they ought immediately to have been discharged. If the Noble Lord intends to introduce a Bill, the custody ought not to be continued on such conditional ground. The Honourable and Learned Gentlemen the Solicitor General, in the course of a former debate, distinctly pledged himself to vote for the release of the sheriffs, when the course which he proposed should be abandoned. The Noble Lord repudiated that course, and although the Honourable and Learned Gentleman did not redeem his pledge, when the last motion was forward, I trust he will do so on the present occasion. I beg of the Noble Lord to consent to the release of the sheriff, who, according to his own admission, has acted with the strictest honour and integrity.

Question put.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, the Honourable Gentleman who spoke last seems to have misapprehended what I said. I conceive the state of the case to be this: we are endeavouring to vindicate the power of printing and publishing our proceedings; that power was interfered with by what has taken place, and in consequence of that interference, we voted the sheriffs guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House. How it can be said that our privileges have been vindicated merely by the power of commitment, unless the possession of the privilege be made clear and manifest, I cannot conceive. I cannot find any argument to show that our privilege is clear and undisturbed, and that if it again comes before the Court of Queen's Bench, it will be admitted. I did not say that the privilege could not be vindicated through the sheriffs. I stated, that I thought our powers were ample to vindicate our privileges, but that they were of such a nature, that their exercise might cause great public inconvenience; and rather than see that public inconvenience, accompanied with private hardship, I should be glad to resort to a declaratory Bill. It was not on the ground of any want of power in this House that I made that suggestion, but on the ground of the public injury, and public inconvenience, which might be felt from the assertion of our powers; because, from the manner in which the powers of this House have been exercised in former times, when less disturbance was occasioned by their exercise, no one can doubt that they are of the greatest possible extent. Our compassion has again been appealed to; but I must say, as the case at present stands, the only question is, whether we can yield to the dictates of our feelings, consistently with the vindication of our privilege. Reverse the case: suppose the judges were to issue an order which was, in their opinion, required for the maintenance of law and justice, and a person were to disobey that order, thinking that the judges had lawfully no right to make it—could any man expect that the judges would yield to feelings of compassion, and that they would not grant an attachment, or make the rule absolute? They would state what the law was, and would enforce it. Now, if a court of justice would not give up its judgment to feelings of humanity for individuals, I don't see why we, whose privileges are so important, should be called upon to yield to those feelings. I need only add that I shall give the motion my decided opposition.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—Sir, I do not intend to detain the House many minutes, but I cannot avoid making a remark or two on what has fallen from the Noble Lord. I understood the Noble Lord to maintain the necessity of keeping the sheriffs, because we have not yet vindicated our privileges so as to show that we can exercise them, free and undisturbed. If the Noble Lord intends to keep the sheriff until we can exercise our privileges free and undisturbed, we must uproot the law of the country; and the Noble Lord is prepared to go the full length of the Solicitor General and to make the imprisonment perpetual, so far as the power of this House can extend. The Noble Lord says, "Why are we to show mercy, when a court of law would exercise none, if its orders were disobeyed?" A court of law can show no mercy, for it is bound by the authority of the Crown, and by the judicial oath which is taken to execute the law. But the Noble Lord forgets that the sheriffs are placed in a conflict which they have not sought,—that the court will commit them if they do not act in a particular way, and that the House will commit them if they do; and he therefore entirely loses sight of the question before the House. The present question has been so often discussed, that it would be a mere waste of time to continue the argument; but as I have a motion on which I intend to take the sense of the House after the motion of the worthy Alderman shall have been disposed of, I may as well briefly state the grounds upon which I bring it forward. The first is the illegality of the original order, on the clear and manifest ground that what the House did in ordering the sheriffs to pay the money was, in truth, imposing a fine which the House has no power to do directly, and which it ought not to do indirectly. The money has already been paid to Mr. Stockdale;—to whom, as the Lord Chief Justice truly stated, it belongs as much as the estate of any Gentleman in this House belongs to its owner. If, therefore, you enforce the order, it must be by making the sheriffs pay the money again out of their own pockets; and that will be imposing a fine, which the House has not the power to inflict; and thus breaking in upon one of the main principles of the constitution by exercising a power which does not belong to you. But if that ground be, as it probably will be, disregarded—(and I say so, because, in the present temper of many Members of the House I cannot expect that any arguments, however weighty, will have much influence),—my second ground is, that the circumstances of the case are changed. When you ordered these two persons to pay the money back, you had them both in custody; and, as the order was equally binding upon both, if they had paid the money, it would have come out of their pockets in equal proportions. You have very properly discharged one, and the Noble Lord therefore will not consider the order binding upon him, for you can only enforce it by taking him again into custody; and I can hardly suppose that the Noble Lord would resort to so dangerous an experiment, which would place himself in a ten thousand times more painful situation than that gentleman. Well, then, can you retain the other, and make him answerable for the whole money? You have ordered two persons to pay 640*l*., and you have thought fit, without the consent of one, to release the other. Where is the equality, the justice, or propriety of calling upon the remaining one to pay the whole? Will the Noble Lord take half the money? No, he will not; but if he attempts to enforce the order against the gentleman now in custody, he will find the sense of the country against him. I hope, then, on these grounds, that the House will consider that the proper time has arrived for releasing both the sheriffs. I wish, now, to ask the Noble Lord what steps he means to take with respect to defending any future actions? The under sheriffs desire to know what they are to do. One of them has got a new writ. Is he to execute it? He will be compelled to do so, unless you can save him from the power of the Court of Queen's Bench; and you cannot do that. Punished he must certainly be; and the only question is—by whom? This is certainly one of the most excellent choices which any man can have. You may say that it is more fitting that the punishment should be imposed for disobedience to the House of Commons than for disobedience to the courts of law. But he has taken an oath with regard to the duties which he owes to the court of law, and none with regard to any obedience to the House of Commons. The under sheriff will, undoubtedly, sit on the writ of inquiry, and you must commit him. Will you commit the jury? Will the people of England tolerate that? Will you again shrink from committing the counsel, for it is openly stated that counsel are retained, and they will certainly perform their duty? If you commit the under sheriff, who sits as judge, you will find yourselves in this situation, that you must interfere with the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. Suppose the posse comitatus to be called out,—which is possible,—the military force must be called out to oppose it! Is it desirable that the House should provoke a kind of civil war in the metropolis? Nothing would astonish me less than a conflict in the streets of London, if this course be persisted in. There is yet time for the Noble Lord to save himself from these difficulties. The Noble Lord says the power of the House has not yet been vindicated. He has not been able to establish it by detaining the sheriffs, because the courts deny the power of the House in that respect. But the House has vindicated its power, because it has shown that it has the power of judging of its own privileges; but it has that power only for the purpose of committing. That is the precise distinction. Every step has shown that you cannot succeed; and to keep this gentleman in custody is simply an act of cruelty, which the House ought not to sanction. I therefore trust the House will at once discharge Mr. Sheriff Evans, who has been imprisoned by no fault of his own

Mr. GODSON. — Sir ——

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I hope Honourable Members will not forget that we are now sitting as a court of justice. The real question to consider is, whether the imprisonment of one of our fellow creatures for three and twenty days is not a sufficient punishment for a breach of the privileges of the House. I contend that our privileges have been sufficiently vindicated already.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

What is the meaning of vindicating the privileges of the House? You have heard the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the late Attorney General, the late Solicitor General, the Lord Advocate for Scotland, the Solicitor General for Ireland, the leader of the Liberal party, and the leader of the Conservative party, all of them, say—that you have the privilege now claimed; and is not that sufficient?

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Are you not satisfied, on their evidence, that you possess the privilege? Suppose the sheriff were to say, "I agree with the 195 Gentlemen who voted for the privilege;" would it stand on higher ground than it does at present? But the Noble Lord says, "What I call a vindication of the privilege is, that the House should be satisfied that the Court of Queen's Bench will obey it." Will the further imprisonment of the sheriff change the opinion of the court? The question, then, is, have not the sheriffs been sufficiently punished? Why not fix the punishment? Is it to continue for two or three months, or is it to be prolonged sequence of that interference, we voted the sheriffs guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House. How it can be said that our privileges have been vindicated merely by the power of commitment, unless the possession of the privilege be made clear and manifest, I cannot conceive. I cannot find any argument to show that our privilege is clear and undisturbed, and that if it again comes before the Court of Queen's Bench, it will be admitted. INDIAN EMIGRANTS L COOLIES, ETC.)

LLENBOROUGH. — As I Bill has been introduced into House, having for its object a mission for the emigration of Indian labourers to the Mauritius, I think it is desirable that the House should be put in possession of some information as to the state of those who have already emigrated. I shall therefore move for the following Returns, to which, I believe, there is no objection: — Account of the number of Indian labourers imported into Mauritius in each year from 1833, inclusive; distinguishing the number of each sex: Also,

Account of the number of Indian labourers in Mauritius in 1832, and at the latest period for which a Return has been received: Also,

Account of the number of deaths amonst the Indian labourers in Mauritius in each of the above years: Also,

Account of the number of deaths amongst the Indian labourers on the passage from India to Mauritius; showing the number of deaths in each vessel, and the number of labourers originally embarked therein: Also,

Account of the number of Indian labourers condemned by the tribunal of Correctional Police in each of the above years: Also,

Account of the number of persons, lately emancipated, condemned by the tribunal of Correctional Police in each of the above years, and of the total number of such lately emancipated persons, during the same period.

Ordered to be laid before the House.

PAPERS.

Copy of Treasury warrant regulating the rate of postage on printed Votes and Proceedings of the Imperial Parliament, and printed Votes and Proceedings of Colonial Legislatures forwarded by post: And, also,

Accounts of the revenue and expenditure of the duchy of Cornwall.

Severally delivered (pursuant to Acts), and ordered to lie on the table.

Account of the additions to the life annuities in each of the years ending in January, 1836, 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, and of the stock surrendered in compensation for the same; and also of the amount of life annuities cancelled by death or otherwise in each of the same years. — Ordered to be laid before the House.

Copies of correspondence between the Commissioners of Poor Laws in Ireland and certain magistrates, Henry Podder, Esquire, and others, respecting the election of guardians for the Clonmel union: And, also,

Copies of correspondence between the Earl of Glengall, James Barry, Esquire, and the Commissioners of Poor Laws in Ireland, respecting the election of guardians for the Clogheen union, county Tipperary.

(Delivered on the 12th of August last). —To be printed.

SPAIN.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — My Lords, I am unwilling to give rise to a discussion on the policy of Her Majesty's Ministers with respect to Spain, in the absence of the Noble Duke (the Duke of Wellington), who, as I understand, will not be able to attend in his place to-morrow. I shall therefore postpone my motion relative to the convention of Bergara, which stands for to-morrow, till Tuesday, the 25th instant, when I humbly hope that my Illustrious Friend will be present, — a hope in which, I am sure, all who hear me will join.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

TAKING OF KHELAT.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I beg the attention of the Noble Viscount opposite for a moment. Certain despatches having been presented to this House, and printed, on the subject of the war in Affghanistan, the Noble Viscount moved a vote of thanks to the officers alluded to in those despatches. Since then, we have received intelligence of the capture, by storm, of the important fortress of Khelat by a division of the British forces. I hope the Noble Viscount will lay on the table the papers relative to that achievement, and that he will take into consideration whether it would not be proper and just that the thanks of this House should be given to General Willshire, and the troops under his command, who signalised themselves on that occasion. There is another matter which I wish to mention. When the war in Ava was concluded, the thanks of Parliament were not alone given to the General in chief and the second in command, but to the brigadiers-general, also, by name. Now, it would, I conceive, be very proper if that course — which has not been followed in the recent instance — were henceforth to be adopted in any vote of thanks of this nature which Parliament may recommend.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I have no objection to lay on the table the papers alluded to by the Noble Lord. I entirely concur with the Noble Lord as to the propriety of a vote of thanks to General Willshire, and I think that the vote which has already been agreed to with respect to the services of the army in India, may be amended by inserting his name.

SOCIALISM.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — I wish to ask the Noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government, whether, in July last, he received a letter from the Reverend Andrew Irvine, of St. Margaret's, Leicester, to the effect stated in the letter which I shall now read to your Lordships: —

> St. Margaret's, Leicester, Feb. 11, 1840.
> My Lord, — In July last, I took the liberty of informing Lord Melbourne that the Socialists were making efforts to extend themselves in Leicester, and had advertised for a larger school room, not a little encouraged by the countenance of the Prime Minister, in introducing Mr. Owen to the Queen.
> As an instance of the evil effects of their proceedings, I stated to his Lordship that a youth of fifteen years of age, a teacher in my Sunday school, was in a public office with another clerk, about nineteen years old, who was a lecturer in the Socialist Institution, whither he took him more than once to hear some blasphemous addresses. He then gave him a paper containing many Scripture texts, chiefly denouncing God's judgments against the Canaanites, and added this injunction, "Read these texts, and consider them carefully; and if, after that, you deny that God Almighty is a regular beast, you are a beast yourself, and have no understanding."
> After making this statement, and expressing my regret at Mr. Owen's introduction to the Queen, I offered to communicate any other circumstance that might arise connected with the subject. His Lordship simply directed his secretary to acknowledge the receipt of my letter, and from that day to this there has been no further communication.
> The population of my parish exceeding 30,000 souls, there is large scope in it for the Socialists, who, I fear, are doing much mischief. They have Sunday meetings for lectures, &c., and dances, not of the most decent kind, on the Sunday evenings. It is impossible, therefore, for me to feel indifferent about their proceedings.
> I have the honour to be, my Lord,
> Your obedient servant,
> A. Irvine.
> To the Right Rev. the Bishop of Exeter.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I did receive such a letter.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — May I ask, did the Noble Viscount take any steps in consequence of that letter?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — No.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — Did the Noble Viscount consider that any steps were or were not necessary to be taken?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — To answer that question may lead to an argument on the whole subject, which I am very unwilling to enter into; but certainly, in my opinion, it was not necessary to answer the communication. Indeed, I very much doubt the prudence of the course which this House has adopted with respect to this question.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — Does the Noble Viscount object to this communication? The Noble Marquess the Secretary for the Home Department complained, a few evenings ago, that a clergyman, instead of imparting information to him, had given it to others.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I do not object to this communication. On the contrary, I was obliged to the reverend gentleman for his communication; but I did not answer it, because I was desirous of avoiding a controversy on the subject; — a desire, however, which I fear the Right Reverend Prelate will object to.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — I would beg leave, in rising to present a petition, to make a few observations on the remarks which have just fallen from the Noble Viscount. The Noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government assented, after a long debate, to an Address, which recognised the necessity of a full inquiry being gone into with respect to the evils of Socialism. The Noble Viscount, however, declares, to-night, that in his opinion this House has acted unwisely in taking that step. I sincerely wish that the Noble Viscount had had the manliness, when that motion was made, to state that the course adopted was imprudent, if he thought so. Looking, however, to the high station in which the Noble Viscount is placed, and considering that he agreed to that motion, I conceive that it is his duty to carry its object fully into effect. Indeed the Noble Viscount ought, in my opinion, to feel himself bound to use his utmost endeavours to render that resolution of your Lordships efficient. I think it is very wrong for a Minister of the Crown on one night to concur in such a motion, and afterwards to come down and say that the House, in his opinion, has done a very foolish thing in adopting it. I am astonished that the Noble Viscount did not feel it to be his duty to take immediate steps on the receipt of that letter; because, let me remind the Noble Viscount, that a great part of the case to which it relates rests on the Noble Viscount's own act, an act which he has himself admitted to be at least an indiscretion. It appears, however, that that indiscretion is being followed by evils of the worst kind — by encouragement of doctrines which cannot be entertained by any of Her Majesty's subjects without tending to the destruction of society. It is clear that the society is rapidly increasing in this particular neighbourhood; for it appears by the following advertisement, which was inserted in the Leicester Journal of July last, that they wish to establish a large school: —

> Social Institution. — Wanted to rent a large house, in a central situation, with a warehouse or premises attached, suitable for a school.

What doctrines are to be taught in such a school? That may be inferred from the instance adduced by the reverend gentleman whose letter I have read; an instance which came within his own notice, where one of those Socialist lecturers attempted to induce a young man to pursue a course of the most hideous blasphemy and profanation. If the Noble Viscount supposed that the reverend gentleman was deceived in his information, would it not have been natural and proper for him to inquire of the magistrates of the place whether those evils existed — whether they were spreading or not? If he had done so, I can assure the Noble Viscount the magistrates would have answered that they do exist — that they are spreading — that they have attracted the attention of the magistrates — and that the magistrates are eager that some course should be taken to check them and to put them down. The reverend gentleman, having been rejected by the Noble Viscount, — his communication having been disregarded, — took another course; he applied to the office at which the lecturer of the Socialists, who attempted to corrupt his Sunday school teacher, was employed as a clerk, and the reverend gentleman states the result of his application in a letter which I have received from him this day. The reverend gentleman says, —

> It will be satisfactory to your Lordship to learn that the clerk in the railroad office, who tried to corrupt my Sunday school teacher, was, in consequence of my representations, immediately examined by the board of directors, and, as he avowed a resolute adherence to his principles, even declaring himself so utterly irresponsible for his conduct, that he should feel justified in robbing them, if he thought fit to do so, and that the law which would punish him was a bad law, — he was dismissed from his situation.

However lightly the Noble Viscount and the Noble Marquess may consider these matters, it is, in my opinion, very important that they should be laid before the Government, and that the Government should take due notice of them. The Noble Marquess the Secretary for the Home Department, stated, on a former occasion, that he thought that the clergyman at that time alluded to had not acted properly in not giving information to him, and thus affording him an opportunity of discharging his duty, as he would have done if a proper representation had been made to him. I regret that the Noble Viscount does not appear to be actuated by the same feelings; for information was imparted to him, but he would not act on it. I do not doubt the sincerity of the Noble Marquess in his determination to assert the law with effect; and, trusting that the Noble Marquess will follow up the course he has promised to adopt, I shall not now make any motion on the subject, but content myself with presenting this petition, which is from inhabitants and householders of Mile End in the parish of Saint Dunstan, Stepney, complaining of the alarming progress of the system of Socialism, and praying for the adoption of measures for the protection of morality and religion.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— I certainly did observe, on a former occasion, that, in my opinion, it would have been better, and more in accordance with his duty, if the clergyman, who stated that he was present when an officer of the Government had advocated blasphemous doctrines, had conferred at once with the Government, instead of waiting for six months, and then giving to other parties what he confessed was only an imperfect recollection of the facts. That opinion I still hold. I would not, however, have risen to make even this remark, if I had not wished to read to the House an extract from a letter I have received this day from the Mayor of Leicester, which may perhaps prevent the ill effects of the high-coloured statements made by the Right Reverend Prelate. The mayor says, —

> The number of enrolled Socialists subscribing money to the funds does not exceed 50. In addition, there are 200 candidates for admission, who are placed for three or four months in a state of probation. There is only one place for meeting, and it is a room only 30 feet square. Last year they held frequent meetings, which were attended by many through curiosity. The superintendent of police attended many of the meetings, and reported to the magistrates that everything was conducted in the most peaceable manner.

And he concludes by saying, —

> The mayor and magistrates are watching the proceedings.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — From the statement which the Noble Viscount has read, it would appear that the Socialists in this place do not exceed 300 or 400, and that those are principally attracted by curiosity and the novelty of the doctrines preached. But I believe that many more drink, very copiously, every Sunday, of these blasphemous and pernicious draughts. It appears, from a communication which I have received, that —

> The magistrates have taken no steps hitherto beyond giving instructions to the police to check all illegal acts. Some of them seem, however, very anxious to remedy the evil.

Thus, then, the magistrates confine the application of their power strictly to illegal acts, — to violations of the peace. I, however, when I took the liberty of exposing this system to your Lordships, did not, that I am aware of, allude to breaches of the peace, but to a grave violation of the law, compared with which an ordinary riot is nothing, — compared with which any violent personal outrage does not deserve to be mentioned in the same breath. The mayor of Leicester ought to be taught that he should enforce the law in other respects, as well as with reference to breaches of the peace. He ought to see that blasphemous and immoral doctrines are not openly promulgated with impunity. As to the smallness of the numbers of these Socialists, I shall only observe, that a very few hundred persevering men may, by union and concert, do a great deal in spreading their opinions. I understand that —

> The Socialists are in number about the same as the Unitarians, who have furnished mayors to Leicester ever since the new Municipal Act.

I mention this, not as a charge against the Unitarians, but I allude to it to show what 200 or 300 persons — what a small portion of a religious sect — can do, when they unite together for the purpose of effecting political or other objects. I have only now to move, my Lords, that this petition do lie upon the table.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

INLAND WAREHOUSING BILL.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — When, on a former evening, I asked the Noble Viscount opposite whether any communications had been received from the officers of any fiscal boards in the country on the subject of the probable effect on the revenue of the proposed inland warehousing system, the Noble Viscount answered that such communications were unusual. Now, to show that they are not at all unusual, I hold in my hand a communication of the 26th of August last, relative to certain sugars then in bond, in which the opinion of the Board of Customs was directly addressed to the Board of Trade.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — If the Noble Lord is going to make any motion, he had better give notice of it, and make his statement upon bringing it forward.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — I give notice, then, for to-morrow.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — To-morrow will be a very inconvenient day; say Thursday.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — Very well. On Thursday I shall move for any Reports that may have been received from the officers of the Revenue Boards to the Treasury by the Board of Trade, relating to the extension of the principle of bonding warehouses to inland towns.

AFRICAN TRADE — BUENOS AYRES.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — I wish, also, to give notice that, on Monday next, I shall call the attention of the House to a subject which I have already, more than once, brought before your Lordships; — I mean the state of our commerce on the coast of Africa, and the injuries which it sustains from th aggressions of the French.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — The Portendic story?

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — No, a perfectly new case, — not the "Portendic story," but one of which, I venture to say, the Noble Lord opposite is, as is his wont, entirely and profoundly ignorant. Of that, however, on Monday next. In the mean time, I will ask leave of the House to read an extract of a letter which I received on Saturday week, from a gentleman at Buenos Ayres: —

> We have, at this moment, rotting here, — I mean at Buenos Ayres alone, and without any reference to the other places in this river, — upwards of two hundred cargoes, all ready for shipment to British ports, all the property of British subjects, and all brought down for shipment, in the belief that we have a paid Government at home, which could, and would, protect us; and that its interference would at last have put an end to this iniquitous and illegal blockade. These cargoes, from the nature of the goods of which they are composed, are daily perishing under our eyes, and will, in a short time, become utterly worthless.

The writer proceeds to add, that in which I do not know whether the Noble Viscount immediately concerned will agree with him. "I wish," says the writer, "Lord Palmerston were here." I beg the House to remember that this is a state of things on the third year of which we are about to enter, — a state of things for which, during the last Session, the Noble Viscount opposite said he hoped a remedy could be found, but for which he has this Session said there is no remedy at all; adding, moreover, that it is a state of things to which he sees no prospect whatever of a speedy termination. Now, I beg to say that it is a principle of the English law that there "is no wrong without a remedy," and that such, also, is the principle of the law of nations. If the Noble Viscount would descend from that lofty sphere "in which he lives, and moves, and has his being," and would but put himself in communication with the merchants, traders, and shipowners of this country, and would ask what they think of the protection afforded them, he would hear but one universal cry of censure and condemnation, — he would find one wide-spread, general, unalloyed opinion, that at no former period were the vital interests of the country so frequently and so shamefully assailed. Why is this? It is because the Administration, of which the Noble Viscount is the head, is not respected abroad. And why is it not respected abroad? Because it is not feared. And why is it not feared? The answer to that query is to be found in the statements relative to our naval force, which were recently made by a Noble and Gallant Friend of mine, and also in the extraordinary estimate of what "constitutes," — or, rather, I should say, of what does not "constitute" — the character of naval and military men, as it was explained by the Noble Viscount on the occasion to which I have alluded.

EAST INDIA PRODUCE.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — May I ask, has the Noble Marquess opposite any objection to refer to a Select Committee the petition for an equalisation of duties, which he presented from the East India Company the other evening?

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — On another day, I shall be prepared to answer the question.

TRANSFER OF AIDS BILL.

Brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

LAW COURTS.

A Bill, "to repeal so much of an Act of the forty-third of Elizabeth, intituled, 'An Act to avoid trifling and frivolous Suits in Law in Her Majesty's Courts in Westminster,' and of an Act of the twenty-second and twenty-third of Charles the Second, intituled, 'An Act for laying Impositions on Proceedings at Law,' as relates to Costs in personal Actions, and to make further Provisions in lieu thereof," presented by Lord Denman. — Read a first time; to be printed; and to be read a second time on Monday next.

On presenting this Bill, —

LORD DENMAN said: — My Lords, the object of this Bill is to provide that, in all actions for trespass, either of person or property, and in all actions of libel or slander, where damages under 40*s*. are awarded, such damages shall not carry costs beyond the amount of the verdict. This will be found to be a regulation of considerable importance, inasmuch as actions for small libels are constantly occurring, which are only introduced for the sake of the costs.

LORD LYNDHURST. — Hear, hear!

LAW OF EVIDENCE.

A Bill, "to remove Doubts as to the Competency of Persons, being rated Inhabitants of any Parish, to give Evidence in certain Cases," presented by LORD DENMAN.— Read a first time; to be printed; and to be read a second time on Monday next.

PRISONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Report of the amendments (which stood appointed for this day) put off till to-morrow; and Bill to be printed as amended.

PAPERS.

Copy of the Charter of the University of London; Copies of the Regulations in Arts, Laws, and Medicine; and a List of the degrees conferred by the University of London; distinguishing the seminaries where the candidates were educated (delivered on the 28th of January last).—To be printed.

Adjourned.

Five to be the quorum.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, " An Act for naturalising Charles Fiers."

THE POST OFFICE.

Mr. WALLACE. — In reference, Sir, to my notice of motion upon the paper of this evening, for copies or extracts of all the information that has been furnished by the authorities of the Post Office to the Right Honourable Member for Harwich, &c., with the particulars of such verbal communications — if any — respecting an anticipated or probable deficiency in the Post Office revenue, as alluded to by the Right Honourable Member, in the debate on the financial state of the country, on Thursday, the 13th instant, I beg to announce to the House, that I find that my motion is not strictly regular, because it has reference to what took place in a former debate; and as it is always my wish to avoid any irregularity where the forms of the House are concerned, I beg to withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. HERRIES.—In consequence of the step now taken by the Honourable Gentleman, in withdrawing the notice which he has given, on the ground of irregularity, I beg to say, that the House will do me a great favour, if it will allow me to offer a very few words,—and this on account of the anxiety I feel on behalf of others — really not on my own account. Every Gentleman who has read the notice which appears on the paper for this day, will form his own judgment on the propriety of that notice. Upon so much of it as relates to myself, I shall offer no observations; but there are others concerned in this notice which appears on the Votes of the House of Commons, on behalf of whom I have felt it my duty to beg permission of the House to say a very few words. I mean, when I use these terms, to refer to the officers of the Post Office, who are designated, in the notice of the Honourable Gentleman, as the "authorities of the Post Office," and with respect to whom it is proposed that the names of such persons shall be laid on the table of the House for furnishing information to me, whether direct or indirect, written or verbal. Now, Sir, those Gentlemen have, all of them—as we in this House must have—characters in society to uphold, which, to them, are of the utmost value. It is therefore very important ——

Mr. WALLACE. — Sir, I rise to order.

[Loud cries of Oh, oh!" and, "Hear, hear!"]

Mr. HERRIES. — I am in order.

Mr. WALLACE. — I have risen to order, and the Right Honourable Gentleman is guilty of an irregularity in persisting to address the House.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Mr. HERRIES.—I am speaking to the question of order, and I believe that it is within the rules and orders of the House, that any Gentleman may ask leave of the House to address it, and it is within the power of the House, if it be their pleasure, to hear him. If it be not the pleasure of the House to hear me, I shall not persist in the observations which I was about to make; but, if it be their pleasure, I shall proceed.

[Cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

I was about to say, Sir, that it was on the behalf of those gentlemen to whom I have referred, and on whom a reflection has been cast by implication, that I ask permission of the House to offer a few words, and what I have to offer will be very short. What I have to say is simply this, — that with any of those persons, from Lord Lichfield and Colonel Maberly, — from the very highest down to the very lowest clerk or functionary, I have had or held no communication, direct or indirect, whatsoever.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I declare, on my honour, as a gentleman, that I have not received from any one of those persons any sort of communication or intimation, of what was going on in relation to these charges of the postage, or within the Post Office, whatever. This is my statement. This is the declaration which I had to make, and the object of my statement was, to discharge what I believe to be upright, honourable, and faithful public servants, from any possible stigma that might otherwise attach to them from the Honourable Member's motion; — and that they may not be exposed to any suspicion of want of probity in the discharge of their public duty, or of fidelity to their superiors, — a suspicion which must be injurious, not to them, only, but to the public service, as it could not but sow distrust between them and their superiors in office.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Mr. WALLACE. — I declare that I am exceedingly gratified by the statement which we have just heard from the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite.

[Laughter.]

At the same time, I am desirous to refer to what passed on a former evening. The Right Honourable Member is reported to have said, the other evening, and I believe he did say ——

The SPEAKER. — I feel it to be my duty to interfere on this occasion, because, I am sure that if the Honourable Gentleman goes on, he will transgress one of the rules of the House. I may venture to say, that, having received notice of the Honourable Gentleman's motion, when I saw the terms of it, I did intimate to him that it was irregular, and that he should withdraw it: that he could not prove what the motion proposed to do, without violating the rules of the House. I also feel, that if he now persevere in the observations he is making, it becomes my duty to tell him he will be acting out of order.

Mr. WALLACE. — Then I can only say, that, having heard the statement of the Right Honourable Member, I beg to assure him, and the House, that I give most entire credit to that statement, and that, not wishing to convey any impression whatever, that would be disagreeable o the Right Honourable Gentleman himself, or the officers of the Post Office, I beg to withdraw my notice altogether.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ASYLUM SCHOOLS.

Mr. Langdale gave notice that he would, on Thursday, the 27th inst., move an Address to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to direct the commissioners for the Asylum Schools at Chelsea, Southampton, and Greenwich, to make such modifications in the regulations therein, in force, as may secure to the children of Roman Catholics and of Protestant Dissenting soldiers and sailors, if duly qualified, the benefit of those establishments, without the sacrifice of their religion.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

Mr. WALLACE. — I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether (as has been stated in a petition presented this evening) he has received instructions from Her Majesty's Ministers to prepare a legislative enactment to put an end to the differences now prevailing between the Scoth Church and the civil power?

The LORD ADVOCATE. — I have merely to state that I am not aware on what authority that statement has been made; but, in point of fact, I have not received any such instructions. I have only to add, that the Government is perfectly aware of the existing difficulties, and that the subject is under their consideration; but I am not prepared to say when Parliament will be consulted on the subject, and still less what will be the nature of the measure which they may feel it their duty to propose.

THE RAJAH OF SATTARAH.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to ask whether the dethronement of the Rajah of Sattarah has actually taken place, or whether Her Majesty's Government have confirmed the proceedings which occurred, in this case, at Bombay? and, if so, whether there will be any objection to lay on the table such documents as may fully explain these proceedings?

SIR J. HOBHOUSE. — No decision has yet been come to with respect to the deposition of the Rajah of Sattarah. At the same time, I beg to observe that, though that decision might be confined to the Secret Committee, yet, in a matter of so much importance, I wish to have the assistance of the East India Company. When the proper time arrives, and a decision shall have been made, I shall not have the slightest objection to lay all the documents connected with the case on the table.

CHINA.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I beg to give notice that, to-morrow, I will ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs when he will name a day on which the promised papers respecting the recent occurrences in China will be laid on the table?

PERSIA.

SIR J. GRAHAM.— I also give notice that I shall then ask the Noble Lord whether the Government is prepared to state what progress has been made in pursuance of the promise held out in Her Majesty's Speech of the restoration of our amicable relations with the Schah of Persia?

Mr. MACKINNON. — I beg to ask the Secretary of the Admiralty, having been requested to do so by several engineers, whether the Commissioners appointed to examine and report respecting harbours of refuge on the south-eastern parts of the island have yet made any Report; and also whether the Commissioners have taken into consideration the disadvantages of backwater, whereby those harbours will be rendered of no use?

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — Hitherto, the Commissioners have made no Report. Their attention has been directed to the subject, but not to the particular point to which the Honourable Member refers; but as it is one of importance, I have no doubt it will receive their best attention.

H. M. S. VOLAGE AND THE CHINESE.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to ask the Secretary of the Admiralty whether any despatches have been received from Captain Smith, the commander of the Volage, with respect to the recent affray which is reported to have taken place near Macao?

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — I am not prepared to say that any despatches have been received at the Admiralty.

BRITISH FORCE (SPAIN). — PENSIONS.

SIR R. PEEL. — I beg to give notice that, to-morrow, I shall move for Returns of the pensions granted from the year 1834 up to the present time. I shall also move for a Return of the number of marines, ashore and afloat, on the coast of Spain, distinguishing upon what service they are employed. Also, a Return of the amount and description of stores advanced to Spain under the provisions of the Quadruple Treaty, and the money received from Spain on account thereof; and also for a Return of any arrangements made with Spain for the settlement of the claims of British subjects.

CORN LAWS.

Mr. WILLIAM DUNCOMBE.—Perhaps the Honourable Member for Wolverhampton will now inform the House when his motion about the corn laws is likely to come on?

Mr. VILLIERS.—I beg to say I shall bring on my motion respecting the corn laws on the first day at which I may find it possible to do so after the 20th of March.

TITHES COMMUTATION.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL.—I move to refer the Tithes Commutation Acts Amendment Bill to the following Members: — Mr. Fox Maule, Sir Edward Sugden, Mr. Hayter, Mr. Darby, Mr. Hodgson Hinde, Sir Robert Harry Inglis, Mr. Freshfield, Mr. Miles, Mr. Greene, Sir Charles Broke Vere, Colonel Wood (Middlesex), and Lord Viscount Mahon.

Mr. F. MAULE.—I should wish to add some names to that list of the Committee, and also to take this opportunity of correcting an error which I find I committed on Wednesday evening, in stating that all the Tithe Commissioners approved of the Bill. It was, I find, submitted to three, and only two out of them assented to it.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN.—I will take the same opportunity to ask whether these several clauses of the Bill were submitted to the whole of the Tithe Commission, or whether they were inspected and sanctioned by two, only, out of the three Commissioners?

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL.—To two, only.

PRINTED PAPERS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I have now to present the petition of Messrs. Hansard, stating that another action has been commenced against them by John Joseph Stockdale, and praying the instructions of the House. I shall first move that it be read, and then proceed to move the Order of the Day on "Printed Papers," for the consideration of a former petition of the Messrs. Hansard.

The petition was then read by the clerk.

(It stated that a further proceeding, being a fifth action, had been brought against the petitioners in the Court of Queen's Bench by John Joseph Stockdale, for the publication of certain papers in obedience to the Orders of that House, and they prayed the direction of the House as to the course which they should pursue.)

SIR E. SUGDEN.—Perhaps the Noble Lord will allow me to ask whether it be true that Mr. Howard, the attorney of Stockdale, has brought an action against the son of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I have received no official information on the subject. If so, I presume that it will have been stated in a petition to the House.

The Order of the Day was then read, for consideration of the petition of Messrs. Hansard (presented 13th February).

Entry in Journal of 18th March, 1836, read, as follows:—

Mr. Fox Maule presented, pursuant to the directions of an Act of Parliament, Report of the inspectors appointed to visit the different prisons of Great Britain.

Ordered, That the said paper be referred to the Select Committee on Prisons.

Entry in Journal of 22d March, 1836, read, as follows:—

The order made upon the 18th day of this instant March, for referring to the Select Committee on Prisons the Reports of the Inspectors of Prisons, was read, and discharged.

Ordered, That the said papers do lie upon the table, and be printed.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—The motion which I am about to make to the House is a consequence of the resolutions to which the House came two days ago respecting the present action. It has been determined that Messrs. Hansard should be directed not to appear or plead to that action, and therefore it is now incumbent on the House to declare what course they will pursue in vindication of that privilege of publication which they have frequently asserted. It will be unnecessary for me to enter into the question of the possession of the privilege of publication by this House, or into the question of appearing in a court of law. The only question to be considered now is, what course the House will take to vindicate the privileges they have so often asserted, and in order to prevent the consequences of that action being—that Stockdale should receive from Messrs. Hansard any sum of money as damages for any publication made under the authority of this House? It appears to me that the most proper course which we can take at present is, to resolve that the action is a contempt of the House, and a breach of the privileges of the House, and that any person who shall act in pursuance of the said action will incur the displeasure of the House. I propose to move a resolution to that effect, having especial reference to the officers who may be engaged in carrying on the action; and also that information of the same be conveyed to the proper quarter. In the first case which the House had to deal with, the information given to the sheriffs did not come directly from the House.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!"]

A communication was made by a servant of the House to the sheriffs; but it did not come directly from the House in that particular action. In the present case we have had an opportunity of giving this more formal notice to the sheriffs. I think, therefore, that the proper course would be, to give the sheriff the advantage of that information, which shall merely point out the consequence of any measures he may take in violation of our privileges. It appears to me, that if we are determined to maintain the privilege of publication, and if we are also determined, with respect to this action, that we will not plead before the judges on the question of our privilege, it is quite necessary that we should interfere in the way I propose, in order to prevent any mistake or ignorance as to the consequences of enforcing the action which has now been brought. I will therefore move, "That John Joseph Stockdale, by commencing and prosecuting the action now depending at his suit against James Hansard, Luke Graves Hansard, and Luke James Hansard, and in which a notice has been given of executing a writ of inquiry on the 20th day of this instant February, such action being brought for acts done by the defendants as the officers and servants of this House, and under and pursuant to the authority of the orders and resolutions of this House, made in exercise of the privileges of Parliament, has been guilty of a contempt of this House, and a violation of the privileges thereof; and that all sheriffs, under-sheriffs, agents, bailiffs, officers, clerks, and others, who shall act, aid, or assist in the continuing, furthering, and prosecuting the said action, will also be guilty of a contempt and violation of the privileges of this House, and subject themselves to the severe censure and displeasure of this House." Supposing this resolution to be carried, I will then move, "That a copy of this resolution be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms upon the sheriff of the county of Middlesex, and the under-sheriffs thereof, and at the office of the said sheriff."

SIR E. SUGDEN.—I shall be quite as brief as the Noble Lord has been upon this subject, considering the many discussions it has already undergone. I wish only for a moment to draw the attention of the House to the consequences that may arise from this further step which we are now about to take at the suggestion of the Noble Lord. The resolution now proposed would, if carried, include judges and counsel. It includes and names "all sheriffs, under-sheriffs, agents, bailiffs, officers, clerks, and others." Amongst those comprised in the resolutions, must be included the judges, for the under-sheriff sits as a judge. Therefore the resolution goes to affect the under-sheriff and the counsel who may plead before him. It appears to me, that the House has already had difficulties enough to contend with. We have abstained, hitherto, from meddling with the judges and counsel who have been concerned in all the measures that have been taken in connection with this business up to the present time. The House has not, as yet, had the courage to bring any member of the bar before it, because they knew that it would be utterly impossible to do that without grappling with the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench. You have not called to your bar the counsel who pleaded in the former actions. But if you pass this resolution, you will be bound, by it, to punish the under-sheriff who may sit as judge, and direct the jury; and you will be bound, also, to punish the counsel who plead before him. I had hoped that the majority of the House were, at length, prepared to take a different course from that which they have been hitherto pursuing. Though the decisions that have been come to, hitherto, have been the decisions of the majority, it by no means follows that they are, on that account, correct. Those decisions, no doubt, may be called the voice of a majority; but the voice of a majority is not always the voice of reason. There has, I admit, been a triumphant majority in support of that view of this question in which I do not concur; but that majority has assumed a tone of feeling very different from that displayed by the minority. That minority was respectable in numbers, and certainly they were so in point of talent and competency to deal with this question, and they maintained their opinion with moderation as well as firmness. But, notwithstanding this, I have to complain that, upon this occasion, all the courtesies of the House have been forgotten. I ask the Noble Lord whether he can defend the course he took on Friday night? The Noble Lord, on that occasion, refused to state his intentions, though repeatedly requested to do so. He refused to do so, not because he was unprepared, but because some person at this side of the House might cavil at the course he intended to pursue. I must say, that the minority have acted with great forbearance, and with a great desire to conciliate the majority; and the time will come when that majority will admit that those who sustained the opinions of the minority were not so wrong as they now think them to be. One thing, however, is certain; — it has been the anxious wish of many Honourable Gentlemen in the minority to conduct their opposition without any ill feeling whatever. I now call upon the House to pause before they take this further step, the effect of which must be, to involve them in still greater difficulties, by bringing them into collision with the bench and the bar. I say, then, that this contest must end in the utter defeat of the House, unless they address themselves to some other power beyond that on which they are now relying. I therefore enter my protest against this resolution, and shall certainly divide the House upon it, notwithstanding all the Noble Lord has said in its favour.

SIR CHARLES GREY. — I have witnessed, from the first, with great anxiety, the conduct pursued by the members of the legal profession at the other side of the House. They have acknowledged that the House possesses the privilege of publishing their proceedings, but they have thwarted the only method by which that privilege could be vindicated. I confess that my anxiety was deepened into pain when I saw the Honourable Member for Exeter, and the Right Honourable Member for Ripon, who were members of the Committee from which these resolutions proceeded ——

SIR E. SUGDEN.—I beg the Right Honourable Member's pardon; I was not a member of that Committee.

SIR CHARLES GREY.—The papers, within the last two days, have stated, that the Honourable Gentleman had asked leave to be removed from the Committee.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — The Honourable Gentleman is confounding two Committees.

SIR CHARLES GREY.—The mistake is of no importance. The Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon, then, without being a member of that Committee, — he who stands so high in his profession, and who has filled offices of great importance, and whose opinion is justly so much esteemed, — he was acquainted with the resolutions which emanated from that Committee, and was in Parliament when they were adopted by the House; yet he now opposes all the measures that were founded on the proceedings of that Committee for the vindication of those privileges which the resolutions went to uphold. I think that the course which the Right Honourable Gentleman has taken is calculated to involve the House in increased difficulty, and to aggravate a mischief which, at the same time, I am willing to give him credit for wishing to avert. The Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon has asked the House, whether or not it was prepared to listen to the voice of reason. Now, was not that as much as to say that the House would not listen to the voice of reason unless it adopted the course marked out by the Right Honourable Gentleman? The Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter has admitted that the House possesses the privilege of publishing its proceedings to the people of England; and this is nothing more nor less than saying that we possess the privilege of publishing our proceedings to all the world. Therefore, with the highest legal authority on the other side in favour of the privilege of publication, I would ask the Honourable and Learned Gentleman how he can reconcile it with his own admission of this privilege, to permit actions of this kind to be continually brought against the servants of the House? If the Honourable and Learned Member thinks that our privilege should be maintained, and that there is a possibility of the decisions of the courts being against us, I ask him what course he, as a lawyer, would recommend, for the purpose of putting a stop to those actions? The Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter has said that we should not have prevented the other actions from being carried to the higher tribunals, and that Mr. Hansard should have been allowed to appeal to the judges in the Exchequer Chamber, from the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, and afterwards, if necessary, as an ultimate appeal, to the House of Lords.

For my own part, I do not hesitate to say, that this might have been the advisable course to pursue, provided that it could have been accompanied with such a reservation as would have afforded the House an ample protection of their undoubted privilege, and that the House should not be excluded, by any adverse decision of the Exchequer Chamber or the House of Lords, from any ulterior steps which it might deem it expedient to adopt. I think that it might have been the better course to have gone on with the proceedings, and to have taken our chance — if I may make use of such an expression in reference to such a subject — of having the whole body of the judges in our favour, and of thus overruling the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. If, as has been admitted on all hands, we possess this privilege, it would be a gross dereliction of our duty, as the trustees and representatives of the Commons of England, to abandon that privilege, or to fail to take those steps which may be most likely to secure its maintenance. I would put this question to the members of the legal profession in this House who have acknowledged that we possess the privilege of publication, but who would have the House stop short in its present proceedings, and allow an appearance to be entered to those actions; — "what would you do if the decision of both the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords should be against you? Do you know whether the Members of the other House would support this House in the vindication of this privilege; and would they then lend their aid in resisting the decision of the lower courts?" If the House could not be sure of this, is it possible, or would it be prudent, to do less than to adhere to the steps that the House has already taken, if it do not intend to abandon its privileges, and suffer the decision of the tribunals to govern its proceedings? I cannot help feeling that those Honourable and Learned Members who act in this way do not acknowledge that the proceeding against the servants of the House was similar to a proceeding against the House itself; for I think that if, before any tribunal, an attempt were made to attack the House in its — I will not say corporate, for it has none, but in its — collective capacity, they would at once repudiate it. For my own part, I cannot see any distinction between acting against this House in the aggregate, and proceeding against its servant for acts ordered to be done by the House. I beseech the Honourable and Learned Gentlemen opposite, before they proceed further in their opposition to the vindication of the privileges of the House, to consider how much they lower the dignity and authority of this House, throw our proceedings into doubt, and add to the mischief that already exists. There is no difference, in my opinion, between an action in the courts of Westminster against an authorised resolution of the House, and one against the proceedings of the House itself.

The House then divided; when there appeared — For the resolution 146, Against it 75; Majority 71.

The resolution was then agreed to.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I now move that copies of the former resolution be communicated by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the sheriffs and under-sheriffs of Middlesex, the clerks, officers, bailiffs, and other parties taking part in the proceedings.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether it is intended, under the term "other parties" in the resolution, to include the juries?

LORD J. RUSSELL.—It is not so intended.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—I wish to remark, that although I entirely approve of the course hitherto pursued, I think that the House should not stop here. Mr. Stockdale and his attorney, Mr. Howard, have been committed for an aggravated breach of the privileges of this House; and, after continued caution, persist in acting in contempt of our privileges. I think that these parties ought not to be allowed to go on with their repetitions of the breaches of privilege they have already committed, without visiting them with extraordinary punishment, and with more severity than has hitherto been done, both as regards the conduct of Stockdale and Howard. The House has already committed them for instituting an action against one of its servants for acts done by its orders; and as they seem determined to persevere in their actions, in contempt of our undoubted privileges, they should be punished with increased severity, in order to show that this House is not to be trifled with, and that it will not suffer parties to persist in pursuing a course almost calculated to bring its authority into contempt.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL.—I wish to know what the Noble Lord means by extraordinary punishment?

An HONOURABLE MEMBER on the Opposition benches. — Oh, to hang them, I suppose.

[Laughter.]

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I think that they ought to be placed in more strict custody, and not be allowed to communicate with each other, or receive visits from their friends, and that no person should be allowed access to them without an order from the Speaker. In this manner, they might be prevented from committing further breaches of the privileges of the House.

Mr. LAW. — I thought, from what has fallen from the Noble Lord, that he was going to revive, in this case, the punishment peine forte et dure. These individuals have passed from our hands; — they are no longer in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms; they are already in the custody of the keeper of Newgate, and subjected to most of the rules and restrictions of that prison; but the Noble Lord, whose appetite is great and his stomach unbounded in its desire for punishment, would have them subjected to still greater severity! But, let me ask, does it become this House to act with the angry and vindictive feelings of an individual? I am sure that, in doing so, it would depart from that calm and dignified conduct which it ought to preserve in the eyes of the country. I do hope that, whether or not the Noble Lord may succeed in the severity extended towards the moiety of the Sheriff of Middlesex, the House will deal more leniently and calmly, and less under the influence of stormy passion, than the feelings of some would urge it to do. Would it, I ask, be consistent with the dignity, the calmness, of a deliberative body, that those whom we have committed should be treated with the strict severity of a criminal prison, and be denied that access which is not refused even to felons? If the House stamps proceedings like these with its sanction, it will show to the country that it is not acting with calmness, but is influenced by feelings of vengeance. It will convince the public that our proceedings were not instituted for the protection of the ends of justice, or for the vindication of the privileges of this House, but for the purpose of exercising a tyrannical power. If we wish to produce this impression, we cannot pursue a better course than that recommended by the Noble Lord.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — As far as I understood the Noble Lord, he did not propose to inflict any such harsh punishment on these persons as has been supposed by the Honourable and Learned Member — who is, himself, such an example of calmness, — but that such access should not be afforded to them as would tend to facilitate the bringing such actions as the present. I will not, however, say whether the suggestion of the Noble Lord should be adopted, or not; but I feel satisfied that the privileges of this House could be effectually vindicated by proceeding with that calmness and discretion which are necessary. Is the House aware that this is the fifth action which has been brought by Mr. Stockdale against the servant of this House? And is it not the duty of the House to interfere, and to take care that these parties shall not be allowed to proceed with actions involving continued breaches of the privileges of this House? I think that the House could restrain the attorney from acting for Stockdale, and prevent other persons from carrying on actions in Mr. Howard's name. At present, that person can employ his clerks and apprentices to act for him in these actions; and if we establish the principle that Howard shall not act himself in these actions, by imprisoning him for so doing, we should follow this up, and not allow any person to go on with them in his name. The name of the person who seems, at present, principally employed in these actions is Pearce, who, I understand, is clerk to Mr. Howard, and a stop should be put to his proceedings. I regretted the necessity of acting against those who were obviously actuated by a mistaken sense of public duty; but, with respect to this Stockdale and his attorney, I entertain no such feeling, and, above all, in regard to the latter, who had no public duty to perform, and without whose aid the privileges of this House would not be violated in this way. I rose to observe, with respect to the suggestion of the Noble Lord, that it is obvious that he did not wish that we should proceed vindictively against those persons, but that we should adopt such restrictions as would render it more difficult for those parties to continue to violate the privileges of the House.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I asked the Noble Lord whether he intended to include the jurors within the words "other parties," and I understood the Noble Lord to answer in the negative; but the expression is so vague and general, that it might be made to include the jury as well as any other persons. I thought that the Noble Lord, from what has taken place to-night, would see the inconvenience that resulted from his refusing to communicate to the opposite side the slightest information as to the course that he intended to pursue. I repeat that such comprehensive terms as "other parties" might be taken to include the jury that would be called upon to assess the damages in this case, for no Member of this side of the House has had the means of informing his judgment on the subject until within the last few minutes, as the Noble Lord, on Friday, refused to communicate the course he intended to take. Under these circumstances, I shall feel it to be my duty to oppose this resolution, the terms of which, I maintain, cannot be understood. I beg to congratulate the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland on his suggestion, and I should be glad to hear from him how, if it were adopted, he intends that it should be followed up. I can tell the Noble Lord opposite, and Honourable Gentlemen, that the more they persist in their present proceedings, and the more rapidly they follow out the course which they have recently pursued, the sooner they will perceive the almost innumerable inconveniences which must infallibly follow from their proceedings. The Learned Member for Dublin has also recommended that we should pursue a course which would tend to restrain parties from bringing these actions. When I heard such recommendations, I could hardly imagine what proceedings it was intended to recommend to the House to adopt. There have been instances of the tyrannical exercise of power by Parliament before now; and it is a matter of history that in the reign of Charles I. a House of Commons was found, which ordered the torture to be administered in support of its privileges. The Noble Lord may say that he did not intend to recommend the infliction of torture; but he recommended solitary imprisonment, which is rather unusual: and when once we engage in a contest of this kind, we may be driven further than we at first intended; and I have alluded to the conduct of former Parliaments to show that even the infliction of torture is not without a precedent. I would beg the House to consider what they will be led to by pursuing the course they have embarked in, and neglecting to listen to the voice of reason. The Noble Lord will not believe that the great body of the people are against him in his proceedings in this matter; but, with the exception of the miserable petition from the corporation of Leicester, which was regarded as a godsend by Gentlemen opposite, and which was so loudly cheered by them, there has not been the slightest indication of public opinion in favour of the proceedings that have been adopted on this occasion by the other side of the House.

Mr. INGHAM. — It appears to me that the House should act with extreme caution in the proceedings which they adopt, lest they should find themselves involved in a contest with the legal authorities of the land before they are aware of it. With respect to the suggestion of the Noble Lord for placing these persons in solitary confinement, or for increasing the severity of their imprisonment, I would beg to remind him that the regulations of gaols are framed in conformity with an Act of Parliament, and, therefore, they are not directly under the control of the House, and cannot be altered by it. When a party, therefore, is sent to a prison, under a warrant of the House, he is not dealt with according to the good pleasure and wishes of those who sent him there, but according to the rules for the government of gaols laid down by the law of the land. This power is to be exercised by the visiting justices appointed under the Act for the regulation of prisons.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The Right Honourable Member for Ripon has censured me, and the majority of the House, for not listening to the voice of reason. I certainly plead guilty to the charge, if the voice of reason is to be equivalent to the advice of the Right Honourable Gentleman. I do not for a moment doubt the sincerity of the Right Honourable Gentleman; but he must excuse me for not attaching the same authority as the Right Honourable Gentleman does to his own opinion on this subject. When I found so many high legal and high political authorities adopt an opinion directly opposed to that of the Right Honourable Gentlemen, and concur in the view that I took of this subject, I am induced to think that I have listened to the voice of reason, and that both the reason and authority in the opposite opinion outweigh even the authority of the Right Honourable Gentleman. As for the want of courtesy with which I have been charged, I cannot help observing, that when I recollect the attacks made on the majority, and when I also recollect that Gentlemen opposite are greatly disposed to impute tyrannical motives to those who wish to preserve the privileges of the House, the charge came with a bad grace from Gentlemen opposite. As for the observation which fell from my Noble Friend, I cannot help saying, that a not very fair construction has been put upon it, and that an attempt has been made to attach a meaning to my Noble Friend's words which they will not bear. I am of opinion that the proposal of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, that to determine that the servants or clerks of Mr. Howard, or any person employed by him to contravene the orders of the House, should be rendered liable to the displeasure of the House, would be a better mode of proceeding than that of increasing the severity of the custody of the persons already imprisoned. As so much has been said on this occasion, I think it necessary to recall to the House what is the main object of the present proceedings. The main object is to maintain the power of publication for useful purposes. The object we have in view, and which has been contested, is that of ordering information which is useful for Parliament and for the public to be published; not for any private purpose — not to serve any private malignity — not to gratify any bookseller or individual with gain, but to make public, information which is necessary for the public — which is required to improve legislation — which is required to improve government. This is contested; but I have an authority to quote — the authority of a person who has been often quoted against me, and which authority I find set forth in a newspaper of this morning. In summing up in the case of "Beresford v. Easthope and Black," Lord Denman has delivered an opinion which is well worth the attention of the House. The Noble and Learned Lord has said, —

> Then the only question remaining was that of damages. On that subject there was no question made at the bar, and there could not now be a doubt in any place whatever, that it was desirable that free discussion should be encouraged, and that facts, in which all were interested, should be fully made known to the world; but, at the same time, no party must attack the character of another by reports which could not be substantially proved to be true, unless such reports appeared under particular circumstances. For instance: the publication of the proceedings of this day would probably be held in all the courts to be protected, if the report were fairly given as a report of a judicial proceeding, with which it was of importance that all men should be acquainted. But nobody must insert statements of his own in newspapers, without being prepared to establish their truth.

Now, this is what I and the majority of this House contend for, and this opinion which I have read, according to the newspapers, was pronounced by Lord Denman in the course of a case which was tried no longer ago than Saturday last. What the majority complained of in the course of these proceedings was, that the court of law took it for granted — as the majority thought, most unfoundedly — that the House of Commons was engaged in publishing a series of libels for the sake of libelling, — the House of Commons having, all the time, no interest but to make public that which it is for the public interest to know; having no private enmity against any individual — having no wish to make gain or profit by the sale of the publication; and under these circumstances it was that the majority of this House held that a court of law was not entitled to look upon such publications as other than privileged publications. Suppose the House of Commons were to assert that a judge had no right, in a court of law, to make any statement reflecting on the character of an individual; that it was not to be permitted that in a public court, full of spectators, anything which could be deemed a slander should issue from a judge on the bench. Such an assertion as this would be equally unfair and absurd. It is well known that the judges, after hearing what has been adduced before them, repeatedly, in their charges, have made statements reflecting on the character of individuals; but this was done in the course of their judicial duty, and from no private desire to injure the individuals, or to indulge private malignity. If, then, the judges are admitted, by the House of Commons, to be right in what they did in this matter, some respect ought to be paid by the judges to that high court, which is constituted by the united Commons of the empire: and they ought not to have taken it for granted — they ought not wantonly to have believed, that it could be the object of the House of Commons to publish private libels upon any individual. I say this because the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has again raised so much of the question, and it does appear that what Lord Denman said on Saturday was very applicable to the case.

But there was another remark of the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, followed by the Right Honourable Gentleman near him, which calls for observation. They have talked of the enormities which they said had been committed in former times, — the lengths to which former Parliaments have gone, — the tyrannies which have been exercised against the subject by former Parliaments. I can not hear such language made use of, with regard to our ancestors, and our predecessors in this House, without declaring my opinion in favour of those Members generally, as to the course which they pursued on the occasions referred to; for the contest which they sustained was, in reality, whether liberty of speech should be permitted, or not. The utmost extremities had been put in force against them. Members of the House were committed to prison by James I. His successor came down to the House in person, for the purpose of putting down freedom of speech; and in the days of Charles II., the attempt was renewed, on the part of the Crown, to put down liberty of speech and liberty of action in the Members of this House: that was an attempt to establish despotism in this country; and I do not hesitate to say, Speaker Williams, and those men who acted with him in this House against such attempts, have deserved well of posterity, for the noble stand they made. They may, in certain and particular instances, have gone to an extreme point in executing their authority against individuals; but the contest they maintained was a contest of liberty against slavery; and I will never admit that the conduct of those men deserves to be stigmatised by Members of this House, as though the House were ashamed of the men who have established for the House the privilegs of speaking its mind. I have thought it necessary to say thus much, because, though living in different times from the period in which those men lived,—though I do not apprehend any such danger from the Crown now, as that threatened by the monarchs I have mentioned, yet I feel that, if attempts are made in this House to depreciate the authority of the House, — if Members are allowed, without check, to cast a slur upon those men who so gallantly contended for the liberties of the House, in former times, and to hold cheap the authority of the House, in times present, though it is impossible to say what authority might not be set up in its place — (it is a question whether it might not be replaced by some supreme and arbitrary tribunal, or some oligarchy, odious and oppressive to the people; but) — this is certain: that such a course would, in the end, destroy all the value and dignity of the House of Commons, and, with these, the best security for the liberties of the people.

LORD ELIOT. — I should be the last man in this House to call in question the great national services performed by the House of Commons, at the periods to which the Noble Lord who last spoke has referred. I reverence the memory of those men, one of whom was an ancestor of my own, who were concerned in those proceedings; and I trust that I estimate them too justly not to acknowledge the benefits which they have conferred upon the cause of public liberty. But it should be recollected that in those times the judges were the mere creatures of the Crown, dependent upon the will of the Sovereign, and subservient to his purposes, and not, as now, men who held their situations independently. There does not appear to be, at present, the least disposition to invade the privileges of the House for any such purposes as formerly influenced our opponents. I think that, in the present times, there may justly be apprehended to arise more danger from the usurpations of majorities of this House, than from anything which could possibly proceed from the judges.

Mr. M. ATTWOOD. — I understood the Noble Lord to say that his resolution was not intended to include juries. I think the House ought distinctly to be made acquainted with the intentions with which this resolution has been brought forward. I fully believe that the proceedings we are called on to adopt will prove ineffectual, and will only involve the House in increased difficulty.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — It will be necessary to ascertain the service of the notice.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — In order to carry out the suggestion of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, it will be necessary first to examine Mr. Luke James Hansard, the party on whom the writ in the new action has been served by Howard's clerk. I therefore move "that Mr. Luke James Hansard be now called to the bar."

That gentleman then appeared at the bar, and was examined, as follows: —

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.—Have you been served with the notice of the writ of inquiry in the fourth action? — I have.

When? — On Wednesday, the 12th of this month.

By whom? — By a person whose name I have understood is Pearce, and who is stated to be a clerk of Mr. Howard.

Did you ask him any question? — After the document was served, I asked him if this was in continuation of the former action, and he replied that it was.

Have you been served with a writ in the fifth action? and when, and where, and by whom? — I have been served with a writ in the fifth action. It was served on me in our counting-house, in the course of last week, by, I believe, the son of Mr. Howard. It was the same person who served me with the writ in the fourth action. He said he was the son of Mr. Howard.

Mr. LAW. — Do you continue to sell the publication which has been complained of as libellous? — I have some copies of it, but it is considered to be out of print.

Is it, in point of fact, out of print, or what do you wish the House to understand by saying that it is out of print? Have you been advised by any one to discontinue the sale? — I have not been so advised. We have no copies now for sale — none besides the reserved copies.

Is it always the practice to keep any number of reserved copies? — It is the invariable practice. I had no other reason for discontinuing the sale than the necessity of keeping reserved copies.

Mr. HUME. — Is it not always the practice, when the number of copies on hand are reduced to fifty, to stop the sale, and reserve those to be issued only to special orders? — This is the practice, and it was in conformity with that, that I stated that the Report was now considered to be out of print.

Mr. LAW. — Have you had any communication with Mr. Joseph Parkes, on the propriety of putting a stop to the sale of those copies? — I have not.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — Can you tell the exact day on which the last copy was sold? — I cannot, without having reference to our books.

Mr. LAW. — Have any instructions been given to your partners to stop the sale of those copies? — I believe that no such instructions have been given.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I now move that Mr. Howard, junior, and Mr. Pearce, clerk to Mr. Howard, senior, be called to the bar of this House.

Mr. LAW. — I hope my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General will not press his motion. I can assure him, that if he perseveres, he will have a great deal of trouble on account of the number of committals that must necessarily take place; and I think that a sufficient number of persons are already in prison for the same offence. I therefore hope that this motion will not be persevered with.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I certainly shall press this motion, for I think, unless we do so, our proceedings may be set at nought. If we are not to commit the clerks who act in furthering these proceedings, I do not see what use it is to keep the employers themselves in custody. We have no spite to Mr. Howard; we merely want to prevent fresh actions from being brought. How are we to repress these proceedings if Mr. Howard's clerks are to be permitted, with impunity, to carry out Mr. Howard's object, in utter defiance of the House? I am aware that a great many persons have professed a readiness to become heroes and martyrs, after the example of Mr. Howard; but I think that if the House proceed with rigour, it will have much more success than the Honourable and Learned Gentleman seems to anticipate.

Mr. SHAW. — Now, I would ask the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, does he believe that, even if he incarcerate Mr. Howard's whole establishment, the proceeding will be effectual? There will be hundreds of other attorneys ready to do their duty, if called on by clients to do it.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — In answer to the Right Honourable Gentleman, I will put another question. Does he believe that the House has any privileges? or that it has power to maintain those privileges?

Mr. SHAW. — I admit that the House has privileges, and ought to maintain them; but the way to maintain them effectually is, not to exceed their proper limits. It would be much better for the House to plead to the proper tribunal, — to appeal, if necessary, to the House of Lords; and then if an Act, declaratory or enactive, were required, there would be no difficulty in passing it.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I would suggest to my Honourable Friend not to divide the House on his amendment. I think that the discussion on this motion should be postponed.

Mr. LAW. — Sir, I am willing to accede to this suggestion of my Right Honourable Friend; but I am afraid that if we let the man be caught, he will have little chance of getting off through any motion I may make.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—Sir, I quite approve of the motion proposed by my Honourable and Learned Friend. I cannot refrain from observing that the suggestion which I myself threw out has been commented upon by Honourable Gentlemen opposite with what appears to me, to use the mildest term, extreme severity. But that opinion, notwithstanding all that has been said, I am by no means inclined to retract or modify. I still conceive that, to vindicate the outraged privileges of the House, it will be necessary to increase the severity of the imprisonment of the parties now in custody in Newgate. Let us remember what are the facts of the case. After a full notice from this House, that in persevering they would be guilty of a contempt of our privileges, Messrs. Stockdale and Howard brought forward another action, and were, consequently, committed to Newgate. And now, at the very moment when receiving their punishment, they prepare to aggravate the contempt, and defy the House by commencing a fifth action. Now, Sir, I say that, if we are to punish a party at all for the purpose of vindicating our privileges, — if we are to trust to those powers which the House of Commons exercised in former days, — we should make our punishment effectual when we see the contempt aggravated and repeated. This House, in former times, has acted with all due severity towards those who defied it; and had it not been for the boldness and decision which the representatives of the people in those times displayed on such occasions, the House of Commons of the present day would have no privileges at all. It is perfectly obvious, that the only object which actuates these individuals in their proceedings against the House of Commons, is pecuniary gain. Their case presents none of those extenuating circumstances which that of the sheriffs may be said to exhibit. I can perfectly understand the reluctance of Honourable Members to proceed harshly against the sheriffs, who, perhaps, acted from a mistaken sense of duty; but with respect to Messrs. Stockdale and Howard, I think that the whole conduct of these individuals has been full of circumstances of aggravation, and it has become a matter of strict and necessary justice to increase the severity of their custody. It should be remembered, that though this severity may be increased, it does not follow that it is to be of long continuance. It will be for the offenders to display a due submission to the authority they have hitherto defied, and the House will then, doubtless, show to the country that its object has not been, as Honourable Gentlemen opposite assert—revenge, and the indulgence of a vindictive malignity, — but justice, and the due assertion of our indispensable privileges. Now, the Honourable and Learned Member for the University of Dublin has asked how we could aggravate Mr. Howard's punishment? I will tell him, that I believe it perfectly competent to this House to order them into the strictest confinement which prison discipline would allow. As to the Prisons Act, which has been referred to, I do not see that that Act has anything to do with the prisoners, or they with it. They do not come under that Act at all. As the case stands, they are not subjected to the discipline which ordinary prisoners come under. The custody to which they have been given over is quite of a different kind. There is, doubtless, something in what has been thrown out by the Honourable Gentleman opposite, touching the inconvenience of multiplying the commitments of inferior and subordinate agents; but I believe that increasing the severity of the custody in which Messrs. Stockdale and Howard now are, and debarring them from all access to each other, or to other persons, would greatly promote the object which the House has in view. As to the suggestion that the House can be actuated by any personal feeling towards persons of this description, — such an idea is quite out of the question: they are persons quite beneath any such feeling on the part of the House of Commons.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I could wish that the Noble Lord, who recommends increased severity, knew the feeling of the country on the subject. I have been down in the country, and have given the toast, "The Sheriffs, with three times three!" with immense applause, at a large public dinner. For my own part, I hail this tyranny on the part of the Liberal Gentlemen opposite with very great satisfaction; inasmuch as, from the universal feeling of disgust it is creating throughout the country, it will be sure to prove the downfall of the present wretched Administration.

Mr. GODSON. — I wish to observe, that while the sheriffs are in custody, they have no opportunity of carrying out the wishes of the House. It would be but fair to give them an opportunity at least of doing so, by suffering them to go free.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That —— Howard and —— Pearce, clerks of Mr. Thomas Burton Howard, do attend this House to-morrow.

FIRST FRUITS AND TENTHS.

Mr. BAINES. — Sir, I wish to bring under the consideration of the House a subject involving the interests and the public estimation of one of the most numerous and important orders of men in the state. And, as the object that I seek to attain is a great practical reform, by the removal of a grievance which has existed in one of our principal public institutions ever since the Reformation, I venture to claim from the House its patient attention; — that object is, a competent maintenance for the poor clergy, to be effected by a more equitable distribution of the revenues of the richest ecclesiastical establishment in the world, and of which, they are the most efficient ministers. On several former occasions I have urged the claims of the poor clergy in this House, and asked for them that support which it was intended to afford them by Queen Anne's Bounty; but of which, as I conceive, they have been hitherto unjustly deprived. When I had last the honour to make this motion, which is for a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the propriety of abolishing the first fruits of the clergy, and making the real tenths conducive to the more efficient augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy, I was so fortunate as to carry my motion by a majority of two to one; and I hope that the arguments I have now to adduce will secure to the cause I advocate equal and ultimate success. I then entered at some length into the historical details of the first fruits and tenths; but it will be sufficient, now, to say, as the subject is better understood, that these are ancient imposts paid by the clergy — as ancient, I believe, as the formation of parishes in England — and the payments have, from the Conquest to the Reformation, been generally upon the real and true amount of the sees and benefices. At the Reformation, Henry VIII., having determined that the first fruits and tenths should be paid into the public Exchequer, caused a strict valuation to be made of all the livings in England and Wales, and this valuation was recorded in the King's Book, usually called the Liber Regis. He also caused an Act of Parliament to be passed (the 26th Henry VIII.), by which it was provided, that every bishop, dignitary, and beneficed clergyman should pay the whole of his first fruits and tenths into offices appointed for the purpose; and that any person who should neglect to make such payments should be considered as an intruder into his living; that he should be subject to expulsion; and that he should pay, as a penalty, double the amount of the sum that he had withheld. In this way the payments were made till the time of Queen Anne, when Her Majesty, moved by Bishop Burnett, determined to alienate the payments from the Crown, and to appropriate the produce of the taxes, fruits, and tenths to the augmentation of the livings of the poor clergy, and a charter of incorporation was granted to a dignified body of men under the designation of the "Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty." Loud and general were the eulogiums pronounced upon the Queen for this act of royal munificence. Addresses flowed in from all parts of the kingdom; but the clergy were amongst the most prominent in their expressions of gratitude. I hold in my hand a memorable address passed and presented upon that occasion; it is from the Archbishop, Bishops, and Clergy of the province of Canterbury, assembled in convocation on the 15th of February, 1704, and is in these terms: —

> We, the Archbishop and Bishops of the Church of England, together with the clergy, do most humbly beg leave to express the great and deep sense that we have of your Majesty's most tender compassion for the poor clergy of this church, who have hardly wherewith to support themselves in the exercise of their ministry, and of your Majesty's gracious intentions, even by bestowing your own revenue to make a provision for them, in such a manner as you were pleased to declare in your Majesty's late message to the House of Commons. We cannot be thankful enough for so singular a blessing as we enjoy in a Queen who has recommended our holy religion to her subjects by the great example she has set them, and particularly by such signal instances of piety and charity as not only render > her the joy and delight of all true Christians of this age, but leave those effects behind them for which Her Majesty will be blessed in all succeeding generations.

The province of York, emulating the example of the metropolitan see, also addressed Her Majesty; and their Address, which I also hold in my hand, expressed, in still more pointed terms, their gratitude and admiration of the Queen's conduct and bounty. They said, among other things, that Her Majesty had removed the great, if not the only, blemish of the Reformation, by making a competent provision for the poor clergy, and they declared that her pious and charitable example would be highly acceptable to God; that it would have its effect upon all her subjects, and especially upon the clergy. As a further proof of the high expectations that were raised by the Queen's bounty, I may mention the distinguished persons who were appointed governors of the fund. These were, the whole bench of bishops, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Her Majesty's privy councillors, the lords lieutenants of counties in England and Wales, the deans of the several cathedral churches in England and Wales, all the judges, the chancellors and vice-chancellors of the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the Lord Mayor and aldermen of the city of London, &c. &c. To show how deplorably those sanguine expectations were blighted, I may mention the amount of the receipts and the expenditure of the fund of Queen Anne's Bounty during the year 1838, which I take from a parliamentary paper just issued, and which exhibits the following results: —

Receipts from the bishops, dignitaries, and beneficed clergy in England and Wales in the year 1838, into Queen Anne's Bounty Fund, and charges upon the fund during the same period: —

Receipts —
As first fruits and tenths . .	13,579
Disbursements —
Paid for salaries, fees, rent of offices and taxes	6346
To be divided amongst the poor clergy, amounting to from 7000 to 8000, being about 20*s.* each, if distributed to the whole number	8233

But the House will inquire how so fair a promise of competency for the poor clergy came to be so wofully disappointed? The answer is this: — the Bounty Act conferred a clause which has been perverted, so as to make the payments nominal instead of real, and to confine them to the valor of King Henry VIII., instead of giving to the poor clergy as to the rich clergy the benefit of the continually increasing value of sees and livings. The passage in the 2d and 3rd of the Act of Anne, c. 11., which defeated the just expectations of the Sovereign, and consigned so large a portion of the clergy to poverty, occurs in the last section of that Act, but it was, in reality, only intended, as the title of the clause shows, to allow the clergy to give one bond for the payment of their first fruits, instead of four, as had hitherto been the practice. The clause runs thus: —

> And whereas four bonds for four half-yearly payments of the first fruits, as the same are rated, have been required and taken from the clergy, to their great and unnecessary burden and grievance; for remedy thereof be it enacted, that from and after the 25th of March, 1704, one bond only shall in such case be given or required for the four payments of the said first fruits, which said first fruits as well as the tenths payable by the clergy shall hereafter be answered and paid by them according to such rates and proportions only as the same have heretofore been usually rated and paid.

It has been contended that the words "the same rates and proportions" only meant the same value, and that as the clergy had hitherto paid the first fruits and tenths upon the valuation made in the reign of Henry VIII., that they were in all future times to continue to pay upon the same valuation, however much the livings might, meanwhile, have increased or decreased in value. But this supposition is directly at variance with the Act of Henry VIII., which provided that fair valuations should be made from time to time, to prevent those livings that might increase in amount from paying too little, and those that should have diminished in amount from paying too much. I will undertake to prove that the construction attempted to be put on the disputed words, by rendering the valuation permanent and unalterable, cannot be sustained. Suppose the case of a living returned in the Liber Regis at the value of 500*l.* a-year, but reduced to 100*l.* The account would stand thus at the end of an incumbency of ten years: —

Ten years income at 100*l.* a-year .		£1000
Payment for first fruits .	£500
Payment for tenths, being 50*l.* a-year . . .	450
		950
Total amount for ten years' maintenance of bishop or rector, being 5*l.* a-year . . .		£50

I shall next proceed to show how great is the difference between the real first fruits and tenths, and the sum actually paid into Queen Anne's Bounty Fund; and I will instance the living of Lambeth.

This rectory was returned in the Liber Regis, on which the first fruits and tenths were paid, as of the value of 32*l.* a-year; the tenths being 3*l.* 4*s.* yearly, but the actual value, as returned to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners by the present rector, was 2277*l.*; and the account stood thus: —

Real amount of first fruits .		£2277 0
Ditto of tenths . 227 × 9 .		2043 0
		£4320 0
Sum paid as first fruits .	£32 0 0
as tenths £3 : 4 × 9 =	28 16 0	= 60 16
Difference in one living on an incumbency of ten years, to the disadvantage of the poor clergy . . .		£4259 4

This is by no means a singular or an exaggerated case; such instances are extremely numerous, as I will show in the observations that I shall have the honour to address to the House. I shall not, however, rely upon my own opinion in a matter of this consequence, but refer to high legal authority. Lord Chancellor Eldon, though he was not in favour of the higher orders of the clergy paying the first fruits and tenths to the full amount, admitted in his speech upon this subject in the House of Lords, that the words "according to such rates and proportions, only, as the same have, heretofore, usually been rated and paid," referred not to the value of the livings remaining the same, but to the rates and proportions to be paid on the value. That is the whole question. If the words do not imply an unaltered value, they do not bear out the construction that on a former debate in this House was put upon them by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, or by the late Solicitor General. But I will proceed to show by high legal authority, as well as upon the principles of justice and common sense, that there is no legal impediment in the way of the first fruits and tenths being paid upon the real value; and I may mention an Act of Parliament passed in the first year of the reign of George I., c. 10., which enacted and required that the bishops, who were the acting and the real governors of Queen Anne's Bounty Fund, should make a re-valuation of the ecclesiastical livings in England and Wales, on their improved value, for the benefit of the poor clergy. Why that object has not been carried into effect, I will not pretend to say; but I will proceed to quote the legal authorities to which I have referred, to show that these ancient imposts ought to have been paid, and ought now to be paid, on their full value. I shall first quote the authority of the late Mr. Agar, one of Her Majesty's counsel.

Mr. PLUMPTRE. — I think that this is a subject of too much importance to be discussed in so thin a House, and I therefore move that the House be counted.

House counted accordingly; and forty Members not being present, the House was adjourned at eight o'clock.

APPEALS.

Persse v. Persse. — Further heard, and adjourned to Thursday next.

De Montmorency v. Devereux. — To be heard on Thursday next.

LORD CROFTON took the oaths.

TRANSFER OF AIDS BILL.

Read a second time; Committee negatived; and Bill to be read a third time on Thursday next.

PRISONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Amendments reported (according to order); Bill to be ingrossed; and to be read a third time on Thursday next.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House met at two o'clock, and Mr. Speaker and the House (pursuant to the notification of yesterday) proceeded to Buckingham Palace to present to Her Majesty the address of congratulation on Her Majesty's marriage.

The Speaker resumed the chair at five o'clock.

QUEEN'S MARRIAGE — ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

Mr. Speaker reported Her Majesty's answer to the Address, as follows: —

"I thank you for this dutiful and affectionate Address. It is with great satisfaction that I find that an event, in which my feelings are so deeply interested, has been attended with so many manifestations of joy among my people, and has called forth expressions of loyal attachment from my Parliament."

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Hull Docks; Norwich Improvement (No. 1.); Wexford Harbour and Embankment; Clyde Navigation. — Petitions for Bills severally reported; Reports severally referred to the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

In the following cases, petitions for Bills were severally reported, and Bills ordered to be brought in, as follows: —

Wear (River) Watch, — By Mr. Alderman Thompson and Mr. Andrew White.

Shrewsbury Cemetery, — By Sir Richard Jenkins and Mr. Slaney.

Rocester and Derby Junction Road, — By Mr. Edward Buller and Mr. William Evans.

Glasgow Poor Rate,—By Mr. Oswald and Mr. Dennistoun.

Scottish Widows' Fund,— By Mr. Gibson Craig and Mr. Attorney General.

Tower Ward Improvement, — By Mr. Crawford and Sir Matthew Wood.

The following Bills were severally presented, read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time; namely, —

Birmingham and Derby Junction and Tamworth Approach Bill, — "To make a further Alteration in the Line of the Birmingham and Derby Junction Railway, and an Approach thereto at Tamworth, and to amend the Acts relating to the said Railway."

Macclesfield and Congleton Road Bill, — "For repairing and improving the Road from Macclesfield to Congleton, in the County of Chester.

London and Greenwich Railway Bill, — "To amend and enlarge the Powers and Provisions of the second Act, relating to the London and Greenwich Railway."

Taff Vale Railway Bill, — "To amend the Acts relating to the Taff Vale Railway."

Fiers' Naturalisation Bill.

Hagbourne Inclosure Bill. — Read a second time, and committed to Mr. Robert Palmer and the Berks list.

Edinburgh Market and Petty Customs Bill; Edinburgh Gas Bill. — Severally read a second time, and committed to Mr. Gibson Craig and the South Scotland list.

Freethorpe Inclosure Bill. — Read a second time, and committed to Mr. Wodehouse and the West Norfolk list.

Edinburgh and Leith Gas Bill. — Read a second time, and committed to Mr. Attorney General and the South Scotland list.

Wimborne and Piddletown Road. — Mr. C. F. Ponsonby presented petitions in favour of the application,—from Lyme Regis; Exeter; Wimborne Minster; Axminster; and Dorchester. — To lie on the table.

On the motion of Mr. C. F. Ponsonby, the petition of Charles Castleman, for leave to proceed with the Bill (presented 17th February), was read.

Mr. C. F. PONSONBY. — I now move that leave be given to bring in a Bill for making a turnpike road from Piddletown to Wimborne Minster, both in the county of Dorset, with branches, and also a certain other road in connection therewith.

Upon the question being put, —

SIR E. KNATCHBULL said: — Sir, I feel bound to oppose this motion. This is, in point of fact, an appeal from the Report of the Standing Orders Committee; and I will, in a few words, state the circumstances of the case. The object of the petition is, to obtain the leave of the House to bring in the Bill, notwithstanding the Report of the Standing Orders Committee; and it states that the Standing Orders were complied with in all respects, except that the dotted line, showing the proposed cuttings and embankments, was not marked on the plan. The surveyor did that which he thought would show more clearly the intention of the parties; but as, by that course, he neglected to comply with one of the Standing Orders of the House, the Committee, although giving every credit to the surveyor for his intentions, thought it their duty to report that the Standing Orders had not been complied with. I do not imagine that any inconvenience would result to the public if the parties were allowed to proceed with their Bill; but the Committee have thought it their duty to discountenance any infringement of the Standing Orders; and, as a member of that Committee, I shall feel it my duty to take the sense of the House against the motion.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I take precisely the same view of this case as has been taken by the Right Honourable Gentleman who has just spoken. I conceive that in all cases we ought to require a strict adherence to the Standing Orders as laid down; and when, as in the present case, the Committee unanimously decide that the Standing Orders have not been complied with, I think it would be opening the door to great public inconvenience if the House were to entertain a proposition such as that which is now before it. The effect would be, to permit persons who neglect to comply with the Standing Orders to proceed as though they had complied. I therefore shall feel bound to oppose the Honourable Gentleman's motion; but, perhaps, he will allow me to suggest to him, as the House cannot, with any regard to consistency, afford relief in the present case, whether it would not be better to withdraw the motion.

Mr. G. W. HOPE. — It appears that no fraud was intended, and that no real mischief was done to any party by the deviation from the Standing Orders, of which the Committee complain. It is admitted that the conduct of the surveyor was regulated only by a desire to afford to the House all the information in his power; and as, I believe, relief has been given in other cases, I do hope the House will not refuse to extend it in this.

Mr. PONSONBY. — As the feeling of the House appears to be against me, I must beg to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

FACTORIES.

LORD ASHLEY. — Sir, I will take this opportunity of giving notice that on Tuesday, the 3d of March, I intend to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Act for regulating mills and factories, and to report their opinion thereupon to the House.

RETURNS.

Navy. — On the motion of Mr. Corry, Returns ordered —

Of the number of line-of-battle ships afloat, in commission and in ordinary (exclusive of those for harbour service only), on the 1st day of January, 1793:

Of the line-of-battle ships afloat, in commission and in ordinary (exclusive of those for harbour service only), on the 1st day of January, 1815:

Of the number of fourth, fifth, and sixth rates afloat, in commission and in ordinary (exclusive of those for harbour service only), on the 1st day of January, 1793:

Of the fourth, fifth, and sixth rates afloat, in commission and in ordinary (exclusive of those for harbour service only), on the 1st day of January, 1815.

Marines.—On the motion of Sir R. Peel, Accounts ordered —

Of the number of marines now employed on shore or afloat on the coast of Spain in any service connected with the execution of the Quadruple Treaty:

Of the total value of the stores of all descriptions advanced to Spain under the provisions of the Quadruple Treaty: of the sum (if any) received from Spain, on account of such advances, and of the arrangement made with Spain in respect to the ultimate repayment for such advances.

CIVIL LIST PENSIONS.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I presume, Sir, there will be no objection on the part of the Noble Lord to the motion I am now about to make,—namely, "That there be laid before this House a Return of all pensions on the Civil List granted since 18th day of February, 1834, to the present time; specifying the name of the party to whom in each case a pension has been granted, and the amount of the pension granted. Also, an account of the total amount of pensions granted in each year ending the 20th day of June 1835, 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839.

Upon the question being put, —

LORD J. RUSSELL said: — I wish to propose a slight alteration in the first of these Returns. I am anxious that the Return should be extended so as to include the whole period from February, 1828. I beg, therefore, to propose to leave out the words "18th day of February, 1834," in order to insert the words "1st day of February, 1828," instead thereof.

Question, "That the words '18th day of February, 1834' stand part of the question," put, and negatived; words inserted; main question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Return ordered —

Of all pensions on the Civil List granted since the 1st day of February, 1828, to the present time; specifying the name of the party to whom in each case a pension has been granted, and the amount of the pension granted:

Account of the total amount of pensions granted in each year ending the 20th day of June, 1835, 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839.

CASE OF MR. COMMISSIONER STEVENSON.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET.— I wish to ask the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Mr. Stevenson, since his appointment as Commissioner of Excise, has received any compensation under the Emancipation Act?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — He has not received any salary for the whole period. I think that the duties he performed extended over a period of three years, and he has only received salary for half that time.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — Then I shall, perhaps, feel it my duty to move for some papers connected with the subject.

ANSWER OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF KENT TO THE CONGRATULATORY ADDRESS.

The Earl of Lincoln appeared at the bar with the answer to the Address to the Duchess of Kent, which was as follows: —

"I receive with great satisfaction this proof of the attention and regard of the House of Commons, which is most gratifying to my feelings; and I return them many thanks for their congratulations."

GENERAL COMMITTEE ON ELECTION PETITIONS.

Mr. Pendarves brought up the Report of the General Committee on Election Petitions, which was read from the table. The Committee reported that they had appointed Thursday, March 12. for the panel No. I., to serve as an Election Committee on the Ludlow and Ipswich petitions; and Monday, March 16. for panel No. II., to sit on the Totness and Cambridge petitions. The Honourable Member said: — Since we are now on the eve of commencing a new system, I wish to suggest that, as, by the Act, Honourable Members who serve on these Committees will have only twenty-four hours' notice to attend on them, and as, at the time when these notices are issued, they may not be in attendance or sufficiently within the neighbourhood of the House to allow of their receiving such notices, the House should make some order to provide for the inconvenience arising from their possible non-attendance.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I think the proper way would be, to serve an order of the House on the Members, so as to insure their attendance upon the proper day.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I think it would be better to postpone the subject for a day, because the House is about to take a step which may operate so as to guide it in its future proceedings. Four-and-twenty hours will not interfere with the object which the Honourable Gentleman has in view, and I think it would be much better to give notice for to-morrow, so that the House may have time for consideration.

Mr. PENDARVES.— I willingly adopt the suggestion of the Honourable Gentleman, and beg to give notice that I will bring the subject before the House to-morrow.

CHINA.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I am desirous to put a question to the Noble Lord opposite, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. I think that it was in July last that official accounts reached this country that British property, to a very large amount (upwards of 2,000,000*l.* sterling) had, by order of the English superintendent at Canton, been surrendered to the Chinese authorities, on a pledge given by the superintendent that the loss should be made good to the owners by the British Government. In November last, however, the Secretary of the Treasury gave official information to the parties interested that it was not the intention of the Government to make that repayment. At the commencement of the present Session, Her Majesty, in her most gracious Speech from the throne, expressed her regret that events had happened which had occasioned an interruption of the commercial intercourse of her subjects with China. Subsequent information was received that acts of hostility had been resorted to, and that the port of Canton was blockaded by a British force for four days; but that the blockade had since been withdrawn. Still more recent news has reached this country that our ships have been attacked by the Chinese, and that a conflict has taken place. Parliament has now been assembled for a month, and no information has yet been laid before the House from which we might collect what is the real situation of affairs at Canton; and the question which I have now to ask the Noble Lord is, whether he is yet prepared to say when he will lay on the table papers relating to affairs that are so interesting to this country?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — The Right Honourable Baronet is, no doubt, aware that papers have already been moved for, and ordered by the House, which are now in the course of preparation. I have made it my business, before coming down to the House, — seeing that the Right Honourable Baronet had given notice of his intention to put the question which he has now asked, — to go down to the office and ascertain when they would be ready for presentation; and I trust that they will be ready early next week, but they will not be ready before that time.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Do I understand the Noble Lord to say that they will be ready early next week?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I trust so. The clerks whose business it is to prepare them are fully engaged with them, and several sheets are in the hands of the printers.

PERSIA.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I beg to ask another question of the Noble Lord, which has arisen out of another paragraph in the Queen's Speech, relative to our existing relations with the Schah of Persia. It was stated in Her Majesty's Speech that communications which had been received from the Court of Teheran induced Her Majesty to expect the re-establishment of our diplomatic relations with the Schah of Persia. The question I have to ask is, whether any information has been received by the Noble Lord realising the expectations so held out, and whether there is any immediate prospect of any arrangements being come to with the Court of Teheran? There is another question which I have to put to the Noble Lord, respecting the position in which we stand with regard to the Schah of Herat. I wish to ask whether the Sovereign of Herat, Kamram Schah, has seceded from our alliance, and whether he is not, now, in intimate connection with the Court of Teheran?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.— Some time ago information was received from the British minister formerly resident at the Court of the Schah of Persia, stating that the Schah had consented to all the demands of the British Government. Subsequently to that period, however, I received a communication from the minister of the Schah, comprising the details of the contemplated arrangements. It then appeared, on examination, that the mode in which the Persian Government proposed to execute its general intentions, and to give satisfaction to the British Government, was not, on certain points, the same as the manner in which it had been proposed by Her Majesty's Government that satisfaction should be given. This made it necessary for me to make another communication to the minister of the Schah; and of course that communication has not yet been answered; but as the Schah has declared his intention of acceding without qualification to the demands of the British Government, I have no doubt that the answer which will be received will be satisfactory. In the mean time the British agent remains at Erzeroum, with orders not to return to the Court of Persia till satisfaction shall have been given. As to the second question of the Right Honourable Baronet, I am not able to state precisely the nature of the relations existing between the Governor General of India and Kamram Schah. I have not, myself, received any information respecting the close connection said to be established between Kamram Schah and the Court of Persia, but some late accounts have seemed to show that such a connection existed. Those accounts, however, rest only on report.

HILL COOLIES.

SIR E. WILMOT.—I hope the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies will have no objection to postpone the Committee on the Colonial Passengers Bill until a later period than the day now fixed (Friday week),—in order to give those Gentlemen who take an interest in the subject, time to consider the clauses which I propose to introduce, for regulating the emigration of Hill Coolies to the Mauritius.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—If the clauses shall not be ready in time for Members to have an opportunity of considering them, before the day now fixed, I will, in that case, postpone the discussion to a further day.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—I see, by the Votes of the other House, that a number of Returns, containing information respecting the Hill Coolies, have been granted by the Noble Lord at the head of the Government. I presume that there will be no objection to furnish copies of the same papers to this House.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—Any information which can be given respecting the emigration of Hill Coolies, and the condition of those who have emigrated, will be given with the papers which my Noble Friend at the head of the Administration has promised, in the House of Lords, to lay before Parliament. If the Right Honourable Gentleman move for these Returns, I hope that he will adhere to the form of the Returns ordered in the other House. These papers will, I believe, give all the information in the possession of the Government.

PILOTAGE.

Mr. A. WHITE.—As I consider that it is desirable to do something on the subject, I beg to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, whether it is his intention to bring in any Bill respecting pilotage?

Mr. LABOUCHERE.—I agree with the Honourable Gentleman, that legislation upon the subject is highly desirable. But after what occurred with respect to the Bill formerly brought in by my predecessor (Mr. P. Thomson), it certainly is not my intention at present to bring in a Bill on the subject, as I believe it would be needlessly occupying the time of the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. Wallace, leave of absence was given to Mr. Gillon for one month, on urgent private business.

PRINTED PAPERS—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

The Speaker asked the Sergeant-at-Arms whether Mr. Howard, junior, was in attendance; and, being answered in the affirmative, he ordered Mr. Howard to be brought in.

Mr. Howard, junior, being accordingly brought to the bar,—

The SPEAKER said:—What is your name?—Thomas Howard.

What is your profession?—I am clerk to my father, who is an attorney, residing in Norfolk Street, Strand.

Have you been recently engaged in issuing and serving writs for your father, in the case of Mr. Stockdale? — Yes; several.

On what days? — I am not certain. I believe two on Friday last, and one on Saturday.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — By whose orders? — By my father's.

Have you gone to him, where he is confined, and received instructions from him there? — Yes.

You went to him, and he gave you orders? — Yes.

What were the writs you served? — I served three copies of one writ on the Messrs. Hansard, in the suit of Mr. Stockdale against them.

Have you seen Mr. Stockdale in those circumstances? — I have not.

Has the cause of action been mentioned to you? — It has not.

Are you aware of the cause of action? — I don't know for certain, but I can give a near guess.

Were you not aware of the cause of action at the time you sued out the writ? — No, I think not.

Have you taken any proceedings in the action now pending, at the suit of Stockdale, against the Messrs. Hansard?—Yes, a great many.

Since your father was in confinement? — Yes.

Do you know the cause of action? — I do.

Mr. GODSON. — How old are you?— Nineteen.

How long have you been apprenticed to your father? — I have been articled three years.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — You knew that your father was in confinement for bringing an action against the Messrs. Hansard, which had been pronounced a breach of the privileges of this House? — Yes.

And you acted in the present action by your father's orders? — Yes.

Mr. GODSON. — Are you not obliged to obey all the lawful commands of your master? — Yes.

It is part of your articles? — Yes.

Mr. Howard was then ordered to withdraw.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — It is with very great reluctance that I rise to move the resolution which it is now become my duty to submit to the House. It appears that this young man proceeded in this action for his father, although he knew that his father was in confinement for a breach of the privileges of this House for carrying on a former action against our printer. It has been stated by the person just withdrawn from the bar, that he knew what was the cause of the previous actions, and he persisted, he says, in following up the present action by the advice of his father, and under his directions. We must abandon our powers altogether, if we thus allow the attorney's clerks to carry on the proceedings for the attorney, after we have imprisoned the latter for instituting them. An Honourable Gentleman opposite has said that this young man was bound to obey the commands of his master. No doubt he was bound to obey all his lawful commands; but this was not a lawful command, but a breach of the privileges of this House, and therefore he was under no necessity to obey it. I beg therefore to move that Thomas Howard, junior, for having conducted an action against Messrs. Hansard, after this House had passed a resolution that to proceed with such action was a breach of its privileges, and after his master had been committed to Newgate for proceeding therein, has been guilty of a contempt, and a high breach of the privileges of this House.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I certainly have heard, with great surprise, the proposition of my Honourable and Learned Friend; for I am sure that, after the proposition that we have just heard, the House is not prepared to say whether the action that was brought, and for which we are now asked to declare the person just called to the bar guilty of a breach of our privileges, was the second, the third, the fourth, or the fifth action. The young man was called to the bar for proceeding in a new action, and he was questioned by the Attorney General on the subject, and his answers showed that he was, intentionally, free from all blame in this action, and, in consequence, the House would have been obliged to discharge him from further attendance. The Attorney General, however, then proceeded to question him respecting — not the action for which he was called to the bar, but — the action for which his father had been committed to custody. No farther question was asked of him than to elicit from him that he was acquainted with the nature of that action. I was greatly surprised, and I am sure that the House must have been so, to find this young man called upon to answer in an action in which damages have already been levied and paid. The House has had no information as to the nature of any particular action, in respect to which these parties have been summoned here to-night. The Attorney General, however, proposed that they should proceed against this boy, because he merely executed a duty which he was bound by his articles to execute. This youth, no doubt, thought he might be excused for acting in his particular situation, when he might have thought that the cause of action had been confirmed by the full court of the Court of Queen's Bench. That boy was not to be expected to understand the law, or to enter into a conflict with the Court of Queen's Bench. It seems to me as if a trap was laid to catch this boy in his answers in reference to an action for which he was not called to the bar. It therefore appears that he was called there for one purpose, and it is now proposed to punish him for something else. Perhaps, while on this part of the subject, I may be allowed to make some observations on the cases referred to, last night, by the Noble Lord, who made some communications on matters altogether distinct from the subject before the House, and came to a conclusion which, though it appeared to make some impression on the House, I think was not a sound conclusion; and this I will prove. The question is, not as to whether we possess the privilege of publishing these papers, but it is, how the privilege, if it exists, is to be enforced. For my own part, I think that the House had the right to publish that particular paper; but I do not think that the course we are pursuing is the just mode of vindicating or defending our privileges. The Noble Lord has stated that I referred to cases that had occurred in the Parliaments of Charles I. and Charles II. The Noble Lord said that, in some of these Parliaments, the most important cases had been decided with reference to the privileges of Parliament; but that there were many things done by the House of Commons of those days of which he could not approve. I agree with the Noble Lord that there were many things done both by the Long Parliament and by the Parliament of Charles II. which are not worthy of commendation; I therefore go so far along with the Noble Lord; but I also go further, and I think that the conduct of these Parliaments, in these cases of privilege, was not worthy of such commendation as has been bestowed upon them by the Noble Lord. One of those cases was that of an ancestor of my Noble Friend near me (Lord Eliot), and who, at the time, was Member for Cornwall,—I mean Sir John Eliot, and eight other Members. The other case was that of the Speaker, Sir W. Williams, in the time of Charles II.; and both cases involved the question of liberty of speech in Parliament. I will show that the Noble Lord was wrong in the view which he took of both cases. In the case of Sir John Eliot, the information was exhibited in the King's Bench against him and the other Members, for acts done in this House, and they pleaded they ought not to be punished in that court, or any other, except in the high court of Parliament. The judges, however, decided against them; and Sir John Eliot, as the alleged greatest offender and the ringleader, was fined 2000*l*., and the others were amerced in smaller fines. The House of Commons resolved that the proceedings were illegal, and that the information in the Court of King's Bench for matters done in Parliament was against the law and privilege of Parliament, and a gross contempt and breach of privilege. But how were these proceedings respecting the infringement of their privileges to be got rid of? First of all, there was a joint resolution of this Honse and of the House of Lords on the subject; and then there was a writ of error issued by the House of Lords, reversing the judgment. This, be it recollected, was done, not by acting against the law, but by acting with the law, and by appealing to the supreme tribunal, the House of Lords, for the reversal of the proceedings in the case. The second case was still stronger,—namely, the proceedings against Speaker Williams, for they have never been reversed from that hour to this by any judicial tribunal whatever; but that decision was destroyed by the Bill of Rights: the Bill of Rights declared that freedom of speech in the debates or resolutions of the House ought not to be impeached or examined in any place out of the House. That was intended to meet the case of Speaker Williams. In the one case, then, the House was set right by the House of Lords acting as a court of appeal; and in the other, by the Bill of Rights; so that the law of the latter case could never be disputed again. Those cases, then, prove that the course which the minority have taken in the present proceedings is right. One word more about precedents. In the case of "Jay v. Topham," Chief Justice Pemberton and one of his colleagues were called before the Convention Parliament, which resolved that the plea ought to have been put within the jurisdiction of the House, and that the judges should be committed. But that resolution of the Convention Parliament was admitted by all lawyers and judges to be illegal. That was a settled point. In the case of "Ashby v. White," all the steps which the House would now take were actually adopted; and, in the end, the House was signally defeated.

Before I sit down I will just allude to Naylor's case, in the time of the Commonwealth, to show that when a popular assembly has to deal out punishment for an offence, it scarcely knows within what bounds to limit the punishment. The House resolved —

> That James Naylor shall be put in the pillory in the city of Westminster for the space of two hours, on Thursday next, and then be whipped by the hangman through the streets from Westminster to the Old Change, and there be put in the pillory again from the hours of eleven to one on the following Saturday. He shall then have his tongue bored through with a red hot iron, and be branded with the letter B, and sent to Bristol, where he shall be paraded through the city on horseback, with his face backward. From Bristol he shall be brought back to London and sent to the Tower, there to be kept to hard labour by order of Parliament, and be debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper, and have no relief but what he can earn by his daily labour.

At that time the Attorney General was not so considerate as the Attorney General of the present day, for he modestly proposed that Naylor should first be whipped, and afterwards that an Act should be passed to hang him at once.

[Laughter.]

It appears that Cromwell, when consulting his officers as to whether or not he should accept the title of "King," referred to the case of Naylor, and urged the necessity of the House being controlled by another power — by the House of Lords, or by some other authority, otherwise the same mischance might happen to any one of them. But, to conclude. The question we have to consider is, how our privilege can best be vindicated? It is not reputable for the House to pursue the course that has been recommended to it to pursue. There are ways and means to amend the law by which the powers of this House can be vindicated; and the only question is, how this law can best be effected? I submit that the mode proposed is not the proper one, and it would not be becoming in the House to permit a boy to be committed to prison for having obeyed his father in regard to an action for which the House did not intend to call him to account, and not in regard to the action which they did intend to call upon him to explain. I hope, therefore, that the Attorney General will not press this motion; for if he does, I will feel bound to divide the House upon it.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman has entirely mistaken the case. The question which I put to the person at the bar related to the fourth action, and with that action that person acknowledged that he had proceeded, although he knew that his father had been committed for a breach of privilege for commencing the same. It was for the fourth action that the father was committed, and it was for following up that action that the son was now called to account. The Right Honourable Baronet might have taken another opportunity of entering into the general question of privilege.

[Cries of "Spoke, spoke!" during which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman resumed his seat.]

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I am at a loss, even now, to understand, with any degree of certainty, to which action the present resolution has reference. Is it the fifth or the fourth action upon which the House is about to proceed? If the fifth action had not been brought, would the present proceedings have been taken? or should we have been called on to notice the youth at the bar? I think that it is by no means fair to deal with the son of the attorney in this manner. I suppose that the Attorney General will not venture to proceed against that person except upon clear and intelligible grounds. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has said that he proceeded against the father for the fourth action; but he has not taken the trouble to ascertain whether the son had been acting in the father's name before or since the committal of the father. No inquiry has been instituted to settle that point; and I therefore think that we should act improperly and unjustly, and without due consideration for the character and dignity of the House, if we committed the son under such circumstances. I submit this point to the Noble Lord and the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, and hope it will receive attention. I should be sorry to use any harsh expressions on the present occasion, but I can scarcely forbear repeating the complaint that has been made, that no courtesy has been shown to the minority on this question. I think that there has been a want of consideration towards the minority. The privileges of the House have, or they have not, been violated. That being the question, and the minority exceeding 100, I do think that some further consideration might have been shown towards so large a number of Members, and that, at least, as to consequences, some greater respect should be paid to their opinion.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Contrary to what has been stated by the Honourable Baronet, it is my opinion that the majority has been treated with very little courtesy, for they have been compelled to listen to the reiteration of the same arguments from the minority, who are still unyielding — very conscientiously, no doubt — to what appears to be the unanimous opinion of an overwhelming majority of the House. The Right Honourable Baronet appears to have fallen into mistake as to the nature of the motion, for it is not, at present, one for commitment. The motion now before us, is to declare whether or not the person who has been called before the bar of the House is guilty of a breach of privilege, or not. For my own part I should be sorry to vote for his commitment until I have ascertained that the House declares he had been guilty of a breach of privilege; and then, if, on being called before the bar and informed of that decision of the House, he should hold out the least hope that he would not continue to prosecute the action, I, for one, in that case, would not press for his commitment. But with respect to the objection of the Right Honourable Member for Ripon, there cannot be the slightest doubt that the son followed up the fourth action commenced by the father, for I put that question to him, and asked him if he had proceeded with the fourth action after he was aware that his father was in custody for a breach of privilege, and he answered in the affirmative. Now, I ask, could the House proceed against the sheriff hereafter, if they allowed a person to go free, who, with a knowledge that his father had been committed for a breach of privilege in commencing an action, nevertheless continued to carry it on? Talk of traps, indeed! I think that would be laying a trap for the sheriffs; because it would amount to this, that we should wilfully allow an action to proceed on which we should afterwards turn round upon the sheriffs, whom we ought to favour as much as we possibly could, consistently with the maintenance of our privileges. It would not be fair to put the sheriffs in jeopardy. I believe that there is not that desire and appetite amongst the majority for sending people to gaol which Honourable Gentlemen opposite suppose to be in existence. The Right Honourable Baronet seemed to put the question into a new phase, and to make it more difficult at every step. He has alluded to the case of Naylor by way of making the House of Commons appear cruel and tyrannical. But I utterly deny that the House of Commons acted in the way described. It was not the House of Commons, but an assembly culled from the three kingdoms by Cromwell, by virtue of his writs, and under the superintendence of his major general, without certainly the form of elections, or election petitions, for the qualification to sit was decided by a file of Cromwell's grenadiers, who were stationed in the lobby, and they let no man in who had not the entrée from Cromwell. That was the assembly which has been to-night called a House of Commons. They were not the House of Commons, but a set of miscreants, whose fanaticism went to such an extent, that the sentence which the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman has read was but the milder sentence of the majority, the minority being for taking off the man's head at once. It does not become the Honourable and Learned Gentleman to taunt the House with the acts of such an assembly. He might as well taunt the House with the doings of the National Convention of France, for the one was as much the House of Commons as the other. If the young man now at our bar had not committed a breach of privilege, it would be difficult to define what a breach of privilege was. Would not the House place itself in a dilemma, if, after committing one person for commencing an action, they should let the other, who carried on the suit, go free? It would be nothing less than stultifying the House to act in this manner.

COLONEL WOOD. — I am rather unwilling to take a part in the present discussion, but I cannot help remarking that, notwithstanding all the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has said, I think that we have summoned the lad to our bar to answer for one offence, and now we are going to punish him for another. It is in consequence of the petition from the Messrs. Hansard which the Noble Lord has presented, complaining that a new action had been brought against them, — I believe the fifth or sixth action, — that the present proceedings have been taken by the House. The youth who made his appearance at the bar answered the questions put to him in a satisfactory manner; but he was certainly entrapped into an answer with respect to the fourth action, because he answered, very openly and honestly, every question that was put to him. I beg the House to consider before they decide upon committing this boy, how far they are prepared to go on in this course. How many sons will they continue to commit for obeying their fathers? If any mode can be devised by which the House can get out of this difficulty, it ought to be adopted. An Honourable Member said, in the course of the discussions which have taken place on this subject, that, unless the privileges of the House were supported by public opinion, it would not be easy to maintain them; but I very much doubt whether the people of this country will uphold this House in sending lads, one after another, to gaol, for obeying their fathers, whom, by legal articles, they are bound to obey. I hope, therefore, that the House will pause before they consent to take the present step. When I heard the lad give the first series of answers, I was glad to find that he said nothing which could implicate him, for the answers were satisfactory as far as he was concerned. But I did not expect that Honourable Members would go "trying back" in order to fix on some former proceedings, so as to lay hold of something for which the lad had not been summoned to answer.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I consider it to be quite immaterial to the question whether the young man who has appeared at our bar has been engaged in the fourth, fifth, or sixth action brought in Mr. Stockdale's name. I do not think that he ought to have been called at all. It is altogether unworthy of the House to be engaged in such a course as it is now pursuing. We were called together, about five or six weeks ago, for the consideration and despatch of "divers urgent and weighty affairs." We are now in the fifth week of the Session, and what have we done? We are, at the end of that time, engaged in a discussion whether we should commit this boy for obeying his father. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has said that he would support the motion for declaring this young lad guilty of a contempt, because he obeyed his father, — to whom, besides the duty of a son, he owed, also, the obligation of an apprentice or articled clerk. I should like to know how that Honourable and Learned Gentleman would feel, if one of his own sons was to be committed for assisting him if he were in any difficulty or embarrassment. There can be no doubt that this boy, if committed, will call forth the sympathies of the public, because it will be generally felt that he ought not to be punished for what was only an act of obedience to his parent; and it is equally certain that the House will lose much in public opinion, and will, so to speak, make itself the laughing-stock of the country. It is, I think, high time that this course of proceeding should cease. To me, it appears that there is a way of getting out of the difficulty, on the part of the House, without any compromise of its honour, or giving up its privilege; and that is, by the appointment of a joint Committee of both Houses, to meet in conference, and declare what they do consider to be the privilege in this matter. There was a case analogous to this as regards the joint Committees of both Houses. In 1763, John Wilkes was arrested on a general warrant for seditious libel. He was brought up by habeas corpus before the Court of Common Pleas, and claimed his discharge on two grounds: first, that general warrants were illegal; and next, on his privilege as a Member of Parliament. The court held that the first plea was not good, thereby deciding that general warrants were legal; but it released him on his plea of parliamentary privilege. The law as to general warrants has since been altered; but it was then, and is now, admitted that a Member of Parliament was protected by his privilege in all cases except those of high treason, felony, or breach of the peace. The Attorney General of that day, not satisfied with the decision of the court, went on with the prosecution; the House having declared, by a resolution, that the privilege of Parliament did not extend to seditious libel. The court of law, however, held that it did extend to that case. The Commons, having passed the resolution just mentioned, communicated it in a conference to the Lords, and a joint Committee of both Houses met to consider the subject. The question was warmly contested in each House; but the Lords eventually decided that the privilege of Parliament did not extend to cases of seditious libel. No writ of error was moved against the decision of the court of law, because, after the decision to which the Lords had come, there was no doubt that, on an appeal, they would reverse the decision of the court below. I will now propose that the decision of this question be sent to a joint Committee of both Houses. If they agree to a resolution affirming the claim of privilege for publishing the Reports of both Houses, no legislation would, in my opinion, in that event, be necessary; but, should it be considered desirable, the joint Committee would soon agree on the heads of a Bill for that purpose. This course would, I think, get us out of the difficulty in which we are now placed, and save us the trouble and loss of time incurred in going on in this way from day to day.

I will now read to the House the amendment which I intend to propose: — "Resolved, that the privileges of Parliament are solely intended for the good of the community at large, and that the power of publishing the Reports, Votes, and Proceedings of this House is necessarily conducive to the public interests, and is an essential incident in the exercise of our constitutional functions: resolved, therefore, that it is expedient that a joint Committee, consisting of Members of both Houses of Parliament, should be appointed to consider as to the best mode of securing to each branch of the Legislature the full and free exercise of a power so important and so essential to the public welfare." By what fell from Lord Denman when this question was before his court, it is clear that he did not recognise this right of publication in either House. His observation was, — "I am not aware of the existence of any body in this country whose servants had a right to publish libels against any individual." From this it is clear that the Lords are equally interested in the assertion of their right of publication; and it would be highly probable that they would join with the Commons in asserting the rights of both. I beg, therefore, to move the amendment which I have just now read.

Mr. LEADER. — I rise to second the amendment. Up to a late period I have voted with the Noble Lord on this question of privilege, and I have done so in the belief that the House ought to possess the full right of publication. I consider that there are many things objectionable in the course pursued by the Government in this matter; but still the right of publication of our proceedings is so important, that I think it should be secured by every means in our power. However, on consulting some friends who are more learned in these matters, I feel convinced that the House does not, by the course now pursued, gain the right which is claimed, and that we are daily weakening the authority of the law in the country. The House does not gain the publicity which it sought; for the Blue Books, which are sent forth in such numbers in every Session, are not read by the public. The public come to a knowledge of their contents through the daily, weekly, and monthly press, and yet none of these are protected in such publications, and an action might be brought against any one of those publications for any alleged libel in those Reports; so that, in fact, there has been no publicity whatever gained by the House, — at least, none that is protected. It is therefore necessary that the House should take some other course besides that which it has hitherto adopted. Experience has shown that, in all the contests in which it has been engaged as regards its privilege, it has never succeeded except it has been backed up by public opinion; but I must say that public opinion is not with us on this occasion. I repeat, that the public opinion is decidedly against us. I have had many representations on this subject from some of my constituents. I do not say that I have changed my opinion on that account; but I will assert that one cannot meet with any persons out of this House, except the hangers-on of Government, who do not say that the House is acting tyrannically, and that it will be beaten at last. Let me ask, what would be the situation of the Attorney General, or of the Noble Lord, if twenty such strong-minded and determined men as Howard or Stockdale were to refuse to attend to the injunctions of the House? If, as I believe, this assertion of privilege, or the mode, at least, of that assertion, be not supported by public opinion; and if, as is the fact, it have been declared to be illegal by a large body of the lawyers of the country, and by one of the courts of law; —if, under these circumstances, twenty resolute men, not deterred by threats of commitment, were to go on with other actions, refusing to admit the privilege; what, I ask, would be the situation of the Attorney General, and of this House? Would it not be one of increased difficulty and embarrassment? After having gone all these lengths in support of our privilege, how do we know that the House of Commons, in the next Parliament, may not take a very different view of the question? I repeat, that what we have yet done does not secure to us the right of publishing. The courts of law, so far as we have resorted to them, have decided against us; and if we do not respect the law, I would ask what authority are we to respect? Why, Sir, in America, whose republican institutions are so often cast up against Members on this side of the House, the greatest respect is paid to the decisions of the High Court of Appeal, even in cases between particular states and the federal Government. The best and the safest way to settle this matter would be by legislation, or by conference between the two Houses; and the Lords would not refuse their sanction and support in a matter which affects their privileges also. Though that branch of the Legislature may not stand very high in the estimation of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, and, perhaps, with good reason, yet they would not be so stupid as not to support their own privileges. If, however, the course pointed out by the amendment of my Honourable Friend should not succeed, we should be in no worse situation than we are in at present; but if we proceed as we are doing, we may rely upon it that we shall become every day more and more unpopular with the country. One subject connected with this question is, the present state of the law of libel; and, as far as relates to that, the present discussions and proceedings will do good, if they have the effect of inducing the Government to alter the law. In conclusion, I repeat my opinion, that the reference to the joint Committees of both Houses would be the most effectual means of bringing the question to a satisfactory termination, and I therefore fully concur in the amendment which I have had the honour to second.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON.—I have listened with great surprise and unmitigated pain to the speech of the Honourable Member for Westminster, at finding with what slight regard to circumstances he discharges his parliamentary duty; and I have felt great astonishment at the speech of the Honourable Member, because, in the statement he has made to-night, he has confessed that his former votes have been given after only a hasty consideration of the subject. In the remarks made by the Honourable Gentleman there were scarcely any reasons stated for the line of conduct he was about to pursue. There was scarcely one ground of objection which he has now urged, that would not equally apply to the votes he has already given. What has caused so great a change in the Honourable Member's opinions, I will not pretend to say; but, in my opinion, the course he pursues on this occasion is most unaccountable. How has the Honourable Member disposed of the argument with respect to publication? Why, he has stated that it is through the channels of the daily, weekly, and monthly press, that the public mind acquires its knowledge of our proceedings. I ask that Honourable Member whether it is not in his experience that his constituents frequently have called upon him to put in their hands the valuable documents printed by the order of this House, in order that they might, therefrom, obtain information? But this is not all, for, during the recess, the most valuable part of the information given by the press is obtained from those papers. There is, therefore, no ground for the Honourable Members abandoning his former opinions upon the point of publicity. But, then, he has stated that the whole nation are against the House for the course we have taken, and that the public do not go along with us in these proceedings. I respectfully deny the correctness of the Honourable Member's assertion. I represent as large a constituency as the Honourable Member, and not one single word have I heard from any of my constituents in the slightest degree inculpating the course the House has pursued; and if they had offered their opinion against the present proceedings, my reply would have been, — "Are you not in the habit of coming to me, constantly, for these publications? and you — and you alone — cause me to publish these libels; and if the right which the House now claims is not affirmed and asserted, and if you will not support the House of Commons in the course they are now taking, you must be content to forego the information which will be a great loss to you." If the power of publication be taken from the House, the public must do without these useful documents. It is not a little singular, also, that the Honourable Member for Finsbury should have enlarged upon the necessity of the right of publication, while his seconder, the Honourable Member for Westminster, differs from him. One of them thought it all-important to the country, but the other says nothing about it; — one objects, not to the privilege, but to the mode of asserting it. I have hitherto abstained from saying anything on this question; but it has now become so momentous, that I can no longer refrain from stating my opinion at length. Honourable Members opposite have asked what was the course that Honourable Members on this side of the House would point out for the maintenance of these privileges? Now, what I would say on that head is this, — that if once the House disclaim being the judges of their own privileges, from that moment they concede the whole question. I have the highest respect for the courts of law, and also for the House of Lords, as a branch of the Legislature. But I beg to call attention to one case, which is in the knowledge of my Right Honourable and Learned Friend opposite (the Member for Ripon), and I would ask, should we be justified in putting confidence in the decision of the House of Lords as a tribunal of appeal? I am quite willing to grant that the courts of law contain independent and upright judges; but does not the House recollect, and, above all, does not my Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Ripon recollect that memorable case which occurred thirty-four years ago, in which the joint judgment of Lords Eldon and Ellenborough was reversed by the House of Lords; when the halt and the blind and the sick were brought down—when every species of influence, direct and indirect, was resorted to—for the purpose of rendering nugatory the wise, the legal decisions, of the two great men whose names I have mentioned? My Right Honourable and Learned Friend will also recollect with what indignation those eminent individuals walked out of the House of Lords, when they found that their opinions were to be overborne by numbers, and not by reason—when they saw that justice was to be trampled under foot, and that injustice was to triumph.

Now, having shown that even in the present century a case has occurred in which strong and overpowering motives have exercised influence over the Lords themselves, when sitting in their judicial capacity, may I not be permitted to suggest the possibility of a similar occasion occurring again? I regard the principle for which we are contending as something so sacred, that nothing should induce us to abandon its maintenance. If we submit a question of this kind to the judgment of the courts of law, we can never afterwards find any excuse for refusing to submit all other cases to similar tribunals. The House of Commons will then be no longer independent, and can no longer conscientiously discharge the duties which they owe to their constituents. To come, however, more immediately to the present question, an appeal has been made to the House by the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Kent, to the effect that something ought to be conceded out of courtesy to the Members who sit on the same side of the House with him. I must profess my inability to understand the reasonableness of such an appeal. I ask, can the present be regarded as a question for the remission of punishment on the ground of the courtesy due from one side of the House to the other? Does any man in this House vote for sending the persons brought before us to Newgate from any other motive than the vindication of our privileges? The parties now in prison have not been sent there for any purpose but to maintain the privileges of the House of Commons; they were not sent to prison under the influence of any feeling of anger; that course has been merely resorted to, being considered as the most efficacious mode of asserting the rights which belong to this House. I shall certainly support the present motion, and I do so with a strong conviction that I could not continue to hold my seat in this House with credit to myself or advantage to my constituents if I ventured to pursue any other course. It appears to me most plainly that it is the only one which the House can follow; at all events I am prepared to pursue it, however great the hazard to myself. Whatever of character or of popularity I may happen to possess in the country, I am perfectly willing to stake it upon the result of the present proceedings. I would not say so much if I were not perfectly satisfied of the necessity of the measure. I should be as ready to yield as any man, if I felt that I ought to do so; but seeing that the path is clear before me,—that I have no alternative but to abandon those privileges which have been handed down to us by our ancestors, or the course I have chosen,—I am confirmed in the line which I have hitherto thought it my duty to follow. If the House of Commons clearly see, as I do, the necessity of maintaining their privileges, it would be pusillanimous, it would be cowardly, not to do so, especially in circumstances like the present. Upon these grounds I shall vote for the committal of Mr. Howard, junior. It appears to me beyond the possibility of question that that individual has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House as relates to the fifth action. There cannot be a shadow of doubt that he was cognisant of the cause of that action; and therefore I think the House ought on no account to reject the motion, but cordially and promptly to vote for its adoption.

SIR R. PEEL.—I feel it necessary to defend the Honourable Member for Westminster from the attack which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has directed against him. The speech of the Honourable Member for Westminster I will not attempt to defend, but I think that the path he is pursuing is in conformity with the wiser one which he first indicated in seconding the motion of the Honourable Member for Finsbury; which he has not of course adopted with-

Now, Mr. Justice Patteson admits that this argument is well founded; but it is not only the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, but any single man sitting in a borough court, and not dressed in quite so dignified a judicial garb as the judges of the Queen's Bench, may have our printer brought before him. He may refuse to admit our privilege, and may, for having obeyed our orders, punish our printer by imprisonment, if prosecuted criminally, or he may decree him to pay heavy damages, if defendant in a civil action.

Mr. SHAW. — A civil action could not be brought in the court of quarter sessions.

SIR R. PEEL. — On this point I may quote the opinion of Mr. Justice Littledale, who says, —

> If I am correct in my opinion, the same question which has arisen here may be agitated in any of the inferior courts, such, for instance, as the court of quarter sessions and the borough courts. This jurisdiction has resulted from the law; and if the law be so, there must be a right in these courts to entertain the question.

Now, have I overstated the fact? Here is the highest judicial authority stating that our printer is liable to question, not only in the superior courts in Westminster Hall, but also in the inferior courts; and can any one, for a moment, doubt that, if our printer is liable to be questioned in the inferior courts, and we do not at once and decisively vindicate our privileges, those privileges are practically abandoned, and must be considered for ever at an end? I must also beg that it may not be forgotten that all the highest legal authorities in the House are with us, and concur in declaring that, in substance, we are in the right. They object — and, I am satisfied, on conscientious grounds — to the particular mode of our proceeding; but not one of those Gentlemen, whose opinions are of the highest authority, has maintained that the judgment of the Queen's Bench was right. I allude to my Honourable Friends who sit on my left, the Right Honourable the Member for Ripon, the Honourable Member for Exeter, and the Honourable Member for Huntingdon. All these high authorities have distinctly declared that they consider the publication a privileged publication, and the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench to be erroneous. This must go forth to the public also: — that it is not only admitted that we possess this privilege, but we have it on the highest legal authority, that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench was erroneous, and ought not to be maintained. They insist that we possess this privilege, and that the judges of the Queen's Bench ought to have supported that privilege. We rely, and have relied throughout, not on any exaggerated claim of privilege; and I certainly think that my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Ripon has departed from the candour and fairness with which he has argued this question throughout, by reviving the atrocities that have been committed, at former periods, by former Houses of Commons. I think that every mention of proceedings of this kind is calculated rather to increase than lessen any prejudice on the part of the public. I think that reviving the recollection of occurrences of this kind is rather calculated to raise a prejudice on the part of the public with respect to our proceedings. There may be some persons foolish enough to believe that because, two hundred years ago, some cruelties and atrocities were committed by former Parliaments, therefore there is danger that the present Parliament may do the same. Why, now, it would be equally as just for me to argue that, because, at former periods of our history, the Court of Queen's Bench gave extraordinary and tyrannical decisions, there is any danger that the Court of Queen's Bench of the present day would resort to similar proceedings. As an instance of those decisions, I may mention that it was held that, after the Session, a Member of Parliament was liable to be questioned in a court of law on account of any speech which he might have delivered in the course of that Session of Paliament. The Court of King's Bench, being asked to decide whether a Member could be tried for a speech he had made in Parliament, answered, that they were the judges of the lives, lands, and liberties of the Members, and that no outrageous speech had ever been made against a Minister of State by a Member of Parliament which had not been punished. On the same occasion Mr. Justice Jones gave a judgment, sentencing Sir John Eliot to a fine of 2000*l.*, Mr. Hollis to 1000 marks, and Mr. Allen to 500*l.* Now, nothing could be more unjust than that I should refer to such cases as this, and thus run the risk of raising an unfair impression on the public mind that there was any danger, now, of the recurrence of similar proceedings; but I think it equally unfair that the present House of Commons should be taunted with the proceedings of a House of Commons which sat 200 years ago.

Now, let us consider for a moment the question whether we are justified in maintaining this privilege, or not. If we claimed excessive privileges, there are plenty of Members who are sufficiently jealous of our privileges, and would be ready to curtail them, if they thought them excessive. But it would be wholly inconsistent on our parts, were we to shrink from maintaining a privilege essential to the due performance of our functions. I was about to state that I relied on the authority of judicial judgments of the highest authority, delivered at a recent period, to show that the House is in possession of this privilege. I may mention the case of "The King v. Wright," where five judges of the highest eminence went the whole length of maintaining that the House of Commons had the privilege of publication. They, in fact, went farther, but included the privilege. It was on a most important occasion, the trial of Horne Took, which was an action brought against a printer for the publication of a libel, contained in a Report of some proceedings of the House of Commons. I know there has been some special pleading with respect to that case. I know it has been contended that it was not in point, because the judges refused the criminal information only; but I have looked to the doctrines laid down on that occasion, and I ask, how is it possible for any man to doubt that the judges of the Queen's Bench, and at a recent period too, went the entire length of admitting our privileges? Lord Kenyon, in that case, declared,—

> The inquiry held by the House of Commons was an inquisition held by one branch of the Legislature to enable them to adopt further proceedings for the better regulation and better government of the country. It was communicated by the House of Commons to the House of Lords, and adopted by both Houses. The results of that inquiry are now sub judice. I am of opinion that the publication is not a libel, and that the rule for the criminal information should be discharged.

What said Mr. Justice Grose, and also Mr. Justice Lawrence, who held, likewise, an opinion similar to that delivered by Chief Justice Denman, on Saturday last,—that even the publication of trials in courts of justice could not be held to be a libel, inasmuch as the public have a right to know what passes in those courts. These judges said,—

> This is an information for a supposed libel; but the publication complained of is, in truth, an act of the Legislature while deliberating what was best for the safety of the country.

We have the judges declaring that newspapers, in publishing a trial, though it may contain matter offensive to an individual, do not commit a libel, because it contains matter which the public are interested in knowing; and, being reports of the proceedings held in a court of justice, the publication is held to be justifiable. Now, then, if the courts in Westminster Hall be justified in refusing to hear any complaint on account of the publication of their proceedings, why may not the House of Commons authorise their printer to publish their own proceedings? It is a great advantage to the public, that a large body of true accounts of our proceedings should be circulated amongst them; but I doubt this advantage, if no person can publish them without being liable to punishment. Now, I have already quoted to the House, judgments delivered by the judges some thirty or forty years ago, deciding in favour of the privilege of publication, not only where it was authorised, but even where it was unauthorised, and where it was the mere act of a printer for personal gain, and under the influence of motives of private speculation; and this was held—on the principle that the report was justifiable, because it contained matter with which it was for the interest of the public they should be acquainted. But the very same court which thus decided, thirty or forty years ago, now says to the House of Commons, in effect, "You shall not authorise your printer to tell the public that the prison of Newgate requires reform because obscene books have been found in it." Desiring to maintain the privilege of the House, I rely on the solemn decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, delivered at the time I have mentioned. But we are now told that every inferior court may order our agent before it, and hold him answerable for a charge of libel. This privilege, which we now claim to exercise, and which it is our duty to maintain, has been in our possession for upwards of two hundred years. It is a privilege for which Parliament struggled in times of difficulty and danger; and I own I cannot, without apprehension, see this privilege placed in the hands of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, who have already sufficiently shown a disposition to curtail our privileges. Hitherto, the course pursued has been, that the House of Lords and the House of Commons have equally vindicated their own privileges. When, against my advice, the House pleaded to the action, it was encouraged in the course which it took by the decision in "Burdett v. Abbott." Looking to what had been done in the case of "Burdett v. Abbott," and in the case of "the King v. Wright," there was a natural presumption that the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench would maintain the same doctrine which had been held by their predecessors. But subsequently the House found that the unanimous judgment of that Court was not only against the individual point, but against the full extent of the privilege we claimed. Was it safe, then, immediately to place the matter again at the decision of the judges? I am not sorry for the delay that has occurred. We are told, now, that the public feeling is against us; but this I very much doubt. The public feeling is of importance, if those who represent it will take the pains and trouble to inform themselves thoroughly upon this subject. It is impossible that any one can decide upon so difficult a question as this, by intuition. Now, we were told, last year, that the public opinion was, that the House of Commons ought to publish their proceedings, but that to publish them for sale was not to be defended. There was not one who ever asserted that it was not right for us to publish our proceedings for the use of Members of this House, while they objected to the sale. But, what has been the result of this discussion? It is now universally admitted, that sale constitutes no part of the question.——

Mr. HUME. — Hear, hear!

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — We are now discussing the question on its real merits, namely, whether the privilege of free publication is essential to the exercise of our legislative functions, and for the interests of the people. Suppose we had persevered in pleading, and had carried the case in error before the fifteen judges, and that they also had decided against us; we should then have manifested no desire to vindicate our privileges; and our next step would have been to carry the question before the House of Lords. If they also had decided against us, how many more of our privileges would have been endangered by that decision? The question might appear to turn on one single privilege; but the judgment would have shown that there was no privilege of which the House of Commons was possessed, that was not held by the precarious tenure of the sanction of the courts of law. We should have apparently given our acquiescence in the doctrine, that an extrinsic authority was to be the judge of our privileges. We have, however, taken a different course, — personally painful, no doubt, to all who have concurred in it, — namely, we have visited with a severe punishment persons not morally guilty. For this course we vindicate ourselves on the principle that we have no other mode of vindicating our privileges, except to make the ministerial officers accountable for the orders they have received from the court. The same hardship frequently occurs when a case of conflicting jurisdiction arises in the courts of law; for the innocent officer is the person punished. It is impossible, in fact, to take into consideration the moral conduct of individuals when the question arises of how we are to maintain our privileges; because there is not one of those privileges which we can maintain without some interference with our private feelings. Therefore, I consider that, whatever risk of temporary misconstruction we may run, as the question to be decided is the possession of every privilege not held under statutable sanction, or sustained by a long-continued series of legal adjudications, we have, at least, acted wisely in showing that we had the power of committing the ministerial officer in a case in which our privilege was infringed. At the same time, I must confess, that I very much doubt whether — if the courts of law will persevere in their present course — we have the power necessary for ulterior and effectual proceedings; but, having the power of commitment, I think we should preserve it, as a most important privilege. Having done so, if we do not then find it effectual, I shall not consider it unworthy of the House to take whatever further course may thereupon become necessary to make our powers full and complete. I think it is confessed that the present state of the law makes us powerless in the recess. I consider that a most inconvenient state of incompleteness; and, when I shall be asked to vote in the estimates a sum for the reimbursement of Mr. Hansard, I shall give that vote with great pain, and shall ask myself whether an alteration of the law be not necessary? I am fully aware of the danger of proceeding by enactment; but if I am told that we have no remedy during the Session, or during the recess, — no means of protection except by consuming the public time in defending ourselves, — then I shall consider that the time is come at which it will be perfectly consistent with my sense of duty, to attempt a solution of our difficulties by enactment; at the same time reserving to myself, in case that enactment should fail, the power which we are now exercising, to vindicate our own privileges.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Sir, my Honourable Colleague, in introducing his motion, asked what this House has been investigating since the commencement of the Session? I should like to ask the Honourable Member if, after the speech we have just heard from the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, he thinks it necessary to repeat his question? In point of fact, the House of Commons never met for the discussion of a more important question; nor, in my opinion, has a question ever been discussed with more patience and forbearance.

Honourable Gentlemen opposite may be disposed to question the propriety of this remark; but let them reflect on what has been their own conduct. Night after night they have dared this side of the House to attack the judges, or the counsel, or the jury. I would ask, can such taunts be approved of? can they facilitate a fair solution of the question? I contend that the House acts not from any vindictive feeling, but from the conviction of the urgency of the case. My Honourable Colleague has submitted a motion to the House, which has been dissected by the Right Honourable Baronet in such a manner as to make my Honourable Colleague sufficiently ashamed of his offspring to consent to its burial, without further funeral ceremony. Both my Honourable Colleague and the Honourable Member for Westminster seem to think that public opinion is with them. I have been marvelling, since the addresses of those Honourable Members, where they can have lately been, or with what sort of society they have lately associated; because I, whose occupations have led me to the very borders of the county, have found the people everywhere of one mind, and that is—to encourage the House to support its privileges. "Above all things," the people say, "do not go to the House of Lords." I am ashamed to hear any popular representative make such a proposal. I regret that my Honourable Colleague should make such a proposal. I would ask Honourable Gentlemen opposite, who resist the opinion of the majority, what course would they take? Will they call the judges to the bar? If they would support that motion, I will make it; because I am of opinion that the judges ought to be brought to the bar. I can tell the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, that his conduct, on this question, has made him the most popular man in the House, for that all parties are unanimous in his praise; and if Honourable Gentlemen opposite do not approve of the course pursued by the Right Honourable Baronet, what course would they, themselves, suggest? Are we to give up the persons who have violated our privileges? The Right Honourable Baronet has shown that the judges will not maintain our privileges; that not only will they not protect them, but they will question them on every opportunity. The House has already punished some of the offenders. Some may think that that punishment has been too great. For my part, I am not at all surprised that one of the sheriffs has applied for its remission, on account of his being threatened with a certain malady. Night after night as I came through the passage, I observed a constant bustle, and on inquiring the cause was universally answered by the exclamation, "Make way there! — dinner for the sheriffs!" Every evening that has been the cry in the lobby. In fact, I believe that all Mr. Bellamy's cooks have been put in requisition to feed the sheriffs. The sheriffs first overfed themselves, and then petitioned to be let out to recover. This is not the proper course for the maintenance of our privileges. The sheriffs should be put on low diet: it would be true humanity to feed them so. It is not right that men who have violated our privileges should be allowed to make themselves apoplectic at the expense of the liberties of the people.

[Loud cries of "Oh, oh, oh!"]

Such punishment should be inflicted as would prevent a repetition of the offence, and would secure the rights for which the House contends.

Mr. SHAW. — I wish merely to explain why I interrupted my Right Honourable Friend. My object was merely to remind him that a court of quarter session could not try a civil action. I would propose to the Honourable Member opposite to withdraw his amendment, as one calculated only to embarrass the real question. Presuming, for a moment, that the Honourable Member will adopt my suggestion, I would entreat the House to consider what it is now about to do. Are we not about to commit an act of positive cruelty in sending this young man to prison, merely because he has obeyed his father? This is the real state of the case; and, I would ask, is it not likely that the sympathies of the public will be enlisted against our privileges, if we persist in this committal? I have lately had opportunities of ascertaining the public feeling, and I differ completely from the Honourable Member for Finsbury, as to the bent of that opinion. I am convinced that public opinion runs decidedly in favour of the judges.

Mr. PRYME. — There seems to be some misunderstanding as to the case of the younger Mr. Howard. The facts of the case are these: — Mr. Hansard presented a petition, stating that he had received notice of a new trial. That petition was ordered to be taken into consideration on the Monday following. On that occasion, Mr. Hansard was examined; and it appeared from his evidence, that since the committal to gaol of the elder Mr. Howard, his son had been carrying on his business; and, accordingly, Mr. Howard was ordered to attend at the bar. He did attend, and pleaded guilty to the charge of contempt of our privileges. I submit, then, that he is fairly liable to committal. The Right Honourable Member for Dublin University has contended that the son should not be punished for obeying the commands of his father. I would ask the Right Honourable Gentleman whether he would, in the court over which he presides with so much credit to himself, admit as a defence for a culprit the assertion that he had acted under the direction of his father, who was in prison? The fact is, that our only course is, to attack the instrument; and if we admit the defence, that persons were acting under orders, our committals will completely fail of their object.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I think that the younger Howard cannot be committed on the testimony he has given. The resolutions of last night will prove to Honourable Members that the young man had nothing to do with the action to which those resolutions referred. I think that the young man has completely cleared himself of any participation in the fifth action — the action for which he was cited to the bar. For this reason it would be an act of injustice to punish him.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I am quite surprised to find the House called on to discuss the question of privilege on this particular occasion. I did not expect to hear the speech of the Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter, delivered on this day week, answered on the present occasion, when the Honourable and Learned Member has no opportunity of reply. Neither did I expect to hear the privilege defended on the merits of a particular publication. It is most unfortunate, in my opinion, that we should be led away from the general principle to the incidents of a particular transaction. I, for one, think that our privilege of publication might be preserved without publishing unnecessary libels. Even if obscene books have been found in Newgate, this House has no right to inflict a punishment on Mr. Stockdale. If Mr. Stockdale acted wrongly, the courts were open for his punishment. The whole argument I would urge is, that, although it may be necessary that we should inform the public of our proceedings, it is not necessary that we should do it in such a manner as to give to individuals just cause of complaint. I can adduce an instance in which publication was unnecessarily injurious. An individual was examined respecting the present state of New Zealand. His evidence was not satisfactory, nor was it ever intended to legislate on it. However, another person declared that he would not believe the witness on his oath. I maintain, that in this case the publication was neither just nor necessary. The Right Honourable Judge opposite adduced, as an instance of the uncertainty of a just decision, one drawn from the House of Lords, in the case of Lords Eldon and Ellenborough being overborne in that assembly. Now, I think that a more unfortunate illustration could not have been chosen. Is it because, in one large assembly, the law of the land has been overruled, that we should expect justice in a larger and more popular assembly? The Right Honourable Member for Tamworth found great fault with the Court of Queen's Bench for their decision; but he should remember that the House pleaded to the action; that we courted the decision of the court; and that, if we had proceeded regularly, we should have had the opinion of the fifteen judges, and, ultimately, of the House of Lords. If you thought the judges wrong, why not try an appeal, when the judges would be set right, if they had been in error? On the subject of the particular question before the House, I would say, that we might stop the administration of justice generally, but we cannot stop the progress of particular actions. The plaintiff will always be one step in advance; and, although we may commit men and women, or even the judges, the action will still go on.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I do not rise to make any remarks upon the motion of the Honourable Member for Finsbury, but merely to satisfy the House upon what has been said by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Ripon. If I understood the objection of my Right Honourable Friend, it was, that young Mr. Howard has now been summoned before the House with respect to the fifth action, whereas we are about to punish him with respect to the fourth action. Now, I confess, I do not attach any very great weight to that objection, as I consider that the question before the House is, has a breach of privilege been committed, or not? When Mr. Hansard was before the House, the other day, he said he had been served with two notices; one by Mr. Pearce, the other by Mr. Howard, junior. The House has summoned these persons before it, and Pearce does not appear; but Howard, junior, appears, and says he has further served the notice in the fourth action.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — No!

Mr. GOULBURN. — I, at least, so understood him at the bar; and if so, he has been guilty of a breach of privilege.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I do not conceive that Howard made any such statement as this to the House.

[Cries of "Spoke, spoke!" amid which the Right Honourable Gentleman resumed his seat.]

Mr. O'CONNELL. — The witness, in my opinion, made, most strongly, the statement just repeated by the Right Honourable Member for the University of Cambridge.

Mr. WYNN. — I care not for what breach of privilege this young man has been summoned to the bar; still the complaint is, that he has committed a breach of privilege. Suppose a Member rises in his place and complained of a distinct breach of privilege, and the party was called to the bar; if it should appear that he had been guilty of any other breach of privilege, he might equally be committed for the contempt. Mr. Howard is now in attendance, and any charge of a breach of our privileges that any Honourable Member may have to bring forward against him, may be brought forward unquestionably. I shall not, therefore, go into the question further than to say that Mr. Howard has admitted that he has been guilty of a breach of privilege.

Mr. LAW. — The evidence of Mr. Hansard says that the writ was served by a person who represented himself to be named Pearce, and a clerk of Mr. Howard. The charge against young Howard is, that he has been instrumental in serving the writ; whereas it appears, from the evidence on which you are acting, that it was not the person now summoned to the bar, but Mr. Pearce, who served it. You have found it impossible to restrain these actions by the commitment of the father, and the House is now proceeding with this unnecessary severity against his son and clerk, a young man nineteen years of age, because he was instrumental in serving the writ of inquiry; whereas your own witness says he was not the party who took the step, but a clerk, not forthcoming, named Pearce. That may solve the difficulty as to the non-appearance of Mr. Pearce.

[Laughter, and cries of "Mr. Pearce is here!"]

The Gentleman who laughs may be in the confidence of Mr. Pearce. I, however, am not.

[Cries of "Divide!"]

It is very well for Gentlemen who have come down to the House to decide without hearing one word of the evidence, to cry "Divide!" I am pressed to divide; and when I consider the time has arrived for doing so, I will divide; but, till then, I will not, in the few observations I have to make, be deterred from my duty by the cries of a majority, who are not content to carry their object, but who wish to put an end to discussion. It appears to me to be most unjust, on the part of this House, to adjudicate upon a breach of privilege by the younger Howard, when it is admitted that it was committed by another person. Two parties are summoned here to-night, and it is evident that the one which has appeared is not the one pointed at by Mr. Hansard, as having served the notice on him. If Mr. Hansard is mistaken, then his evidence falls to the ground; because it is clear that he speaks of a person, who, it appears, is called Pearce, and not Howard, the name of the party now in attendance. I cannot suppose, then, that this House, if it fail in the real object of its inquiry, will proceed with something else which belongs altogether to another case — and say that, its power not having been sufficient to restrain the father as to the present proceedings, it will go against the son for his share in others. I contend that, under these circumstances, your present proceedings are wholly irrelevant to the case before you. The witness says that, as to the fourth action, it is true that he took proceedings in it; but that the person who served the writ of inquiry was Mr. Pearce. Surely, then, you do not mean to visit the agent with your displeasure when you have committed the principal; or the son, when the father is in confinement? Such a step will not fail to throw ridicule on the proceedings of this House in the eyes of the country.

Mr. SANFORD. — This young man has unequivocally declared that he has done that which is a breach of the privileges of this House; and, when he was asked if he had taken any proceedings in the third action, his answer was, "I have done a great deal in the fourth action." He was then asked, "The action on account of which your father is in confinement?"—Answer, "Yes." Under these circumstances, it is evident that this young man, knowing that his father was in confinement for a breach of the privileges of the House, has aided in carrying on the action, and has therefore been guilty of a contempt of the privileges of the House.

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL.—I do not think that we are sufficiently informed as to what this young man has done, and I am rather of opinion that my Right Honourable Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge misunderstood the Right Honourable Member for Ripon, and that that Right Honourable Gentleman's impression of what Howard said was the right one. With respect, too, to the terms of the resolution of the Noble Lord now before the House, it does not explain, with anything like sufficiently definite accuracy, the breach of privilege therein stated to have been committed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—It seems to me that all these several actions are part of one and the same proceeding; and, with regard to one of them, it was resolved, yesterday, that being in any way concerned in bringing, or aiding in bringing, that action, is a gross breach of the privileges of this House.

[Cries of "Which?"]

The action for which the jury has been summoned for the 20th of February. As I have just said, these proceedings are, in my opinion, all intended to defeat the privileges of this House. It appears that the younger Mr. Howard, having been clerk to his father for three years, has been the instrument of bringing these actions one after another; and that Mr. Howard, though in custody, still employs the clerks in his office to defeat our privileges. There can be no doubt that the younger Mr. Howard acted knowingly; and as for the remark, that he was not brought to the bar for the breach of privilege for which it is proposed to commit him, I do not see, unless the Right Honourable Baronet opposite can maintain that no man at our bar is to plead guilty to a breach of privilege, that this House can avoid committing any individual who shall acknowledge himself guilty of such a breach.

MR. SPEAKER.—It has been moved "That Thomas Howard, junior, having been concerned in conducting the action of Stockdale against Messrs. Hansard, after the prosecution of the said action had been resolved by this House to be a breach of their privileges, has been guilty of a contempt and a breach of the privileges of this House." To which an amendment has been proposed, "To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the question, in order to add the words 'the privileges of Parliament are intended solely for the benefit of the community at large; and, as the power of publishing such of its Reports, Votes, and Proceedings as shall be deemed necessary or conducive to the public interests, is an essential incident to the constitutional functions of Parliament, it is expedient that a joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament should be appointed for the purpose of considering the best mode of securing to each branch of the Legislature the free exercise of a power so important to the public welfare,' instead thereof." The question I now put is, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

The House then divided; when the numbers were—Ayes 137, Noes 37; Majority 100.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I have now to move, Sir, that Thomas Howard, junior, having been guilty of a contempt and a breach of the privileges of this House, be for his said offence committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I cannot see, Sir, what specific act this young man has committed which should subject him to imprisonment. For anything that appears to the contrary, it may be said that young Howard has merely copied certain papers in his father's office. I shall give this motion a direct negative.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I should wish to give this young man an opportunity of expressing his regret for the course he has pursued, and his determination not to persevere in it. I feel that it would be desirable to escape from the necessity of committing him; and as the House put it not only to the sheriffs, but also to Stockdale and Howard the father, before committal, whether they had any statement to make or explanation to offer, I beg to suggest that the young man be called in; and if, after the resolution of the House shall have been read to him, he shall declare his readiness to abandon all proceedings in breach of the privileges of the House in future, he may then be reprimanded and discharged; but if, on the contrary, he shall express his intention of persevering, in that case I will vote for his committal. I am disposed to move, by way of amendment, that ——

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Before the Honourable and Learned Member moves an amendment, I would beg to remind him that the House has already decided that this person has been guilty of a breach of privilege; and to move an amendment of this kind now, would interrupt the natural course of proceeding in such cases. With regard to the proposition to call in Mr. Howard, junior, I cannot forget that in the case of another individual who was so called in with regard to a breach of privilege committed by him, that person gave an assurance of the kind suggested by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, and that the next day there appeared a letter in the newspapers revoking that pledge. I think, therefore, that the natural and better course is, that this person should be committed to custody, and then he will have an opportunity of petitioning the House, if he choose to do so, and of distinctly stating what he proposes to do, in deference to the privileges of the House. I do not think that any verbal assurances of the kind could now be accepted as sufficient.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Mr. SHAW. — I rise, Sir, to protest against the course proposed to be adopted with regard to this young man.

Mr. FITZROY KELLY. — I must express my concurrence in the opinion of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Ripon that the Attorney General and the Noble Lord opposite ought to be called upon to state what is the real breach of privilege which this young man has committed.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I was not here at the commencement of this discussion; but I must say that it is with extreme regret I find that that which would not be allowed in a court of justice should, when proposed in this House, be received with cheers; and that a person should be committed without any declaration being stated as to what he is committed for. I have in vain endeavoured, since I entered the House, to understand what act has been done by this young man for which he is now to be committed.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

And I hope I shall not be overpowered by clamour, but that it will be honestly stated, in plain terms, what offence this person has been guilty of? The words of the motion appear to me so vague, indefinite, and indeterminate, that I confess I cannot understand them; and I do hope that the Learned Attorney General will inform the House what the real offence is that is the cause of this committal.

Mr. SPEAKER. — It has been moved "That Thomas Howard, junior, having been guilty of a contempt and a breach of privileges of this House, be for his said offence committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly." To which a direct negative has been proposed by way of amendment. The question now is, "That the original motion be agreed to."

The House then divided: — Ayes 134, Noes 41; Majority 93.

Godson, R.
Kelly, F.

It was here announced that Mr. Pearce, the clerk of Mr. Howard, senior, was in attendance; and he was called, and examined as follows: —

Mr. SPEAKER.—What is your name? —Thomas George Johnstone Pearce.

What are you?—Clerk to Mr. Howard, of 7. Norfolk Street, Strand.

Have you served a writ of inquiry upon the Messrs. Hansard? — Not the writ, but the notice of the writ.

In what action? — I believe in the two last actions.

Do you know what was the cause of those actions? — I believe they were actions for libel.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — Did you know, at the time, that Mr. Stockdale had been committed for a breach of privilege in bringing these actions? — I did.

And you have since conducted proceedings in these actions? — I have.

Did you engross the writs of inquiry? — I did not; I only served the notices of the writs.

Mr. LAW. — Did you know, at the same time, that the Court of Queen's Bench had held that these actions were maintainable? — I did.

Did you know that damages had been recovered in a similar action on the same grounds? — I did.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — Did you also know that this House had declared the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench a breach of its privileges? — I did.

[Mr. Law having objected to this question, Mr. Pearce was ordered to withdraw; when the Solicitor General consented to withdraw the question, and Mr. Pearce was recalled.]

Mr. GODSON. — How long have you been in the service of Mr. Howard? — Two years.

Are you an articled clerk, or merely a copying clerk? — A copying clerk only.

What wages do you receive per week?

Mr. Pearce was here ordered to withdraw.

Mr. HUME. — I must object to this question, as having no connection with our proceedings. The Honourable and Learned Member might just as well ask how much bread Mr. Pearce eats.

[Laughter.]

Mr. GODSON. — The Honourable Member has quite misunderstood the import and intention of this question, which does, in fact, relate to how much bread this gentleman may eat.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

This gentleman may have a family to support; and I wish to know what is to become of those who may be dependent on him for support, provided he shall be committed?

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I have heard much of the courtesy of the majority to the minority during these proceedings; but it is not very apparent on the present occasion; and I can only say, that I will take the sense of the House on the propriety of this question being put. I asked the question, knowing that Mr. Pearce was a mere copying clerk, with no more, perhaps, than some few shillings a-week; and I wish to see whether this House will so far degrade itself as to visit a man in so humble a situation with its vengeance.

Mr. HUME.—I will, at once, withdraw my objection to the question.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I think the question should be put, with this qualification, — that Mr. Pearce be informed that he need not answer it unless he chooses.

Mr. Pearce was then recalled.

Mr. GODSON. — What wages do you get? —I had rather not answer that question.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Have you served the notice of the writ of inquiry on Messrs. Hansard in the present instance? — I have; by Mr. Howard's direction.

Who performs the duties of the office in Mr. Howard's absence?—Mr. Howard's son acts for his father in his absence.

When were you there last? — I have been there subsequently to the proceedings in the present action.

How many clerks are there? Who is the conducting clerk? — Mr. Howard's son and myself do the entire business of the office during Mr. Howard's absence.

Mr. LAW. — Have you any other employment? — None.

Would you be liable to be dismissed if you were to refuse to do what Mr. Howard directed you? — At a moment's notice.

Have you any family? — Yes; I have a wife and son. I was not bred to the law, but have been a military man all my life; and have learned never to break the law, or disobey my orders.

And your family have no means of support if you are imprisoned on this charge? — None. Imprisonment would be my ruin, and theirs also. I beg to tell the House that my wife is allied to some of the oldest nobility, some of the first nobility in this country — I may say the very first and oldest in this country,—a family the patent of whose nobility is as early as 1616. She is the daughter of the Honourable Philip Roper, and is first cousin to Lord Teynham ——

[Laughter.]

And as she is an outcast from her family for having been so imprudent as to marry a soldier ——

[Renewed laughter.]

— she would be totally destitute if she had not me to provide a subsistence for her.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN. — I should wish the following question to be put to the witness: — Is the House to understand that if Mr. Howard were to desire you to do anything, in future, contrary to the privileges of this House, you would do it?

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I object to that question.

Mr. Pearce was ordered to withdraw.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN. — I merely wish to give the witness an opportunity of exculpating himself. He appears to have acted as a mere clerk; and I think that, so far as this person is concerned, the privileges of the House would be sufficiently vindicated by his answering this question in a satisfactory manner.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — It does not appear to me to be just to ask any question with reference to the future; and I think — although I am sure that the Honourable Member for Limerick wishes to put this question from motives of clemency and indulgence to the witness — that it is a question which may tend to involve him in a further breach of privilege.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN. — I will, under these circumstances, withdraw the question.

Mr. WOLVERLEY ATTWOOD. — I merely rise to express my disapprobation of these frequent interruptions of the course of the examinations of these witnesses.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL.—I have now to move, Sir, that Thomas George Johnstone Pearce, having been concerned in conducting the action of Stockdale against Hansard, after the prosecution of the said action had been resolved by this House to be a breach of their privileges, has been guilty of a contempt and a breach of the privileges of this House.

The question having been put, —

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN said: — There is some satisfaction, Sir, connected with this motion, — namely, that the House cannot go lower than it has now done, and cannot be called upon to commit any other person under more painful circumstances, as this man tells you that he has a wife and family dependent upon him for support. If this House will commit a man under these circumstances, then I can say no more for the sense of justice which governs this House. This person has been, the greater part of his life, in the army; and though, for the last two years, he may have been in an attorney's office, yet he cannot be supposed to know much of law. Though this, I am aware, is no excuse for him, yet it may surely be pleaded as some apology for his conduct. He has done nothing but act as a mere common clerk; and if the House is to go on committing such persons as this to prison, our rooms will very soon be found too small to contain the number. I repeat, Sir, that this House has never been called upon to commit any man under more painful circumstances.

LORD MAHON. — I will venture to ask, Sir, how much further this House will go? To what further depths of degradation is it willing to sink? What hope does the Attorney General hold out of our coming to a safe or honourable issue? I would entreat the House to remember that in all former cases of privilege, public sympathy has been in favour of Parliament; but this House is acting, at present, in the very face of public opinion.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

Honourable Members say "No!" but I would ask, do not the correspondents of Honourable Gentlemen opposite confirm my opinion?

[Renewed cries of "No!"]

Well, I can answer for my own having done so. These proceedings fully confirm what we have heard in the early part of this evening from the Honourable Member for Westminster; and in the opinion that Honourable Member expressed, I wholly concur; for, feeling that this question interferes with the laws and liberties of my country, I have taken an opportunity of conversing upon it with various persons, of every party, of every profession, of almost every walk in life; and I can solemnly declare that, with the exception of Members of this House, and of their relations, I can scarcely remember two out of several hundreds I have spoken to, who approve of the violent and vindictive course which we have taken. And let us distinctly understand what is the question before us. The question is not, whether we shall publish our proceedings, — I concede our right to do that, and am in favour of it; I wish this House to give the fullest and fairest publication of its proceedings, in the same manner as it did before the question of sale was agreed to, on the 13th of August, 1835; — but the question is, what our privileges are? The Noble Lord opposite said he would confirm them by a declaratory Act; but he has subsequently retired from his promise in that respect, and now substitutes these vindictive proceedings in its stead.

I deeply regret that the Noble Lord has shrunk from following up his announcement as to a declaratory Act, since, by our present proceedings, we are setting up privilege above the law of the land. That is the real practical question before us; and I have entreated the House, over and over again, to reflect whether it was prepared to adhere to the rash and ill-considered resolutions which were passed in 1837, which stated that in no possible case would we allow a court of law to take cognisance of our privileges. I feel called upon to remind the House of the arguments which were pressed upon it by the Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter, — arguments to which I listened with great attention, and to which I had hoped to have heard an answer given by the Learned Solicitor General; but he abstained from doing so. The Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter's argument was this: "Suppose, for instance, that a murder were committed in the execution of a warrant of this House, how could you prevent a court of law from taking cognisance of that?" By the resolutions of 1837, you claim to be the sole judges in your own case, and I ask you if you can possibly maintain such a claim in these days? I entreat the House to consider how much the present course of proceeding is likely to add to our difficulties. The Noble Lord, on a preceding evening, quoted the opinion of Lord Denman. I do not stand up for the judgment which Lord Denman pronounced; but I do say this, that the true way of vindicating our privileges is — not by plunging deeper into this series of commitments, but — by framing a legislative measure. If the Noble Lord will bring forward a measure of that kind, I will apply myself to it with an earnest desire to put an end to our present difficulties; and I can assure the Noble Lord that there will be no reluctance on our parts to consider such measures with a view to a conciliatory settlement of the question. But if we are called upon, night after night, to proceed with vindictive severity, I shall give my decided opposition to that course of proceeding.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, it has been observed by the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, that statements, which have been over and over again contradicted, in the course of the debates on this question of privilege, are nevertheless again and again brought before the House; and the Noble Lord who has just resumed his seat has made more than one remark which is an instance of the truth of this assertion. The Noble Lord seems to think that if we were to go back to the situation we were in previous to the year 1835, we should be perfectly secure. But the judges of the Queen's Bench have laid down a totally opposite doctrine; they do not say that it is on account of their sale or their publication, in a shop, that you are not entitled to publish these proceedings, but that any publication is a libel for which the party publishing may be proceeded against. Now I will illustrate the effect of this decision by an event which has occurred this very day. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke asked me, in the course of the evening, a question respecting the transfer of Hill Coolies to the Mauritius, and about certain papers containing facts and statements on the subject. Those papers I am about to lay on the table, after having examined them, with a view to the introduction of certain clauses in a Bill now on the table. They refer to the general treatment of the Hill Coolies by their masters and employers, and by the captains of ships and agents who were employed in conveying them from India. I was asked whether I thought that a very cautious extract from those papers would be sufficient for publication, or whether they should contain all the particulars, even although they might contain charges against individuals. My direction was, that a full and complete statement should be made out at the Colonial Office respecting those persons, because I should not, otherwise, be giving the House a fair case or opportunity for saying "Ay" or "No" on the Bill, when it comes before them. But do I say that those papers do not criminate individuals? Far from it. I will not say that there may not be in them some statements exceedingly disagreeable to individuals. What would be the consequence? Revoke, if you please, your resolution of sale; but if the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke, having these papers in his possession, should send them to some persons in the country, in order to ascertain their opinion as to the facts, and as to what manner he should proceed in, when the Bill might come before the House,—that, according to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, would be a publication; and the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke, who had communicated these documents with the conscientious intention of forming a fair opinion, would render both himself and the person to whom he had applied liable to actions and indictments for libel. So little is the Noble Lord, who has given more attention than most Members to the subject, aware of the real position of the House! The Noble Lord agrees with me in opinion, that the privilege of publication is necessary; and I therefore ask, how are we to assert it? The Noble Lord has said that I have receded from my intention to introduce a declaratory Bill? My declaration was, that although our powers are very extensive, the assertion of our privileges might be attended with such public inconvenience as to render a declaratory Act necessary for the general benefit of the country. My opinion in that respect has not been changed; but I am determined to preserve, in any manner I can, the privileges of this House; and, without receding from my former opinion, I must say that I have not any reason to suppose that a declaratory Act is likely to be passed in the manner I then supposed. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth suggested that a Bill might be brought into the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor. I find, on consideration, and on weighing all the information which I have received, that there are various objections to that course. I am determined, if I adopt the course of a declaratory Bill, to do so with the greatest possible consideration, and to give it the best chance of success. I will not allow our privileges to be further weakened by the course which I wish to adopt for the purpose of securing their not being acquiesced in elsewhere. Therefore, while I am still favourable to a declaratory Bill, and would certainly propose it if I saw a fair chance of carrying it without injury to our privileges, I must tell the Noble Lord that, in the present state of the question, a declaratory Bill being an uncertain mode of proceeding (inasmuch as I do not know how it might be received by persons of great weight and authority in the House of Lords), I am not prepared to say that the ancient mode of vindicating our privileges by commitment should be abandoned. We were told, at the commencement of these proceedings, that our resolutions would be mere waste paper, unless we acted on them against all parties, and would only serve to expose us to the contempt of the whole world. But it must be clear that the House has the power of discriminating between the cases of various individuals. When the case before us, however, is that of a person who has made it his trade — at any rate, the main object of his profession — to bring a series of actions, one after the other, for the purpose of calling our privileges in question, if we were not to proceed in our resolution, the contempt to which we have been told we should expose ourselves would justly be incurred. I may be told, and told with great truth, that it is a disagreeable proceeding to commit persons in the low and unhappy condition of the person who has lately been examined at the bar. But I must say that the person chiefly to blame is the attorney who employed this man to commit an offence against our privileges. Mr.

Howard has some power over this man, which is tantamount to the authority of a master. He ought not to employ that power to oblige any person employed under him to disobey the law; and it is not the fault of this House if our privileges are violated in this manner. I am quite certain that no servant or day labourer would be excused for an illegal act by any court in the kingdom, merely because he was employed by his master to do it. If none of the small courts would act in this manner, I am equally sure that the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Chancery would not. We have often been told that we are bringing ourselves into public odium by these proceedings. If any mode of settling the question can be pointed out, I shall most readily consider it, because I am convinced that great public inconvenience is caused by the long-continued discussions in this House. But I am quite satisfied, that if you now declare you have no power to commit, you will not only fail in your present proceeding, but will never again obtain a recognition of your privileges.

Mr. GORING. — The question before us is this — whether or not the individual who has been examined at the bar is guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House. I confess, after hearing the evidence, that I cannot come to that conclusion. I perfectly agree with the Noble Lord, that if any person is to be blamed, it is the attorney; and I therefore think that if we vote this person guilty of a breach of privilege, we shall be stultifying ourselves.

Mr. INGHAM. — Sir, perhaps the House will excuse me for a few moments whilst I endeavour to correct the misunderstanding into which the Noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) seems to have fallen, with respect to the effect of the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. The case put by the Noble Lord was this, — that if the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke were to send into the country the papers to which he alluded, he would be deemed guilty of a libel by the Court of Queen's Bench. I believe that would not be the case. I perfectly agree with the Noble Lord the Member for Hertford, that if you were to rescind the resolution for the sale of papers, you would get rid of all the difficulties of the case. The Noble Lord opposite said that it would be monstrous to consider a person guilty of libel for communicating these papers to his constituents. The Court of Queen's Bench never gave any such decision as that.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I contend that it never did. The judgment of Mr. Justice Patteson has been noticed with all the respect to which it is entitled, but I think it has not been looked at with sufficient accuracy by those who impugn it on that ground. Mr. Justice Patteson said, that every individual in the House enjoyed the right of communicating to any person, whose opinion it was necessary to obtain, any document published by the authority of the House. Why did the learned judge say so? Because we have a right to do that which enables us to perform our duty within the House. A Member may feel that there are documents brought before the House with which he is not individually acquainted, and he may be extremely desirous of ascertaining the opinions of other persons, well qualified to form a correct judgment, upon those documents; and I contend that he would be perfectly justified in so doing. I should be quite ready to run the risk of any supposed guilt which I might challenge by the circulation of such papers, because I should be protected by the general law of the land, if I acted only in the performance of my duty. It is undoubtedly necessary for the due performance of our duties in this House, that every Member should have the right of communicating these documents, and that right has been admitted by the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench; and if you repeal the resolution of sale, you may circulate your papers wherever you may think it material to send them for the public benefit. But if you publish them by sale, any man may obtain them; and I therefore consider it a complete misconception of the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench to say that circulation by sale is immaterial, for the judgment was only directed against indiscriminate circulation.

Mr. A. WHITE. — Sir, the Noble Lord the Member for Hereford and the Honourable Member for Westminster having stated, in strong terms, that public opinion is decidedly against the House on this question, I beg to state, that I have had several communications from my constituents encouraging me to support the privileges of the House, and not one of an opposite tendency. I therefore believe the majority of the public concur in the steps the House has been obliged to take in support of its privileges, as being not only essential to the efficient discharge of the public business, but of vital importance for the preservation of the liberties of the people. In common with other Honourable Members, I felt exceedingly reluctant to vote for the committal of the sheriffs and other individuals to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Yet I have the satisfaction of knowing that I am supported in this course by the most eminent statesmen and lawyers on both sides of the House; and I must say, that had it not been for the continued and unaccountable opposition of a small minority of the House to the course taken for the vindication of its privileges, instead of having, now, some four or five actions going on, we should have only had the first case of Stockdale and Hansard to contend with. I therefore do not hesitate to avow my decided conviction that the opponents of the course taken by the majority of the House are entirely to blame for the committal of the parties whose case is now before the House.

The House divided: — Ayes 135, Noes 53; Majority 82.

Resolved, That Thomas George Johnstone Pearce having been concerned in conducting the action of Stockdale against Messrs. Hansard, after the prosecution of the said action has been resolved by this House to be a breach of their privileges, has been guilty of a contempt and a breach of the privileges of this House.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — Sir,

I have now to move, "That Thomas George Johnstone Pearce having been guilty of a contempt and a breach of the privileges of this House, be, for his said offence, committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly." I know the consequences of this motion to the individual at the bar, but it is quite clear that his imprisonment need not be long. Mr. Howard will have learned by the vote of this night, that he can no longer use the man who has been at the bar as an instrument for prosecuting his actions. There is no reason why Mr. Howard should discharge this man from his service because he cannot perform this particular service for him. Mr. Howard can very easily release him from that duty; and in the course of a very short time he will be able to present a petition to this House, submit, and obtain his discharge. It is quite competent for Mr. Howard to limit his own punishment and the punishment of those connected with him; but I am perfectly sure that the imprisonment ought to be continued so long as it is necessary to enforce the privileges of this House.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I beg to second the motion.

Question put.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — Sir, I must take the same course on this occasion as I have done on previous occasions.

[Cries of " Oh!"]

I shall certainly divide the House; and whenever a motion is made for a similar commitment of innocent individuals, I intend to resort to the same course of opposition. The Solicitor General supposes that this person may be released on his submission to the House. I know that nothing would be more gratifying to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman than the presentation of such a petition, because he imagines that it will further the object he has in view, and that is, to extort from this unhappy person an acknowledgment of the authority of the House. Of course, being a poor man, and left without subsistence, he will be happy to make submission in order to rejoin his family; but what will be the value of such an acknowledgment? What will be the future course in actions of this description? The attorneys bringing similar actions will send all the ticket-porters in the Temple, Gray's Inn, and Lincoln's Inn, instead of their own clerks, to serve their summonses. Then my Honourable Friend will have to take them all up, call them to the bar of the House, tell them that they have committed a breach of privilege, and order them into custody. I wish him joy of his prospective occupation.

[Cries of " Oh, oh, oh!"]

I can perfectly understand the cheer of Honourable Gentlemen on the other side. The meaning of it is this, " Don't interrupt the proceedings of the majority, but let us hastily exercise our judicial functions." I can conceive occasions on which it might be a great relief to a Government to be allowed to proceed in this manner.

[Cries of " Oh, oh!"]

If Gentlemen will persist in these interruptions, I will move an adjournment, and continue dividing the House until this time to-morrow morning. I am really surprised that Gentlemen should conduct themselves in this manner. I thank God that I am not subject to their tribunal! Are Honourable Gentlemen aware that the present question is a judicial one? Do they know that they are to decide upon their honour and conscience the question of separating a man from his wife and family, and confining him without the means of subsistence? It would become us at least to enter upon the consideration of a question of this kind with some little prudence, and to let the world see that we are acting without passion.

[Cries of " Hear! " and, " Oh! "]

I wish to say that I am not in a passion. Although I may have expressed myself with some degree of warmth, I must say that I never was more cool in my life.

[Cries of " Oh, oh!" and laughter.]

My feelings may certainly have been excited by the want of attention which has been manifested to those judicial functions which the House is called upon to exercise, and which I am fully convinced a portion of the House has not addressed itself to. I shall certainly divide the House on the motion.

MR. W. MILES. — I beg to move, as an amendment, to leave out from the word " Pearce " to the end of the question, in order to add the words " be called to the bar and reprimanded by Mr. Speaker, and discharged," instead thereof.

An Honourable Member.—I beg, Sir, to second the amendment.

Question put, — "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; main question put. The House divided: — Ayes 134; Noes 50; Majority (against the amendment) 80.

Resolved, That Thomas George Johnstone Pearce, having been guilty of a contempt and a breach of the privileges of this House, be for his said offence committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly.

MR. UNDER-SHERIFF FRANCE.

Mr. GORING. — Sir, I have been requested to present a petition from Mr. France, the under-sheriff of the county of Middlesex, who states his readiness to pay all due respect to our privileges and resolutions, under the protection of the House. I beg to move that the petition be now read.

The clerk read the petition as follows:—

The humble petition of Thomas France, under-sheriff of the county of Middlesex, Showeth, — That your petitioner has been served with a copy of the Resolutions of your Honourable House, warning your petitioner and all others connected with the carrying on the proceedings of the office of sheriff against acting in aid, furtherance, and prosecution of a certain action brought by John Joseph Stockdale against Messrs. Hansard and others, in breach of the privileges of your Honourable House.

That your petitioner is anxious to pay the most respectful deference and obedience to your Honourable House and its privileges, but has great ground to fear that, in yielding such obedience the sheriff of the said county may be exposed to great personal risk and loss; but, relying upon the protection of your Honourable House to the said sheriff and his officers, your petitioner respectfully assures your Honourable House that all due respect will be paid to its privileges and resolutions under the protection of this Honourable House. And your petitioner will ever pray.

COUNTY CONSTABULARY.

On the motion of Mr. F. Maule, Act (2 & 3 Vic.) read.

Mr. F. MAULE. — I rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the County Constabulary Act of last Session. My object is — not to alter any of the principles laid down in that Act, but — to provide for the difficulties which have arisen in carrying it into effect in the various counties, and isolated portions of counties, in which it has been adopted. I propose to alter the system of payment for the county constabulary, by enabling the justices to assess for each district. Many of the difficulties will in that way be got over. If the justices assess to the police rates, those parts only of counties which adopt the police will be called on to pay the rate laid by the justices. It may be collected with the county rates, and the difficulty which at present exists will be effectually removed, because, with respect to isolated portions of counties which have adopted the Act, the justices would be empowered, in the Bill which I propose to introduce, either to assess those portions of counties in the rates which they might think fit to lay on, or to apply to the treasurer of those isolated portions to pay that proportion of the rate which they will be called on to pay. Another inconvenience which at present exists, is the uncertainty as to the operation of the Act in municipal boroughs which have not obtained a grant of a court of quarter sessions. I believe that the clause will exempt these boroughs; still, as there is considerable doubt on the subject, I intend to declare in the present Bill, that no town under the Municipal Corporations Act, having a municipal corporation of its own, and being bound to maintain a police of its own, shall be liable to be assessed for the county constabulary; and I propose to enable towns of this description to combine with the county in having the same chief constable to control the whole police, both in the county and in the towns. Another difficulty has arisen with respect to those parts of the counties of Kent, Essex, and Surrey which border on the circle of the metropolitan police, and with reference to which those parts which are included within the metropolitan police district may be called upon not only to pay the rate for the metropolitan police, but for such parts of the county as are without the boundaries of the metropolitan police. I mean to provide that those parts of the suburban districts shall not be rated to the county constabulary beyond the limits of the metropolitan police districts; and that magistrates acting within those suburban districts shall take no part in the assessment of the rate for those parts of the county in which they have no local jurisdiction. These are the principal alterations which I propose to make. I do not intend in any way to alter the principle of the measure. I am aware that several counties have complained that its adoption is attended with very considerable expense, and that some propositions are likely to be made, by which it is imagined that a constabulary may be established at much less expense. But I do not think that any effectual system can be established, unless the constables, who shall be appointed, give up the whole of their time, not only to the detection, but to the prevention of crime, which is a duty more incumbent upon them than the mere detection of crime after it has been committed. During the short period that this Act has been in operation, great service has been derived from it, though, perhaps, not all that might be desired. I am happy to say that it has been adopted in thirteen counties, and in some of these with very considerable success; and I trust that other counties will soon follow their example. I am sure that every Honourable Gentleman will be prepared to consider, calmly and dispassionately, this measure, which can only have one object in view, — that of giving, during these disturbed times, a good and efficient rural constabulary, to which may safely be intrusted the preservation of the peace and tranquillity of the country.

Mr. WALLACE.—I beg to second the motion.

Question put.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I do not intend to offer any opposition to the motion of the Honourable Gentleman: on the contrary, I am glad that he has introduced this measure, and that he has taken a different course from that which he pursued last Session, by introducing it at a time when it can be carefully considered. On the points to which the Honourable Gentleman has referred, I do not think there is much difference of opinion between us. I am glad that the Honourable Gentleman proposes to modify the provisions of the Bill of last Session as to the expense; and I approve also of an alteration of the Bill with regard to its operation in the suburban districts, where it has certainly produced a great degree of confusion. I was not aware that it had been adopted to the extent stated; and I should have felt considerable doubts on the subject, had not the Honourable Gentleman made this statement to the House. I can understand that the principle has been agreed to; but I cannot understand how so extensive an alteration has already been so extensively acted on. There are certain constitutional objections to the Bill, which will be more properly discussed at the second reading, and I merely, now, enter my protest against it upon these grounds: — I know that the expense has caused great dissatisfaction, and I hope that, in this respect, the Honourable Gentleman will allow me to introduce clauses, to give the Bill a different course of operation. If counties choose, voluntarily, to incur this heavy expense, of course I can have no objection to their doing so; but if it be found that in other counties the magistrates can establish an efficient police at one third of the expense, I hope there will be no objections to the introduction of some provision, enabling them to establish a police of that character. The Honourable Gentleman says, that no persons ought to be employed as constables who cannot devote the whole of their time to the performance of the duties of that office. Now, where the population is large, that may, perhaps, be desirable; but in rural districts, where the population is small, it will be impossible to give full employment to constables. I think that an efficient force might be established by appointing high constables, having under their control a number of constables appointed by the Courts Leet and Courts Borough, and that such a force would be more efficient for the purposes required than that proposed by this Bill. These are the chief points which strike me at present, and I trust the Honourable Gentleman will give them his best consideration.

Mr. HODGES. — I do not rise to offer any opposition to the Bill of the Honourable Gentleman; but I must say that, as he has declared it is not his intention to alter the principle of the Bill of last Session, I entirely despair of obtaining any material improvement of that measure. I beg to give notice of my intention, at an early day, to move for leave to introduce a Bill for the purpose, not only of improving the present constabulary force, but for the purpose of providing efficient means of affording protection to property, and security to the inhabitants of the country.

Mr. HUME. — The Right Honourable Baronet (Sir. E. Knatchbull) has expressed a hope that the measure will be carried out with the consent of the ratepayers. Now, I wish to ask in what way the concurrence of the ratepayers can be obtained? Certainly not by being compelled to pay large sums of money to magistrates over whom they have not the least control. Let a board be established for the purpose of managing the affairs of the county, and then the ratepayers will be more satisfied than they are, under the present system. I think the suggestion of the Right Honourable Baronet, that it should be optional with counties to adopt the measure, most objectionable; because the effect of establishing a good police in one county will be to drive the rogues into the one adjoining: and I therefore decidedly object to any partial measure, which will be neither effectual for the prevention of crime nor the saving of expense. I hope the Government will agree to the formation of a board elected by the ratepayers, and I wish now to state, that when the Bill goes into committee, I shall propose certain clauses with the view of making the Bill more generally acceptable throughout the country.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — I rejoice that the Honourable Gentleman has introduced this Bill at an early period of the Session, because it will afford ample opportunity for considering such alterations as are essential to the proper working of the Act. With respect to the amendments suggested by the Honourable Gentlemen, they will receive my warmest support. Many of the clauses, as they now now stand, are so monstrous, that I never could consent to their introduction into any county with which I am connected. I hope, with the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Kent, that many more amendments will be introduced than those which have been mentioned by the Honourable Gentleman, and if the Government find that there is a general feeling every where in favour of a cheap constabulary force, I can hardly conceive that they will object to such alterations. I know that there are many counties which would joyfully accept of a cheap constabulary force, but which have been prevented from adopting the measure of last Session by the great expense attending it. With respect to the observations of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, I beg to observe, that the county justices, without any controlling power over them on the part of the ratepayers, are just as anxious to avoid the imposition of unnecessary expense upon the ratepayers as any representative body can be, however strictly that body may be chosen. I can tell the Honourable Member, that when I am acting as a justice in my own county, I consider myself under as great a responsibility as when I am called on to impose taxes in this House. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny may be of opinion that the magistracy have imperfect notions of economy; but if the Honourable Gentleman had been in the habit of attending at the courts of quarter sessions, when discussions take place as to the county expenditure, I am quite satisfied that he would have entertained a very different opinion. With respect to the present Bill, I hope that the House will be put in possession of Returns stating the names of the counties in which the Constabulary Act has been adopted, and the number of constables employed in each, so that we may see how it has been carried into operation.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — These Returns were ordered a few days ago.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — I trust they will be laid on the table before the second reading, and will also include a statement of the increased rates which have been required in consequence of the adoption of the measure in each county. Perhaps the Honourable Member will add this to the former Return, and we shall then be in possession of the whole of the facts.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — Sir, as it is quite clear that the Bill must undergo considerable discussion in its future stages, I will not at present occupy the House with any lengthened observations upon it. I cannot, however, avoid making two or three remarks on the additional expense imposed on counties, by the establishment of a constabulary force. With respect to the remarks of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, I beg to say that, although the ratepayers have not the power, directly, of influencing the decisions of the magistrates, they have the power of remonstrance and petition. In the county which I have the honour to represent, there has not been the slightest objection to the police by the ratepayers. There has been, in that county, a saving of between 30,000*l.* and 40,000*l.* a-year, by the New Poor Law Act, and there can be no objection to an expenditure of 2000*l.* or 3000*l.* a-year to insure security to life and property. At the same time I wish the Honourable Gentleman to consider whether it might not be advisable to throw some part of the burden of the new constabulary on the Consolidated Fund. This was strongly recommended by the Police Commissioners; and, considering that an immense mass of property will be protected by this Act which does not contribute towards the county rate, I think it would not be unfair to throw a portion of the expenditure on the general funds of the country. And, coupled with that, I have no hesitation in saying that the Bill would have had a much more beneficial effect, if it had been compulsory. It is weak and timid legislation to make measures of this kind optional; and this is one of the evils under which the country is now suffering from the present Ministry, who are diffident of bringing forward any decided measures, from the fear of offending their supporters. I wish, also, to impress on the Honourable Gentleman the necessity of devising some more effectual mode of making detached parts of counties contribute to the general expenses.

Mr. G. BERKELEY. — Sir, I wish to ask whether it is the intention of the Honourable Gentleman to introduce a clause to obviate the strange anomaly which at present exists with respect to the Police Bill. In the borough which I have the honour to represent, there is a local Bill empowering certain commissioners to establish a local police force. If the county constabulary be introduced, the inhabitants will be subject to a double rate. I wish to ask the Honourable Gentleman whether he intends to introduce a clause which will make the county police supersede the police established by commissioners under the local Acts of Parliament? or in what way the town is to be relieved from a double rate?

Mr. F. MAULE. — Provision will certainly be made to prevent a double rating.

Mr. LANGDALE. — I trust that some clause will be introduced for the purpose of giving ratepayers a control over the money to be expended, if an additional burden is to be imposed on them. I must certainly dissent from the praise which has been bestowed on the magistracy for the care which they take to prevent unnecessary expenditure. The Honourable Member opposite (Mr. Pakington) alluded to the great reduction which has taken place in the amount of the poor rate in the county with which he is connected. But why has that saving been so great? Because the matter has been taken out of the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and placed in the hands of the ratepayers. In the county with which I am connected the general feeling is not favourable to the economy of the magistrates, who have expended 120,000*l*. on the buildings at York Castle; and these are, after all, very ineffectual for the purpose for which they were intended. Whenever the Honourable Member for Kilkenny brings forward a practical motion on this subject, he shall have my warmest support.

MR. PAKINGTON. — I wish to correct an erroneous impression under which the Honourable Member seems to be labouring. I certainly did not attribute the saving under the New Poor Law to the economy of the magistrates.

LORD HENNIKER. — Sir, although I heard with pleasure the announcement of the Honourable Gentleman's intention to bring in a Bill to amend the Act of last Session, I must say that I was rather disappointed when I heard how far he intended to go. I certainly did hope that power would be given to justices over the constabulary force in their respective districts, and that the measure should only be adopted where it might be made apparent to the justices that it was required. I believe that it has been adopted in all the thirteen counties which the Honourable Gentleman refers to, without any evidence being adduced; and I am of opinion that the ratepayers would be justified in resisting the rate, where such evidence has not been given. I think the ratepayers would be effectually protected by giving a veto to the lord lieutenant of the county or the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

MR. H. G. KNIGHT. — I am glad to find that some alterations are to be made for the purpose of rendering the Constabulary Bill more effective. This is absolutely necessary in the altered circumstances of the country, for the old constabulary is as ineffective as were the old "Charleys" in the metropolis. The old constables may be very well where there is little to do, but they are not qualified to act in cases of emergency; and in the neighbourhood where I reside the inhabitants have been compelled to protect themselves by voluntary association and subscription. I think the management of the constabulary ought to be vested in the Government, whose especial province it is to protect our lives and properties, and who could carry it into execution much more efficiently and economically than any other parties. As great jealousy exists on this subject, perhaps it would be better for the present to adopt a permissive Bill. I regret to say that in many instances it has been opposed on party grounds. This appears to me to be one of those measures on which party spirit should be laid aside; and, really, when I hear exclamations against its unconstitutional character, and the alarm expressed for the liberty of the subject, I cannot but regret the misapplication of those high-sounding words. In the county which I represent, there was no display of party feeling, and the measure was adopted without a division. We deemed it our duty to begin on as moderate a scale as possible, and it would have been well if the example had been followed in other counties, for an expenditure of about 15,000*l*. a-year will not be readily acquiesced in. There are two or three points to which I wish to direct the attention of the Honourable Gentleman. I think the powers of the chief constables ought to be so extended as to comprise the powers of the present high constables, and that counties should not be saddled with the expense of two establishments. I am also of opinion, from the greater amount of property in towns, that it would be only just to rate houses higher than land. This principle has been acknowledged in the 3 & 4 William IV. c. 90., and if introduced in this Bill, it would greatly tend to reconcile the rural districts to its introduction. I also think that a portion of the expense should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. If a bonus be thus given to counties, I have no doubt that the measure will be much more generally adopted, and, until that is the case, it will never be carried out in an efficient manner.

MR. R. T. PARKER. — I trust the Honourable Gentleman will grant some relief to those large towns which, having a constabulary force of their own to support, are liable, and have been assessed, to a rate for the support of the county constabulary, without deriving any benefit from their services.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I shall attend, as far as possible, to the suggestions which have been thrown out in the course of the present discussion. With respect to the suggestion of the Honourable Member for Preston, I think it but just, that where boroughs, having a police of their own, have been assessed to the county constabulary, relief should be granted.

Motion agreed to. Bill to amend the said Act ordered to be brought in by Mr. Fox Maule, Lord John Russell, and Mr. E. J. Stanley.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S FUND.

On the motion of Mr. Ingham, Select Committee appointed "on the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 52., to consider the state of the funds, and how they can be more effectually maintained and administered for the benefit of the seamen.

NEWPORT RIOTS.

Mr. GODSON. — Sir, as the Honourable Member for Westminster has a motion on the paper relative to the proceedings of the Commission at Monmouth, I think I shall best consult the wishes of the House, by withdrawing, for the present, that of which I have given notice.

Mr. LEADER. — I should not ask the House to allow me to proceed at this late hour, were the case not one of the most pressing importance. Before going into the subject, I wish to present several petitions, which have been intrusted to me, praying for a free pardon to Frost, Williams, and Jones. They are from Nailsworth; Piecombe; Stonehouse (Lanark); Lewes; Glasgow (two petitions); Hamilton; Newmilns; Kilmarnock; Bridgeton; Bury (Lancaster); Campsie; and Stroud, the latter signed by 1300 persons.

Mr. GODSON. — I beg also to present a petition from London, numerously signed, praying the House to address Her Majesty to be pleased to place the prisoners in the same situation as they would have been, had the judges decided the reserved point of law at Monmouth.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Sir, before the Honourable Gentleman proceeds with his motion, I wish to state that I am placed in a situation of considerable difficulty. I should be sorry, in a case of this kind, to interfere with the motion of any Honourable Member who appeals to the House in a case of mercy; but, from the wording of the motion, it is clear that the Honourable Member intends to enter into the whole state of the case, as to the occurrences during the trial, and also as to what took place between the judges subsequently. In answer to such a case, I also shall have to enter into a detailed statement; and I do not think that, either to those persons who are interested in the discussion, or to those who have to reply to the observations of the Honourable Member, it would be fair to proceed at this hour of the night.

Mr. LEADER. — Sir, it is now only twelve o'clock, and we may easily get through the discussion in about two hours. But will the Honourable Gentleman say that the prisoners shall not be removed from Portsmouth until after the discussion has taken place? If he will do so, and yield to me the power of bringing forward my motion on Thursday, immediately after the presentation of petitions, I will at once obey the suggestion which he has thrown out.

Mr. HUME. — I do not think that my Honourable Friend can bring on his motion now. The object he has in view is, to procure a full discussion of the case; but if he proceeds in the present thin state of the House, he will fail in that object. I would request him to postpone his motion until Thursday.

Mr. LEADER. — I will at once yield to the recommendation of my Honourable Friend; but I think it will be exceedingly unfair to transport the prisoners before this discussion has taken place. I beg to state, that I do not intend to appeal to the mercy of the House. My motion is founded upon a point of law, and I hope that I shall have an opportunity of bringing the matter under discussion on Thursday.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Sir, so far as I am concerned, the Honourable Member shall have every opportunity of bringing forward the question on Thursday.

TITHE COMMUTATION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. Hodges and Mr. Aglionby added to the Committee.

MILITARY OPERATIONS (INDIA).

On the motion of Sir J. Hobhouse, order, "That the thanks of this House be given to Major General Sir Willoughby Cotton, Knight Grand Cross of the most honourable Military Order of the Bath, and to the several officers of the army, both European and native, for their good conduct and gallant exertions during the late operations to the westward of the Indus." — Read, and discharged.

Resolved, nemine contradicente, "That the thanks of this House be given to Major General Sir Willoughby Cotton, Knight Grand Cross of the most honourable Military Order of the Bath; Major General Sir Thomas Willshire, Knight Commander of the most honourable Military Order of the Bath; Major General Sir Joseph Thackwell, Knight Commander of the most honourable Military Order of the Bath; Major General Edward Henry Simpson; Major General William Nott; and to the several officers of the army, both European and native, for their good conduct and gallant exertions during the late operations to the westward of the Indus."

Ordered, That the said resolution be transmitted by Mr. Speaker to the Governor General of India; and that his Lordship be requested to communicate the same to the several officers referred to therein.

UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

Petition from James Anderson, shopman, Glasgow, in favour. — To lie on the table.

Petition from Kinross, for amendment of law. — To lie on the table.

LAW OF EVIDENCE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

INCORPORATED TOWNS.

Mr. INGHAM. — Sir, I beg to move an Address for "Returns of all the towns or boroughs which have petitioned to be incorporated according to the provision of the Act 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76., stating the date of the petition, whether such petition was opposed or not, the result, and whether, in case of the charter being granted, the district comprised in such charter was either larger or smaller than the precinct of the petitioning town or borough. Of all incorporated towns or boroughs to which commissions of the peace have been granted from the passing of the said Act, to 31st December, 1839, stating the number of justices in each commission, and how many justices, if any, who have at any time been appointed as justices to such boroughs, since the passing of the said Act, were at the date of their respective appointments members of the councils of the several boroughs to which such commissions have been granted. From every borough levying a borough rate under the said Act; of the amount of such rate for the last year for which the accounts have been made up; and also of the amount of the rate levied at the same period, under each of the several Local Acts enumerated in Schedule E, of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76.; and, also, Return of the amount of rates levied under such Local Acts respectively, for the year next before the year in which the provisions of the said Act came into operation.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Sir, there are no means of making the necessary remuneration for the trouble given in procuring these Returns; but I will endeavour to procure them.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. D'ISRAELI. — I have, here, Sir, a petition, very respectfully worded, from an individual who has unfortunately incurred the displeasure of the House, — I mean John Joseph Stockdale. The petitioner prays the House, as his legal advisers are now under duresse, to permit him to plead his own cause in person against Mr. Hansard in the Sheriff's Court on Thursday next, and to make the order on the Sergeant-at-Arms accordingly.

PRINCE ALBERT.

Lord Robert Seymour reported to the House, that the Honourable Members appointed to attend His Royal Highness Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, with the congratulatory message sent from this House, on the happy occasion of the nuptials of Her Majesty, had attended His Royal Highness accordingly, and that His Royal Highness was pleased to say: —

"I return the House of Commons my warmest thanks for the message which you have now delivered.

"I learn, with lively satisfaction, their approbation of the choice which Her Majesty has made; and it will be the study of my life to justify the favourable opinion which you have now expressed."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

To Sir Charles Coote, till the 8th of March, — illness in family.

To Sir George Crewe, one month, — illness.

To Mr. Ingham, — circuit.

Of the declared value of British and Irish produce and manufactures exported from the United Kingdom to the above-mentioned countries, from 1821 to 1839, both inclusive, specifying the separate countries to which the same were exported each year:

Of the amount of tonnage, outwards and inwards, and of the number of ships and seamen, distinguishing British from foreign, employed between the United Kingdom and the following countries, from 1821 to 1839, both inclusive, specifying the amount to each country in each year: — Russia, Germany (other than the countries in former table), Holland, Belgium, Spain, Italy and Islands, Turkey, Greece and Islands, Syrian Palestine, Egypt, Tripoli, Barbary and Morocco, and north coast of Africa, Arabia, Sumatra and Java, China, Cuba and foreign West Indies, Guatemala, Chili and Peru:

Of the declared value of British and Irish produce and manufactures exported from the United Kingdom to the above-mentioned countries, from 1821 to 1839, both inclusive: specifying the separate countries to which the same were exported in each year:

Of the amount of tonnage, outwards and inwards, and the number of ships and seamen, distinguishing British, colonial, and foreign, employed between the United Kingdom and the British colonies, from 1821 to 1839, both inclusive, specifying the amount to each colony in each year:

Of the declared value of British and Irish produce and manufactures exported from the United Kingdom to the British colonies, from 1821 to 1839, both inclusive, specifying the different colonies to which the same were exported in each year.

COMPTROLLERSHIP OF THE EXCHEQUER. — PENSION TO SIR J. NEWPORT.

Mr. LIDDELL. — I beg, now, to give notice, that on Thursday, the 27th instant, I intend to move certain resolutions connected with the grant of a pension to Sir John Newport.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. ORD. — It will probably be convenient to the House that I should now make the motion of which I have given notice, for the purpose of securing the attendance of the Members composing the several panels from which the Committees for trying controverted elections are to be selected. I propose that all Members whose names are in panel No. 1. do attend this House on Friday, the 13th of March, the day on which the Select Committees are to be sworn for trying the merits of the petitions complaining of undue elections and returns for the boroughs of Ludlow and Ipswich; and that all Members whose names are on panel No 2. do attend this House on Tuesday, the 17th of March, the day on which the Select Committees for trying the merits of the petitions complaining of undue elections and returns for the boroughs of Totness and Cambridge are to be sworn.

Upon the question being put,—

SIR THOMAS FREMANTLE said: — As these resolutions are worded, Honourable Members might be led to suppose that their attendance would not be required till the day therein stated. Now, such a notion might lead to great inconvenience in this way. It is possible that some Honourable Members may have reasons to offer why they should not be called upon to serve on these Committees; but as these resolutions do not require their attendance on the Thursday and the Monday, — the days on which the nomination of six Members from each panel to form the Election Committee will take place,— those Honourable Members might be nominated when not in attendance; whereas, when required to serve, it might be found that they had good cause for being absent, and thus the whole business of the nomination would have to be gone over again. Perhaps the Honourable Member will allow me to suggest that the days mentioned in the resolution should be altered respectively, in the one case from Friday to Thursday, and in the other from Tuesday to Monday; so that if any of the Members whose names are on the panel should be prevented from attending, other Members may be nominated in their room.

Mr. GOULBURN. — It may, perhaps, be desirable to give Honourable Members a notice that their attendance will be required; which might be done in the shape of a reminder, in the Votes, a few days beforehand.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I agree with my Honourable Friend (Sir T. Fremantle), that the attendance of Honourable Members ought to be secured on the Thursday and Monday; but, by the resolutions now in the hands of the Speaker, it might be supposed that the attendance on the Friday and Monday respectively would be sufficient.

SIR E. SUGDEN.—The Friday is the day on which the first panel is to act. All the Members of that panel must be here on that day, whether these resolutions pass or not. The resolution is merely in the shape of a motion, reminding them of their duty. It will be known to those Honourable Members that their attendance will be required on that day; and it is only reasonable to expect, that if any of those Members should not be able to attend on that day, they will give timely notice to the House.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON. — I consider that it will be necessary that the Members composing the respective panels should be in attendance the day before, as well as the day on which the Committees are sworn. The general Committee will choose the six Members of the Select Committee on the Thursday, and on the Friday morning the excuses of those who cannot serve will be tendered.

Mr. WILLIAM MILES. — It is of the greatest moment that the attendance of Honourable Members should be secured on the days mentioned; and whether that be done by a resolution such as that now under consideration, or by a notice published in the Votes, it is immaterial; but I think some kind of notice should be given, and that the attendance on both days should be required.

SIR T. FREMANTLE. — I would suggest, as an amendment to the motion, that the respective panels shall attend on Thursday, the 12th, and Monday, the 16th of March, and remain in attendance till the Select Committees shall be sworn at the table.

Mr. ORD. — I have no objection to adopt the amendment suggested by the Honourable Member.

The amendment was then put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That all Members whose names are on panel No. 1. do attend this House on Thursday, the 12th day of March next, and do remain in attendance until the Select Committees for trying the merits of the petitions, complaining of undue elections and returns for the boroughs of Ludlow and Ipswich, shall have been sworn.

Ordered, That all Members whose names are on panel No. 2. do attend this House on Monday, the 16th day of March next, and do remain in attendance until the Select Committees for trying the merits of the petitions, complaining of undue elections and returns for the boroughs of Totnes and Cambridge, shall have been sworn.

SALE OF BEER ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I rise to move the second reading of the Sale of Beer Act Amendment Bill; and, in doing so, I feel bound to state the views which I entertain on this subject; and I hope the House will believe that, in again pressing upon Parliament the consideration of this matter, I am actuated only by a sincere desire to provide a check to the unfortunate and pernicious system which, most notoriously, and in the sight of all, in every town and county, is fast undermining the morals and sapping the virtue of the artisans and labourers throughout the country. I agree with what has been said by an Honourable Member opposite, that this Bill is one which ought to be in the hands of the Government. I am convinced that its importance is such that it cannot be carried, with advantage, in the hands of a private Member, and especially of one so humble as myself. I have, however, endeavoured to persuade the Government to take it up. I requested the Right Honourable Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to take the matter into his own hands; but the Right Honourable Gentleman declined to do so, and professed to hold different views upon the subject from those which I entertain. I therefore had no alternative but to introduce the present Bill, in the hope of in some degree remedying evils, the extent of which is not to be disputed. I will not, on this occasion, detain the House by going into any extensive proofs of the crying necessity that exists for legislation on the subject. I detailed those proofs, at some length, last Session, and I think it unnecessary to do so again, after what occurred in the House on that occasion. I then also stated, fully, the reasons which induced me to propose that measure; and the occurrences which have since taken place throughout the country render it needless for me to occupy any time with the repetition of them. The Bill, of which I now propose the second reading, is, in most respects, the same with that which I introduced last year. I did not succeed, last year, in carrying the Bill I brought forward, — I was obliged to withdraw it; but, although I did not succeed, I consider that the result of what has taken place in this House and in another place has put the present question in a very different position from that which it occupied when it was brought forward last Session, because both Houses of Parliament have, by large majorities, admitted that the evils of the beer shops are great, and that some legislative measure is necessary. In this House, the principle of the measure I introduced last year was admitted on both sides, as well as by Her Majesty's Ministers; but they could not concede the details. These reasons have induced me not to enter so fully into the subject, now, as I did on a former occasion; but there are two points connected with it, that have arisen since last Session, which I wish to allude to, and which will go far to strengthen the case I have to maintain before the House. Those two points are, first, the circumstance of the late rebellion in Monmouthshire, and the question how far the beer houses have been connected with the causes of it; and next, certain observations and opinions expressed by the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies. In consequence of the disturbances that have taken place in Monmouthshire, I thought it my duty to obtain certain Returns with respect to public and beer houses in that county; and from those Returns I find that, in Aberystwith, with a population of 6000, there are 41 beer houses, in addition to the regular licensed houses. In Pont-y-pool, in which there are nine parishes, and 14,000 inhabitants, there are no less than 229 houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors; and in Duke's Town, which has been the chief seat of Chartism, the results are nearly the same. I do not know the population of that town, but the number of houses altogether is 151, — and of these 151 there are 5 public houses and 28 beer shops, making 33 houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or one house in every five being either a public house or a beer shop. No doubt I may be told that, if the people were disposed to rebel, whether there were beer shops or not, these disturbances would still have taken place; but no man can deny that they hold out great temptations and opportunities to crime; and, I will add, that, with two exceptions, all the Chartist meetings and lodges have been held in beer shops. I would ask whether it can be considered essential to the comfort, the welfare, and the rational enjoyment of the working classes, that every fifth house should be a beer shop or a public house? The second point to which I wish to allude is the statement recently made by the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, — namely, that the present system of beer shops was injurious to the interests of the country, and that he looked for a remedy, not to legislation, but to an improved system of police. I stated on a former occasion that I thought that the Government had conferred a great benefit on the country by the improved police system which they had introduced; but I warned them, and I warned the Noble Lord, not to expect from that improved system of police a degree of benefit it was never likely to confer. It is absurd as well as dangerous to place the youth of both sexes in positions where their minds are liable to be contaminated, and where they would be liable to be brought into daily and hourly intimacy with poachers, drunkards, prostitutes, and thieves, — and then to say, if they transgress the law, there is a police to punish them. In my opinion, prevention is better than cure.

I will now proceed to mention the provisions of the Bill. I have been strongly urged by many persons to bring forward a measure for the total repeal of the existing beer laws. Others have urged me to do that of which my Noble Friend the Member for Liverpool has given notice on a future stage of the Bill, — namely to prohibit, totally, the sale of beer fo consumption on the premises. I refused to take either course. I have no wish to restore the monopoly of the brewers, nor to return to the exclusive licensing system which was in existence before the passing of the Beer Act; nor to deprive the poor of a nutritious beverage, or of rational enjoyment. I think it would be better to get rid of the worse part of the present system without returning to the old one. The principle on which I propose to proceed is, that no one shall be allowed to sell intoxicating liquors unless he shall be possessed of a property qualification sufficient to guarantee, in most cases, his respectability. I, last year, proposed two classes of ratings for qualification. The first class of rating was 15*l.* for large towns, and 10*l.* for the country districts. It was objected to this proposition that 10*l.* was too high a rating for the country districts. I admit that it might appear high for some country districts; but over and above the city districts, there are large populations — as, for instance, in Monmouthshire—where there are no large towns and no municipal authorities. In these districts I do not think 10*l.* too high a qualification. In the present Bill I shall propose three clauses of qualifications instead of two; and I think I have reason to complain of the conduct of the Government last year, when they proposed certain amendments to this measure, that these amendments were proposed without any knowledge whatsoever of the subject. A qualification of 15*l.* was proposed for the metropolis; they ought to have known that that would hardly have touched a single beer house; 10*l.* was proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as the qualification for cities and towns. The Right Honourable Gentlemen were unaware that that had, already, been the law of England for eight years, and had been found totally inefficient. On that occasion they proposed, in the third place, a qualification of 5*l.* for the rural districts. Such a qualification was a mockery, and worse than useless. My wish has been to avoid both extremes; and I shall therefore propose 15*l.* for cities and towns, and 12*l.* for districts where there is a population of 2500 persons. I can confidently assert that I have the support of all classes of the magistrates of the country, of all parties, in favour of this measure. Not only are the magistrates of towns and the county magistrates in favour of the Bill, but the magistrates of the new corporations are also zealous supporters of it. I implore the House, therefore, to give that effect to the wishes of the magistrates of England which they have a right to expect. I move that this Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. WARBURTON. — It appears to me that the course pursued by the Honourable Member, with respect to this Bill, is liable to a preliminary objection. On the 9th of April, 1772, a Standing Order was established by the House, declaring that no Bill relating to trade, or the alteration of any law affecting trade, should be proceeded with, until it had first been considered, and its principle agreed to, in a Committee of the whole House. The question, therefore, now presents itself,—does the present Bill relate to trade? It may be said that this objection was not taken in time, as the Bill has been brought in; but I can refer to the Irish Church Temporalities Bill, where the same objection was taken after the Bill was brought in, and the Bill was withdrawn because there was also a Standing Order that all Bills, relating to religion, must be primarily considered in Committees of the whole House. Besides, as this Bill went to impose a tax on the clergy, it was held to be a Tax Bill, and that it should originate in a Committee of the whole House. A new Bill was afterwards brought in, and proceeded with according to the Standing Order. The reason of these Standing Orders was, that such Bills went to affect great bodies of the people, and every opportunity should be afforded to discuss them; which could only be in Committee, where Members could speak as often as they pleased. Now the present Bill, undoubtedly, affects a great body of the trading interest of the country. There are 50,000 beersellers in England, with their families, depending upon this trade. I will not, at present, go into the merits of the Bill, but will move, as an amendment, that the present Bill be withdrawn, because it proposes to alter a law relating to trade, and has not been considered in a Committee of the whole House, as required by the Standing Order of the 9th of April, 1772.

Mr. HUME. — I rise to second the amendment, as I am anxious to support the Standing Orders. I think it would be better, at once, to appeal to the Speaker on the question. These Standing Orders ought not to be considered useless; but great jealousy ought to be exercised by the House in respect of these rules and regulations, passed, as they were, for the purpose of extending to the community every opportunity of becoming acquainted with every measure affecting the trade and taxation of the country. By the Bill, the second reading of which is proposed to the House, the revenue will be materially affected. I have seen several Bills irregularly passed through the House; but when a blot is found in the course of our proceedings, especially upon so important a subject, involving, as it does, the interests of a numerous class, it is the duty of every Member to object. My objection to this Bill, then, is upon a Standing Order of the House, which declares that no Bill affecting the taxation or trade of the country shall be introduced without having been previously submitted to a Committee of the whole House. By the Returns which were laid upon the table of the House on the 2d of February, 1839, it appears that no less than 45,394 persons are engaged in the sale of beer throughout the country, who will be affected by this Bill. The revenue will be also materially affected, because the income to the Exchequer from that source alone amounts to 133,775*l.*; whereas the income from the licensed victuallers throughout the country amounts only to 95,000*l.* The Chancellor of the Exchequer, if this objection had not been made, would object to the present course of proceeding; and it is for the House to say whether, under such circumstances, and in direct violation of the Standing Orders, they will feel themselves warranted in proceeding with the Bill.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I have a feeling equally sincere with the desire of the Honourable Members opposite to maintain the strict orders of the House. I do not undervalue the importance of the question or the interests at stake; and I think that, if the strict rule does apply, the magnitude of the subject would warrant the application; but the rule does not, in my opinion, strictly apply; and if the precedent be not absolutely to apply, I do not see any object in enforcing the rule. Before you, Sir, are called upon to pronounce your opinion, I wish to state that the House, on two former occasions, within the last eight years, has legislated in a similar way without any allusion to the Standing Orders quoted by the Honourable Members opposite. On a reference to the Journals of the proceedings of the House on the 8th of April, 1830, I find that my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Cambridge University obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the system with regard to the sale of beer, when the Standing Order in question was not objected. For the second case I cannot refer to the Journals, not recollecting the precise date; but I believe, speaking from memory, that a Bill was introduced by Lord Althorp in 1834. I am just reminded by an Honourable Friend who sits beside me, that I am not correct, as my Honourable Friend has correctly anticipated what I was about to state with respect to the Bill introduced by Lord Althorp; for I understand that, in 1834, when Lord Althorp brought in his Bill, he did so after having previously moved the resolutions on which it was founded in a Committee of the whole House.

MR. BAINES. — I recollect the case of the Irish Church Temporalities Bill, and I remember that it was objected to that Bill, that as it was one which touched the revenue, a resolution should have been moved in a Committee of the whole House previously to the introduction of the Bill. A Committee was appointed to consider the point, and that Committee reported that the Bill could not proceed until a resolution had been moved in a Committee of the whole House.

MR. GOULBURN. — The Honourable Member is not quite accurate in his recollection of the case. The fact is, the preamble of the Bill declared that it was expedient to tax the clergy, for the purpose of raising an additional sum of money, and the Bill was, on that account, held to be a Bill for the taxation of the clergy, and on that ground it was necessary that it should be founded on a resolution in a Committee of the whole House. With respect to the case mentioned by my Right Honourable Friend (Sir J. Graham), of the Bill brought in by me in 1830, there certainly was no previous resolution in a Committee; but the Bill originated in a Committee up-stairs, the chairman of which moved for leave to bring it in.

The SPEAKER. — In the interpretation of the Standing Orders, the House is generally guided not so much by the literal construction of the orders, themselves, as by the consideration of what has been the practice of the House with respect to them. If the practice has been to admit, generally, measures of this kind without a previous resolution in a Committee of the whole House, then the Honourable Member (Mr. Pakington) is right; but after what has been said by the Right Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Goulburn), as to his Bill, in 1830, having originated in a Committee up-stairs, and subsequently as to the precedent of Lord Althorp's Bill to amend that Act in 1834, having been preceded by a resolution in a Committee of the whole House;—it does appear to me that, though the practice has not been quite uniform, the present Bill ought to be withdrawn, and a resolution submitted in a Committee of the whole House previous to its re-introduction.

Mr. PAKINGTON.—I willingly bow to the decision of the Chair, and withdraw the Bill; but I think that I have a right to complain of a want of courtesy in Honourable Members opposite, for their not having given me notice of the objection they intended to raise, and for having resisted this measure on a mere question of form, rather than on the merits of the Bill. Now, how is it——

The SPEAKER said:—I beg to remind the Honourable Gentleman that there is now no question before the House.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — Then, Sir, I beg to give notice, that, to-morrow, I will move that the House resolve itself into a Committee, to take the subject of this Bill into consideration.

Mr. WARBURTON. — As the Honourable Member has complained of discourtesy on the part of those who have suggested this objection, I beg to relieve myself from that imputation, and to assure the Honourable Member that it was only within the last hour that the Standing Order occurred to my mind, and it struck me that this Bill came within the rule.

The Bill was then, by leave, withdrawn.

COPYRIGHT BILL.

Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD. — I beg to move the second reading of the Copyright Bill.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Sir, I think that I am justified in offering the same objection to this Bill that I have just made to the Beer Bill, which has, on account of that objection, been withdrawn. I have been informed, for I was not present at the time, that a petition was this evening presented by the Honourable and Learned Member for Reading, signed by a number of booksellers and publishers largely engaged in the bookselling and publishing trade, whose interests will be in some way or other, for good or for evil, affected by this Bill. I think, then, that I am fully justified in asking the House whether this is not a Bill affecting the trade of booksellers and publishers, whose occupation is emphatically called "the Trade?" Does not that trade include a numerous class of individuals, whose commercial interests may be deeply affected by this Bill? The objection which I make to our further proceeding with it is identical with the objection that I took respecting the Beer Bill, —namely, that it has not been introduced in conformity with the Standing Order of 1772. I put it to the Honourable Member for Reading, whether it would not be better to initiate his Bill in a Committee of the whole House, where the subject might be fully and calmly considered. On the grounds I have stated, I object to further proceeding with this Bill.

Mr. HUME. — I fully concur in the force of the objections taken to the further progress of this Bill, by my Honourable Friend the Member for Bridport. I think that the House ought to look with great jealousy to Bills which may possibly affect the interests of thousands and millions of individuals. With respect to Private Bills, there is a provision made by the Standing Orders of the House, that every person likely to be affected by a Private Bill shall have the greatest protection, by notice, to guard him against surprise. It is, I think, essential that the House should, in this case, adhere strictly to the Standing Order, and require that a Bill, which goes to affect large and extensive interests, should originate in a Committee of the whole House. The Bill before the House is a measure which affects trade and trading; and though there may not be any particular precedent to apply, yet I hope that the House will see the propriety of making the rule general, and that they will not withhold from the public the discussion in a Committee of the whole House of a question affecting the interests of the public at large. I therefore, on these grounds, feel it my duty to support the objections which my Honourable Friend has raised, and which, I am sure, you, Sir, will hold to be sufficient to prevent this Bill proceeding further.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I cannot help being highly amused at the eagerness of the Honourable Gentlemen opposite to throw impediments in the way of large and extensive legislative changes; and I hail that disposition on their part with great satisfaction, and will be ready to join with them in pursuing that course. But with respect to this objection, I would request the House to permit me to say, that, having yielded in the former case to the decision of the Chair, and concurring as I do in the wisdom and policy of that decision, I cannot but think that the construction sought to be put upon the Standing Order, in applying it to the Bill now before the House, is a strange construction. In the former case, large trading interests were concerned; in the present case, no such large interests will be affected. The policy and principle of the Bill before the House do not affect the property of booksellers. I understand that the present Bill does not interfere in the slightest degree with the sale of the books; but that its object is, to protect the interests of authors. It may be said to interfere indirectly with the sale of books; but it is not the policy of the measure to affect any individual interests. It would, then, be a strange construction of the rule, indeed, if the precedent sought to be established were to apply in the present case. If we were to apply this rule stringently, a virtual obstruction would occur to the proceedings of Parliament by reason of the length of time which every legislative measure would necessarily occupy in progressing through the several stages over which it must necessarily pass. I consider the objection taken by the Honourable Members opposite to be an unfair opposition to the Bill.

The SPEAKER. — As I have been called on to decide this objection, I must say that I look upon this case as one essentially different from the last. In my opinion, the Standing Order which has been referred to applies to those Bills, alone, which directly affect or interfere with trade. I think that the Bill now before the House, as it does not directly interfere with "trade," in any sense in which that term is used in the Standing Order, has been properly ordered to be brought in without having first been considered in a Committee of the whole House. I apprehend, therefore, that the objection of the Honourable Member does not apply in this case.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Well, then, I move that this Bill be read this day six months; and I feel justified in applying to the present Bill the same character which I applied to the Bill brought in, in the last Session, and to the previous Bill introduced by the Honourable and Learned Member for Reading, who has consulted the interests of authors and publishers, but who has thrown out of his consideration the interests of the public. In the arguments employed by the Honourable and Learned Member, and by others who persist in arguing in support of this measure, a comparison has been drawn between the protection given to patent rights and that to copyrights. It was said, that the inventor of a mechanical invention does not obtain equal protection with an author — that the invention is but a stage between the inventor and the public — that the patent is considered a stop to the success of the improvement of the thing invented. Now, as the Honourable and Learned Member has, on a former occasion, acquiesced in the objection to the continuance of the patent in the case of mechanical inventions, he has deserted the very principle of his own Bill. The Honourable and Learned Member's principle is founded upon this, — that the author is an inventor; that he has an indefeasible right to his invention from the time of its being invented to a certain future time; and if his dominion over his invention were curtailed, and if it did not extend to that future time, a gross injustice would be committed — that such curtailment would be contrary to justice and to right. Now, let me ask, how is the invention of a mechanic less the invention of his mind, and knowledge, and understanding, than that of an author? If the literary man be an inventor, is not the mechanic an inventor also? Were not the inventions of Harrison, and of Watt, the inventor of the steam engine, equally the works of their minds as are the works of authors? Is not the inventor of a plan to make cables by machinery equally an inventor with an author? It is to be considered, also, with respect to this invention, that it was made by an officer on his voyage from the East Indies, without the assistance of machinery of any kind. Are these inventions less the products of a man's mind than the works of an author? If a qualification is necessary in the case of a mechanic's invention, for the interest of the public, why not apply a similar qualification to an author's invention? The Honourable and Learned Member for Reading has admitted that in the case of a mechanical invention the original right of the inventor is not to be considered, but that the House is bound to take care of the interests of the public, by restraining the privileges or patents for mechanical invention from perpetuity; which perpetuity is, nevertheless, the identical object sought for authors by the Honourable and Learned Member's Bill. A Bill was recently introduced into the House to alter and amend the law respecting the copyright of the mechanical designs of calico printers. That Bill comprehended other interests, also; but the application of the Bill to calico printers will supply the illustration I want. The design of the calico printer is an original invention, and capable of improvement, equally with, and as well as, the author's. What is the existing law with respect to designs? By the existing law designs have a protection of three months, only; and by the Bill which is now being introduced, a protection for twelve months is all that is asked for, which is by some considered too long a time, and which it has been proposed to limit to six months. The House granted a Committee of the whole House to consider whether mechanics should be protected for six or for twelve months; yet the Honourable and Learned Member for Reading attempts, by this Bill, to extend the copyright of an author sixty years beyond his death, which might be considered equivalent to a protection for a hundred years. So great is the difference, then, between the invention of a poor mechanic and that of an author? Why is this? Because there are in this House authors and their friends. It is a genteel thing to be an author; and for that reason they find protection in this House. The Bill is, in reality, an author's Bill, and such a Bill as a baker, a butcher, or a shoemaker, respectively, would make for his trade, if each of them had the power to legislate for his individual business. The justice which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman metes out in his own case is different to the justice meted out to mechanical inventions. Upon the ground of public benefit he thinks it right to abridge the privilege of the mechanic; but when the principle is applied to his own trade, then the case is different, and the Honourable and Learned Gentleman cries out that the author's right is indefeasible, and that it ought not to be limited. There is another objection which I have a right to take to the Bill. It has been introduced for discussion in a very scanty House. I do not think that a measure of this kind ought to be discussed in so thin a House as this. Where, I ask, is the Treasury bench?

Several Honourable Members (pointing to the Treasury bench, which was quite empty). — There it is!

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Mr. WARBURTON.—True; the bench is there, but where are the Members of the Government? The Whigs of former times did not recognise the principle of such a Bill as this before the House. In 1774, when the famous case of Donaldson had been decided in the House of Lords, by which decision it was determined that no perpetual copyright at common law vested in the authors, these latter came down to the House of Commons, and by their petitions asked the House to give them a perpetual copyright, which, by the decision in the House of Lords, they found they did not possess at common law. A Bill was, in consequence, introduced, and many Members of high character took part in the debate. Mr. Burke took one side, and Mr. Fox took the other. Mr. Fox upon that occasion, characterised the Bill in these words: —

> I could not permit so pernicious and flagrant a Bill to pass through any stage without giving it my decided opposition.

In every stage of the Bill Mr. Fox was its decided opponent, and he complained that the Bill passed through some stages when there was a very scanty House, and a bare majority to divide upon the question. The Bill before the House is similarly positioned to that opposed by Mr. Fox, so far as the paucity of Members to discuss it is concerned. It is marvellous that the friends of education in this House do not oppose the introduction of the Bill of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. It is of sovereign importance to educate the people by every means; and this is a Bill which will have the effect of cramping and controlling that very education which many Members of this House have declared to be necessary for the Parliament to confer, especially upon the working classes. The House, by permitting the second reading of this Bill, is virtually encouraging dear editions of books. The rights of authors might, without any serious objections, be extended to a longer time than they at present run to; but it is unjust to extend that right to a perpetuity, — which is the scope of the Bill of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. By passing this Bill, the House will adopt a measure which they afterwards will find it impossible to undo, and will thus inflict an injury upon authors and publishers. The whole literature of the country will be thrown into Chancery, or into the courts of law, and actions will be every day occurring, and complaints every day made, that copyrights have been infringed. Authors, too, would have occasion to complain. The Bill will be injurious to authors, themselves, and applies to publishers only, in whose hands the perpetuity of copyrights will eventually reside, for all the books will be in the hands of the publishers, not of the authors. I repeat, a measure of this kind ought not to be discussed in such a House as this. The question is, in fact, coram non judice, from the thinness of the House; and, in the event of the Bill passing the second reading, I do not pledge myself that I will not employ every available means which the rules of the House permit, and endeavour, by all the formal objections in my power, to prevent the passing of this Bill in a future stage. If the question were debated in a full House, I would be willing to abide by their decision. With the decision of the House in its present scanty attendance I will not be satisfied. I now move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I second the amendment.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I rise to support the second reading of this Bill; and I think my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Reading has been very unfairly blamed for not having brought forward his measure when there was a fuller attendance of Members. On what other day could my Honourable and Learned Friend bring forward his Bill with any chance of success, if he could not hope to do so on a Wednesday? As the rules and regulations of the House now stand, Monday and Friday nights are given to Government business; Tuesdays and Thursdays are appropriated to motions; so that there is no other day open to a private Member to bring forward a measure but a Wednesday. I, therefore, cannot see how, under these circumstances, the promoters of this Bill could have taken a different course from that which they have pursued on the present occasion. As the Honourable Member for Bridport will not consent to reserve his opposition for a future day, but has stated his determination to divide the House, there is no choice left to the supporters of the Bill but to enter at once into the discussion of the question. The Honourable Member for Bridport has, more than once, stated that this Bill is an author's Bill. He has said that it is such a Bill as only authors and their friends could support, and that it is framed without any regard to the public interests. Now, I do not think this measure open to any imputation of the kind; and I am not ashamed to say that, from the very first, I have taken a deep interest in its success. I cannot help adding, that the course I have taken in support of this measure has been very much influenced by the distinction existing between my own circumstances and those of many other individuals much my superiors in merit. It has been my lot to find myself born to an inheritance of competency and independence, whilst I behold others, far my superiors in intellect, in varied talent, and in reputation, placed below me with respect to the gifts of Fortune. I see men distinguished by the highest endowments of genius or of learning subjected to a struggle with difficulties and wants which they ought never to have had to encounter. The object of this Bill is, to give to the exertions of these men full and unfettered scope, and to enable them, by the legitimate employment of their genius and their labour, to procure that competency and independence for themselves which I and others possess without any merits of our own. I can see no reason why men of high moral feeling and powerful minds should not be put in a position to raise themselves by their talents to that station in society which others, less worthy, hold by the accident of birth. Surely literary property is equally well worthy of protection, and literary labour merits the same degree of encouragement as—if not, indeed, a greater degree than — is held out to other sorts of exertion. The Honourable Member for Bridport is much mistaken in supposing that booksellers and publishers are opposed to this Bill. I could point out, in the class of booksellers, some instances of men, not merely favourable to the Bill, but who have petitioned the House that it may pass into a law. Many of the booksellers and publishers have manifested the most honourable sympathy with authors in respect to the interests of the latter under this Bill. I was last year intrusted with a petition from an individual in Glasgow, in favour of this Bill, and the petition is so highly honourable to the feelings of the individual from whom it proceeded, that I am desirous to call the attention of the House to the statements contained in that petition. It is the petition of Mr. John Smith, a bookseller and publisher in the city of Glasgow, and is dated February the 22d, 1839. The petition states, —

> That your petitioner has, for upwards of thirty years, exercised the profession of publisher and bookseller in this city, which profession had previously been carried on by his grandfather and father in the said city of Glasgow. That your petitioner has obtained estate and competence by the sale of books, published or sold by him, which property he has a right to entail or give in legacy for the benefit of his heirs, while the authors who produced the works which have > enriched him have no interest for their heirs by the present law of copyright in the property which they have solely constituted. That your petitioner is decidedly of opinion that the cultivation of the national literature would be cherished and strengthened by the proposed extension of the term of copyright. Your petitioner therefore humbly prays that the Bill to amend the law of copyright, now before your Honourable House, may pass into a law.

This is an instance of the feeling subsisting among respectable publishers with respect to this Bill; and I ask, need any Member of this House be ashamed to respond to such feelings? It is highly creditable to Mr. Smith to entertain so deep a sympathy with those whose intellectual labours have enabled him to retire upon a handsome competence. Is it not evident that the literary genius of the country requires some fostering measure? How many great works must have been lost to the nation, through the res angusta domi which must have fettered the energies of those who, otherwise, would — and could — have transmitted greater and more enduring memorials of their genius than those which we are now possessed of. Dryden himself has left on record, that the necessity of writing for his daily bread prevented him from undertaking a great national poem, which he had long contemplated, but which his necessities compelled him to forego, for the purpose of procuring a subsistence by "writing lewd plays for a profligate court." What was the fate of him, of whose name every Englishman should be proud, — of him, of whom it may well be said, —

Into the heaven of heavens he has presumed,
An earthly guest, and drawn empyrean air!

There is but one universal feeling of reverence for Milton in this House, and in the country. Well, then, would the House wish to know how this admiring country has rewarded that illustrious poet? Would they wish to know the fate of Milton's last female descendant? Let them hear the account of his grandaughter, as given by Dr. Johnson in his Life of Milton: —

> Elizabeth married Thomas Foster, a weaver in Spitalfields, and had several children, who all died. She kept a petty grocer's or chandler's shop; first at Holloway, and afterwards in Cock Lane, near Shoreditch Church.
> In 1750, April 5. Comus was played for her benefit. She had so little acquaintance with diversion or gaiety, that she did not know what was intended when a benefit was offered to her. The profits of the night were only 130*l.*, though Dr. Newton brought a large contribution; and 20*l.* were given by Tonson (a man who is to be praised as often as he is named). Of this sum, 100*l.* were placed in the stocks, after some debate between her and her husband, in whose name it should be entered; and the rest augmented their little stock, with which they removed to Islington. This was the greatest benefaction that Paradise Lost ever procured the author's descendants, and to this he who has now attempted to relate his life had the honour of contributing a prologue.

Now, then, allow me to ask, — if the House sympathise, as I cannot but believe they do, with the sufferings and struggles of eminent men in times past, — why should they not take care to prevent the recurrence of similar sufferings and privations on the part of those whose genius has shed a lustre on their country? Why should we not provide for the future, by our experience of what has happened in the past? The field of poetry is not exhausted; — the birth of genius is not exhausted. It was beautifully said by him, whose genius did not disdain to shed its beams even upon the lowly graves of a country churchyard, —

Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest.

It was remarked by an Honourable Member, on a former occasion, that the love of fame was sufficient motive for an author, and that its attainment should be sufficient reward. I do not deny the power of the motive, nor the greatness of the reward; but I ask, is the reasoning just? or would you think of applying it to any other pursuit than literature? Did you tell Arkwright that the mere fame of his invention should suffice for his reward? You did not; but, on the contrary, you gave him such protection as enabled him to lay the foundation of a splendid fortune. Or did you tell the great Marlborough, when returning from Blenheim, that the fame of his victory was to be his only reward? No; you bade a palace arise to be a lasting testimonial at once of a hero's fame and a nation's gratitude. Did you tell Canning, when his health was failing under the weight of his public labours, that his posterity were to reap no reward from his exertions save the fame of his actions? On the contrary, you granted a peerage to his widow, and a pension to his son. Thus, in what respects victorious war, in political eminence, and in mechanical science, you have provided that merit should have its reward. We do not seek such high rewards for authors; all we ask is, that you will allow them to retain what is their own, — what their own brains have created, what their own hands have written. We ask that you would give them a legal title to that to which they have the highest moral claim. Sir, the objections of the Honourable Member for Finsbury, and of the Honourable Member for Bridport, resolve themselves into one. They argue that the tendency of copyright is to enhance the price of books; and thus, in consequence, to depress the cause of literature. Is that the case? Do you find that books, under copyright, are sold at an enhanced price? I do not think so; I think that under copyright the smaller description of books can be sold cheaper than when they were not so protected.

On this subject, I would appeal to the Honourable Member for Lincoln, himself a distinguished author, because I remember to have heard him say that a time would come when the remains of a quarto would excite as much surprise as the remains of a mammoth. In my opinion, the price of books will not be materially increased by the Bill now before the House, and I am about to give an instance. I have seen a splendid edition, comprising the whole of Lord Byron's poems, sold for 1*l*., and this under copyright; while a similar edition, brought out at Paris, where there is no copyright, was charged 25 francs. This, I think, is a proof that copyright does not enhance the price of good books. But I will go further: if the Honourable Member for Bridport will favour me with a few moments' attention, I think I shall be able to prove that there are some cases in which copyright makes books cheaper. I begin by requesting the House to remember that we are only discussing the case of works of great popularity and circulation. Now the copyright in such works is generally vested in a single publisher, who has it in his power to apply to several editions the various ornaments and embellishments he has had to provide for one. If, on the contrary, various booksellers had the privilege of publishing the same work, there would be required so many different sets of embellishments, — and thus the price would be increased. It is, therefore, not clear that the price of works is enhanced by the existence of copyright; and if it were, a small increase for the benefit of those eminent men to whom the public are so largely indebted would never be objected to by the people. Is there any one who has ever been delighted with the strains of Milton or of Dryden, who would regret an additional sixpence, if he thought it would contribute to the means of providing for the descendants of those great men? An insufficient degree of protection promotes the growth of light and ephemeral productions, to the exclusion of those deeper and more scientific works which look forth from the present day to futurity, for due appreciation. I am not one of those who would willingly depreciate the lighter branches of literature; I should be sorry to pluck one leaf from the laurels, or to depreciate, in the slightest degree, the labours, of those who have devoted themselves to such paths: but I say, we are now come to a period in the history of our country when the taste of that country is at stake,—when that taste has become worse than it was in the time of the Euphuists, or in the French school of the reign of Charles II. We are come to a period when it becomes our duty to encourage those who attempt to improve it. Do not make them write for immediate profit instead of permanent fame. Whether the public taste can be improved or not, I do not know; but, at least, there is something great and noble in the attempt to better it. I do feel, therefore, that, as it may induce authors to look beyond the present day, this Bill is entitled to the respect and approbation of Parliament. I am aware that a good deal of ridicule may be thrown on this part of the subject, and that it may be said that the appeal to posterity is only made by those who fail in making any present impression; but that is not the question. The question is, whether we are not to benefit by our experience of the past in making laws for the future.

Sir, there is one more point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. I think it is important to consider what has been the recent legislation of foreign states with respect to copyright; for if it shall appear that their legislation has, for the most part, been tending to the same point, and running in the same direction, as are upheld in the present Bill, it will surely be a strong proof, or at least presumption, that these principles are the most conformable to the general growth of knowledge, and to the present spirit of the age. Now, on this foreign legislation a great deal of information has lately been acquired and collected in a valuable pamphlet by Mr. Lowndes, — a pamphlet worthy of the greatest attention. To begin with the northern states, it appears from Mr. Lowndes's book, that in Denmark and in Sweden the copyright of works has been made perpetual. In Russia, the law of 1830 granted a copyright for the term of twenty-five years after the author's decease, and for a further term of ten years if an edition should be called for within five years before the expiration of the first term. Therefore, it being admitted that the legislation of copyright is intended only for works of merit and of growing reputation, this was the same as granting copyright absolutely for thirty-five years. It appears, then, that the three northern powers, which we generally consider so far behind us in literary eminence, have yet very far outstripped us in their zeal for literary protection and endowment. To pass from Russia to a country which has lately grown into favour with Members opposite,—liberal Spain,—it will be found that, there, the law is very uncertain as to its meaning; because, as might be presumed, no works of permanent interest are now produced to try it; but, according to the opinion of M. Victor Foucher on a law of 1805 in the Nuevissimo Recopilacion, copyright was thereby made perpetual. In Prussia a law has very recently been passed for a considerable extension of copyright. The law of July 11. 1837, secured it for the author's life, and for thirty years to be reckoned from his death. Formerly, in that country, copyright did not descend to the author's heirs, except by an express agreement. Austria has done little more than to declare, by an imperial edict of 1835, that she would adhere to the proceedings of the whole Germanic Diet on this subject. What, then, have been the proceedings of the German Diet? As might be inferred from the composition of that body, slow, perplexed, and inconclusive. So early as June 8. 1815, it was resolved,—

> The Diet shall take into consideration, at its first meeting, some plan for uniform legislation on the liberty of the press, and also what steps are necessary to be taken to secure authors and publishers from invasion of their copyrights.

But the fruits of this "first meeting" are still to come. There has only been, after twenty-two years (November 9. 1837), a sort of convention for international copyright among the different states, and for a period of copyright to authors of two years, or, in some rare cases, of twenty. But this is admitted to be merely a temporary regulation. The whole subject is to be again discussed and decided upon by the Diet in 1842. With regard to France, the law now in force is a decree of Napoleon, dated February 5. 1810, which granted copyright to an author for his life, to his widow for her life, and, after their death, to their children for twenty years. Where an author leaves a widow and family, this law is, probably, more advantageous to him than our English term of twenty-eight years absolutely. But the French law, like ours, is considered unsatisfactory, on account of the shortness of the term. A commission was appointed in 1825, headed by M. De La Rochefoucauld; and another in 1837, headed by the Count de Segur; both of them recommended an extension of the copyright to fifty years after the death of the author, and it is probable that the subject will speedily be brought under the consideration of the Chambers. Lastly, the example of the United States is not to be passed over. Legislation on that subject, in congress, began in 1790; but the Act now in force passed on the 3d of February, 1831. It gives a copyright to an author for the term of twenty-eight years; and, if he survive that period, for a further term of fourteen. But it is very remarkable that the Report of the Judiciary Committee appointed in that year pointed to a further and very considerable extension of this boon to authors. The Report stated,.—

> Your committee believe that the just claims of authors require from our legislation a protection not less than what is proposed in the Bill reported. Upon the first principles of proprietorship in property an author has an exclusive and perpetual·— > right, in preference to any other, to the fruits of his labour. If labour and effort in producing what before was not possessed or known will give title, then the literary man has title perfect and absolute. We ought to present every reasonable inducement to influence men to consecrate their talents to the advantage of science.

Observe the word "perpetual" —

Mr. Lowndes adds, —

> An amendment of the law of 1831, by a further extension of the term of copyright, is much talked of in America.

I think I have now gone through the principal points to which I wished to call the attention of the House. It is but seldom we have an opportunity of doing an act of generosity; our painful duty is usually to curtail, to reject, and to retrench; and I think the present opportunity should be seized, to perform a kind action to a deserving body of men. Believe me,—our decision of to-night will be anxiously watched by many a man whose life has been passed in the search after knowledge, and whose declining years are saddened by the consideration that his children will derive no benefit from his labours. In the most distant parts of England, even among the hills of Cumberland and Westmorland, will your decision be watched for; for why should I hesitate to say that those eminent men, Wordsworth and Southey, are not as independent in circumstances as they are in mind? The mention of the name of Southey reminds me of a most interesting fact connected with that great man, recorded by Doctor Walsh, in his travels in Brazil. The Doctor says, that in that great empire, which is three times as large as the British Islands; they have no records of their early history, save an abridgment of the work of Doctor Southey. I do not believe there is in the world another instance of a great country obtaining its history through the labours of a foreigner, who had never set foot upon its shores. The Honourable Member opposite complains that this Bill legislates for a single case only. Does the Honourable Member recollect that, in legislating for a single case of distinction, we, who are legislating, are securing distinction? The path of honour is open to all, and it is not so narrow but that two or three may go abreast. There is but one Lord Chancellor or Chief Justice; but the contest for those posts is open to all the merit at the bar. On these grounds I contend that we are not legislating for an individual case; and, not from the motives imputed by the Honourable Member for Bridport, but from an anxiety to foster useful literature, I do intreat of the House to consent to the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. STRUTT. — Sir, I entirely agree with the Honourable Member for Bridport, as to the merits of this Bill. At the same time I regret that the rules of the House do not permit the Honourable and Learned Member for Reading to introduce it on an evening when he would be likely to have a fuller attendance of Members. I have to complain that the Noble Lord who has just sat down has argued as if those who oppose the present Bill objected to the existence of copyright altogether. I do not think the Noble Lord ever heard such a proposition stated, as that authors should be contented with fame as their reward.

LORD MAHON. — The Honourable Member for Finsbury said so.

Mr. STRUTT. — Oh! but that is by no means the case; for the only question is, what is the proper length to which the exclusive right should be carried. The grounds on which the Honourable Member for Reading supports his Bill are, that an author has a natural right of property in his works; but the Honourable Member forgets that property in literary works is, like all other property, the creature of law, and ought not to exist to any greater extent than is required for the interests of the public at large. The Noble Lord has stated, with some force, that it is exceedingly hard that authors should not be protected in the possession of that which they have created of their own heads and hands. But they ask more; they ask that others should be prevented from copying their works, even after they have sold them. In my opinion, the case of an author is similar to that of a person obtaining a patent, — in both cases a right exists; and this reminds me of the Noble Lord's allusion to Mr. Arkwright's, — not a happy one for the Noble Lord's argument. Mr. Arkwright had his invention secured by patent, but only for fourteen years; and it was insufficient to protect him: and yet the Noble Lord would mention this as a case justifying his complaint that twenty-eight years is not a sufficient length of copyright. But the Noble Lord (Mahon) has gone a step farther, and has contended that copyright does not enhance the price of works; on the other hand, I rely on the doctrine which has prevailed ever since the days of Adam Smith, — that monopoly is the parent of scarcity and dearness. The Noble Lord mentions the case of illustrated works, which he says can be produced at less expense under copyright. That may be the fact; but it does not follow that the publishers would sell them at a less price. The Noble Lord has given us no security that the publisher will not put the gain into his own pocket. On the other hand, I hold in my hand a list of works of merit, the price of which has been considerably reduced since the expiration of the copyright. Hume and Smollett's History of England, while protected by copyright, sold for 3*l.* 10*s.*; it now, under competition, sells for 1*l.* 5*s.* Gibbon, under copyright, sold for 2*l.* 8*s.*; it now sells for 1*l.* Robinson's works formerly sold for 3*l.* 4*s.*; they now sell for 1*l.* Blair's Sermons, a work of great merit, which sold under copyright for 1*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, can now be obtained for 6*s.* In the list I see, next, Bishop Horsley's Sermons, selling, while copyright, for 17*s.*, and now to be obtained for 8*s.* Doddridge's Family Expositor, published at three guineas, now sold for one. In fact, I might produce a much longer list to prove the enhancing effect which copyright has on the price of books; but I consider that I have adduced quite sufficient for the purpose. I am not prepared to abide strictly, in all cases, by the present extent of copyright; it is extremely inconvenient that copyright should terminate with the life of the author, and I think it might be well to vest in the Privy Council a power to grant an extension in particular cases. I should be happy to see this question referred to a Committee up-stairs; not with the view of giving authors an absolute and unlimited power in the property of their works for perpetuity, but to determine how far the present term of copyright might be altered, so as to promote the best interests of the public at large. If this Bill be thrown out, I will support a motion to that effect; but I never will consent to give my sanction to a measure like the present, which appears to me, in principle and detail, wholly erroneous and indefensible.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS.—I claim a vote from the Honourable Member for Derby. I am sure the Honourable Member cannot refuse it, after having distinctly stated that the present law of copyright is imperfect, inasmuch as it may terminate with the life of the author. I am glad to perceive, amidst the many discouraging circumstances with which this Bill has to contend, that there is one of a different and compensating character, and that is, that the discussion has evoked no party hostility, nor the slightest appearance of personal acrimony. I cannot, however, at the same time, avoid expressing my regret that this most important question has not been considered of sufficient importance to attract a fuller House; but still I find some consolation in thinking that, without having excited the slightest party feeling, it has, on three separate occasions, been sanctioned by large and increasing majorities. It was said, when the subject was last under discussion, that posthumous fame was the grand stimulus to the production of works of rare literary and scientific merit; but what right has the Legislature to exclude those who naturally look to the rewards of parental genius from a fair share of its emoluments? It is the misfortune of circumstances, that those who write for posterity are generally unsupported by their contemporaries. Shakspeare, so far as can now be ascertained, never received a single pound profit from his works; but if any of his descendants now existed, and possessed a fair share of copyright, they would be among the wealthiest in the land. If Blenheim be now justly considered the brightest jewel in the coronet of the Marlboroughs, why should the descendants of those who gave immortality to English literature be excluded from all participation in the profits of their genius? On the principle, then, that those who do most for the intellectual glory of the country have the highest claim on popular support, I say that we are strictly bound to pass some such measure as that now before the House. That measure will, in my opinion, fulfil, to some extent, the end I have in view; and for that reason I will accept it from the Honourable and Learned Member for Reading as a fair and reasonable compromise. It is conceded, on all hands, that the subject deserves inquiry; and I do not see what difference there can be between an inquiry before a Committee up-stairs, and such a one as I hope will follow this motion. If the principle be conceded that some encouragement should be given to good authors, the length of copyright is merely a question of detail. The Honourable Member for Bridport has treated this as an author's Bill; but his arguments show that he wishes to make it exclusively a reader's Bill. I, on the other hand, view the interests of authors and readers as identical, and therefore I support this Bill. The Honourable Member for Derby (Mr. Strutt) has admitted that there should be an inquiry upon this subject. There is no substantial difference between an inquiry up-stairs and in Committee of the whole House; and therefore I think I have a fair claim upon the Honourable Member's vote for the second reading of this Bill, which I contend will be inoperative of any thing bad, and productive of much that that will be beneficial both to authors and to the public.

Mr. WAKLEY.—I think that the Honourable and Learned Member for Reading may fairly prognosticate what will be the ultimate fate of his Bill from the present state of the House. He may perceive that, in the opinion of the House, the Bill is a doomed measure. If Honourable Members took any interest in the measure, they would attend in greater numbers, especially when they knew that an eloquent speech might be expected from the Honourable and Learned Mover. That Honourable and Learned Gentleman has addressed the House several times with great feeling and fervor on matters connected with this subject; but in all his speeches he has altogether failed to show any good ground for the House interfering in the case. He has been asked, again and again, to consent to a Select Committee, where the matter would get a careful consideration; and if he will do so, I, for one, will withdraw my opposition. The Honourable and Learned Member is silent, and therefore I suppose that the Honourable and Learned Member dissents from the proposition: but is it fair to the public to endeavour to legislate on this subject without due inquiry? No such inquiry has been made; and if we proceed as the Honourable and Learned Member asks us, we shall be legislating without the facts. The Right Honourable the Member for Pembroke could not, this evening, perceive that the Bill had any connection with the interests of trade. He cannot have read it, or he would have perceived that it interferes, in an extraordinary degree, with the interests of the trades of printing and publishing. How could it be otherwise, seeing that the direct effect must be to increase the author's profit on his books? The Noble Lord the seconder of the motion has asserted that the Bill would benefit authors of a certain class without injuring the public; but how has that statement been proved? Not one fact has been brought forward to show that there was any truth in such an allegation. The Noble Lord said, also, that Dryden was obliged to compose ribald plays for a corrupt court, instead of a grand poem; but the truth is, that the composition of a grand epic poem would not have supplied him with the means of maintenance. The Noble Lord also adverted to the case of Milton; but in the time of that great poet the right of copy was assumed to be perpetual: and what did Milton get for his Paradise Lost? The sum has been differently stated; but it varies from 5*l.* to 15*l.* Can the Honourable and Learned Gentleman fail to recognise the benefits which authors have derived from the art of printing; and are not printers as much entitled to protection as authors? I think we cannot doubt the assertion of the Honourable Baronet opposite, that there are no politics mixed up with this question, when we see the Honourable and Learned Serjeant himself assisted by such sound Conservatives as the Noble Lord the Member for Hertford, the Honourable Member for Newark, and the Honourable Baronet himself. The Honourable and Learned Serjeant prides himself on the connection; but I am sure, if he considered the matter, he would not enter into any league, the object of which was to withhold education from the people. As the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has spoken of the freezing and chilling effect of science, he cannot be astonished if men of science regard the character of this Bill with suspicion. I would entreat the Honourable Member to pause. I know he is actuated by good motives, but I would entreat him to bring his mind vigorously to bear on the question, and to look to national more than to individual interests. Let us rely rather on the evidence which will come before a Select Committee, than on the excitement of feeling which the Honourable and Learned Member may create by his appeals to the House. I do not know how it can be said that Honourable Members take great interest in the measure; but this I do know, that I saw an Honourable Member, a supporter of the Honourable and Learned Serjeant's motion, this evening, endeavouring to get a pair; and on asking him "did he understand the question," he told me that "he knew nothing about it." My Honourable Friend the Member for Bridport, having thoroughly investigated the subject, is prepared to give this Bill his most strenuous opposition, on no other grounds than an imperative sense of public duty. He could be influenced by no other; he is not an author disappointed at the measure of approbation which the public have awarded to his works; he is no publisher dissatisfied with the amount of his profits; he is, in fact, the last man in the House to be affected by such a Bill. It is very easy to foresee what will be the fate of this Bill. We shall continue for some weeks struggling about it every Wednesday evening, until at last the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud, and the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, will apply their minds to the consideration of the subject, and the former will get up in his place, and say, "This is really a very important subject, involving great public interests, and I think it should be referred to a Committee of Inquiry;" the Right Honourable Baronet will agree with the Noble Lord;—and there will be an end to all our attempts at legislation upon it. For all these reasons, I again entreat the Honourable and Learned Member to consent to the only measure which can give him a chance of success, namely, to refer the whole matter to a Select Committee.

Mr. EWART.—I beg to echo the proposition of the Honourable Member for Finsbury, as I do not consider this merely as a question between authors and publishers, but as one of paramount public interest. The Noble Lord has instanced the rewards of Canning and Marlborough as a reason why authors should receive this term of copyright as their reward. But let me ask the Noble Lord whether the rewards of Canning and Marlborough deprived the public of a great good?

At the present moment, there is among us a greater taste for reading than ever before was known, and education is notoriously far cheaper than it ever before was; and such, indeed, is the tendency of the present times to encourage cheap publications, that a work like Butler's Analogy can be purchased for about 10*d.*, and Sir Walter Scott's novels for 1*s.* each. I ask, then, if, with this desire on the part of the public, to obtain cheap publications, it is wise to do that which will tend to render such publications dear, and close the doors of cheap instruction and information against the public? I say, Sir, that these are times when we ought rather to open those doors. And if I am asked how I would do justice in a case of so great importance, I should be very much inclined to adopt the suggestions of the Honourable Member for Derby, and the Honourable Member for Finsbury. I would make the term of copyright a question of equitable consideration in special cases, leaving it to the Privy Council, or some other tribunal that might be invested with the power, to decide as to such term with respect to its extent, and its renewal, if, after the expiration of such term, it should seem advisable to renew it. I do not think that in this country we ought to be fettered by those considerations which prevail in many others; as, for instance, in France,—a country, however, which will, no doubt, at last be called upon — when a greater and more general desire for reading shall prevail there — to extend all necessary facilities for such an object. I would ask the House whether, in the case of that large class of writers who are mere compilers, the extension given by this Bill ought to be conceded, and whether we ought not to guard against any infringement upon the protection which the public at present enjoy in the cheapness of that description of works which those persons produce? With respect to the copyright of designs, which is based upon the same principle as literary copyright, we have this distinction — that we are not asked in the case of designs for one uniform term of protection, — some having a shorter and some a longer term; whereas this Bill includes all kinds of literary productions in the same provisions. With regard to patents and inventions, too, I very well remember that the Report of the Committee upon that subject, on which I had the honour of sitting, strongly recommended that they should not be all equally protected by one uniform term. With the warmest desire, then, to do justice to the public, I cannot, without seeing my way better than at present, consent to alter the existing law. I ask my Honourable and Learned Friend how he can better convince the public of the justice of his measure than by consenting to the appointment of a Select Committee upon the subject? He will, if he consents to this proposition, be able to appeal to the Report of the Committee in support of his views; and if he can then show that they are right, and that his theory is founded on facts, there can be no doubt that his measure will gain the support of this House and the country.

Mr. CHARLES BULLER. — I am anxious, Sir, on the present occasion, merely to repeat what I have at other times said with respect to the Bill of my Honourable and Learned Friend; and I must confess that I cannot, with many of my Honourable Friends on this side of the House, join in the objection that the present House is too thin for this discussion, because I think that this subject would not have so fair a chance of being so well considered in a fuller House. It is a subject which is happily free from all party considerations; and I am sure that in anything like a full House, I, for one, should almost be afraid to offer an opinion upon so difficult and important a subject, or to state the conclusions to which I might have come — as I now do, indeed, with very great diffidence, the arguments being so nicely balanced — as to my vote respecting it. I have, however, come to the determination of giving my vote in the present instance in favour of the second reading of this Bill, and on this simple ground, that, requiring, as I do, further information upon the subject, I would rather let the Bill proceed, with the view of eliciting as much discussion and opinion upon the matter as possible. I by no means intend to be understood as despising the analogy with respect to the rights of property which has been held out by many Honourable Gentlemen,— though no man would propose that there should be the same right of property in the contents of a book as over material property, — or that there is any anology between the dominion over the naked ideas of a man's mind and over material things; but it does appear to me that there is a great analogy between material property and that which is the produce of a man's labour. The simplest notion of property is, that a man should have a property in that which is the creation and produce of his mind; and in my opinion the fundamental idea of a right of any man with regard to the result of his own labour, is, that he himself creates a property in the labour of his mind. But many of the greatest discoveries of men's minds cannot be made property; as, for instance, that which is one of the most important discoveries in the annals of the world — the discovery of the continent of America by Columbus. I might also instance the discovery of the circulation of the blood by Harvey. These are discoveries of vital importance, but which cannot be protected as property. Now, when you see piles of books filling up and crowding every house and shop you go into, I say that that is a sort of property which you can protect and secure to the benefit of the authors and their descendants. I must say that I concur with the Honourable Member for Derby, that all law as to property is sought to be created in accordance with what is the opinion of the law itself of the work to be protected, with a due regard the public good; but, at the same time, I must also say that it appears to me to be inconsistent with the progress of the age, and the prevailing state of civilisation, that the only labours a man shall not profit by, are the works of his own mind; — works which, perhaps, may be of the greatest value to the country. If you could make Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding property, can it be doubted that you would confer the greatest benefit upon the community at large? And nothing could be more cheering and grateful than to see the descendants of Milton and Locke rewarded and honoured for the genius and the labours of their great ancestors. Besides, pecuniary motives might operate most beneficially by encouraging solid instead of fugitive literature, and more especially with regard to great historical works; because, where there was protection, many a writer would say, "I will rather write a history, that may have a chance of living for many years, and that will be a future source of profit to my descendants, than a novel, which will only live three or four years, and produce but an immediate, transient benefit to myself. I think, therefore, that the tendency of this Bill is certainly to encourage solid literature rather than that of a lighter and more frivolous character. As to the objections that an extended copyright would make books much dearer in price, I am by no means satisfied that it would have any such effect. I know that just at the time when copyrights in many works expires, a very great change takes place in the system of the publishing trade, and that there has been great collusion among publishers, it having been found out by the booksellers that much more is to be gained by selling a great quantity of books at small prices, than a small quantity at great ones; that selling at low prices, in fact, produces a better market. In the present day, however, there are still to be found instances of very considerable prices being given for the copyrights of publications; and I refer more particularly to that large class of works which appear from time to time in Lardner's Cabinet Library. Great prices, I believe, have been given for such works as Sir James Mackintosh's History of the Revolution. I believe, also, that a large price was paid for Mr. Thirlwall's History of Greece, and a work of Mr. Milman in The Family Library. I may be speaking rather at random —— but I am told that there is a publisher who makes a practice of selling at a cheap rate all the volumes in which these works are contained; and this shows, at once, that copyright does not always interfere with prices.

An objection has been raised that there is no clause in this Bill to prevent the suppression of works; and I certainly think that it does not afford any guarantee or security in that respect. With regard to such a work as Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, I would instance that as a book which, falling into the hands of some conscientious man, might have induced him to think it a duty to suppress the copyright of such a work. The Bill, too, I think, is faulty in another respect. It proposes that the property in books, which is to be inherited, is to be divided among the descendants of the authors; — but how, I would ask, is it to be divided? How, after all the precautions that my Honourable and Learned Friend might have taken that the descendants of a learned man should enjoy such property, does this Bill secure it to them? The Bill ought not only to create the property, but it should also secure to the decendants of a literary man, the sole right in his works, by entailing it upon them; or else, is it not most probable that some stupid or profligate descendant might alienate it? Might not some foolish Shakspeare or Milton squander the property, or some more prudent person purchase it of him for a mere trifle? What I am chiefly afraid of, however, is — that the result of this Bill will be, that, in nine cases out of ten, the booksellers will succeed in buying the copyright, outright. I cannot but remember that Goldsmith was arrested for 1*l.* 10*s.*, and that in this difficulty, and to prevent the necessity of getting out of the dilemma by marrying his landlady, — he got a bookseller to give him the small sum of 8*l.* for the copyright of one of his immortal works! Now, I wish as much as any man can do, to promote the interests of authors; — I wish to see created a literary property, and that property secured — as far as it can be secured — to the descendants of learned men; but

I cannot refrain from expressing a doubt that this Bill will have such an effect, or produce such a result. I must confess that I rather incline to a suggestion that was thrown out, on a former occasion, by the Noble Lord (Lord Howick) the Member for Northumberland, who said that he would prefer some plan similar to that which was adopted by the Honourable Baronet the Member for Lincoln, with regard to the Dramatic Authors Bill, and which is admitted to have been of such great advantage to that branch of the literature of the country. I think that, if we could insure that, wherever a work is sold, the author shall have some profit out of such sale for a term of sixty years, or more, although the difficulties attendant upon such a plan are many, some such plan is, nevertheless, possible. I shall, however, certainly vote for the second reading of the Bill, to-night, as I think that, wherever there is a doubt, it is better to give it in such a manner as to promote, rather than check, the discussion of the question. At the same time, I cannot but say, that I think my Honourable and Learned Friend would do well to listen to the suggestion that has been made on this side of the House, because the merits of the question might be fully discussed before a Select Committee of this House, independently of this Bill being one which I certainly think — affecting, as it does, so many interests — should emanate from the authority of such a Committee. The Bill has not hitherto gone at such a railroad pace, in its progress through the House, as to let a Committee seriously oppose that progress; and I really believe that, after having the different views which different interests take of the subject fairly stated before a Committee, such a course would, in the end, be found to have been better for the Bill itself than to persevere in pressing through the House a measure that is met by so many objections.

Mr. JOHN JERVIS. — I also think, Sir, that it will be much better for the Bill itself that my Honourable and Learned Friend should adopt the suggestion that has been offered. There are four different parties which ought to be considered with reference to the bearing of this measure, — the authors, the booksellers, the publishers, and the printers; and I stand here to defend the interests of the printers, who have very material evidence to lay before a Committee, should a Committee be granted, and who, it must be acknowledged, are a very important class of persons in considering a measure of this nature, and have very important interests involved. I had, on a former occasion, the good fortune to represent the interests of both printers and publishers; but my Honourable and Learned Friend has now endeavoured to satify the publishers by affirming their interests, and, at the same time, compromising those of the public. But what are the effects that are, even now, produced on the publishers by this Bill? They said, before, that not one farthing would be gained by authors beyond the expiration of the extended term of copyright; — and have they altered that opinion now? They still say the same thing. With regard to the printers, they have a great amount of capital at stake, and they will be interfered with by this measure, if it pass into a law, in a most important degree. No man can doubt that, if it were possible to give to the authors all the benefit that could be derived from their works, it would be wise and proper to do so; but that cannot be done without involving the interests of the public. This Bill tends inevitably to a perpetual copyright; and I find that my Honourable and Learned Friend has indirectly adopted the same principle in this, as in the former one, with respect to the proof to be given before the Court of Chancery that works are out of print. But how, I wish to ask my Honourable and Learned Friend, is that fact to be ascertained? If this cannot be done, why, then there is an end of the Bill, — it being quite plain that the machinery of my Honourable and Learned Friend is not, by any means, sufficient for his own purpose. As to what the Noble Lord opposite has said with respect to maps, is the House aware what are the facts relating to such cases? Does the House know that a plate which may have cost, perhaps, 5*l.* or 6*l.*, may be carried to another plate for 10*s.* by means of tracing paper? I think that the argument of the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard as to the fact of many valuable works being now to be purchased at a very cheap rate, is well founded; but what would have been the fact if a strict monopoly, on the part of the authors, had in the mean time been going on? The reason of the cheapness of those works is only to be found in the fact, that they who are obliged to pay large sums of money for the works in the first instance, are compelled to resort to ow prices in selling them, in order to obtain an adequate remuneration. Let the House look at the price that must be paid for a copy of Clarendon's History of the Rebellion for a proof of the baneful effects of extended copyright. Here we have a work which might—and ought, long ago, to—have been published in a cheap and popular form; but the price is now so high, that it operates like a perpetuity of copyright, and so desirable a result cannot be effected. Before my Honourable and Learned Friend brought forward this measure, I should like to know if there existed any complaints, on the part of authors, of a want of adequate remuneration, or whether there was any dearth of literary merit in the country? The fact, now, is—that there are scarcely any petitions in favour of the Bill; but we have it discussed, from day to day, till the end of the Session, when the House expresses an opinion that the subject to which it relates has not been sufficiently inquired into, and that there is no evidence to justify the House in such a step as the Bill involves. I therefore would sincerely recommend my Honourable and Learned Friend to attend to the suggestion that has been thrown out. I am so satisfied of the justice of the case of the printers, and so sensible of the truth of what has fallen from my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Liskeard, that, unless there shall be a full inquiry gone into upon the subject, before a Committee up-stairs, I shall find it to be consistent with my duty to offer every opposition to this Bill which the forms of the House admit of; but, at the same time, I will add, that, if the matter be fairly discussed up-stairs, and the result shall be that a Committee report in favour of the measure, I, for one, will give it my support, and offer it no further opposition.

Mr. HUME.—I have listened, Sir, with great attention to all that has passed, and am exceedingly sorry to find the public interests so much neglected as they appear to be by the supporters of this Bill. We have heard much of the rights of authors; but if authors have that property, which it has been shown by many Honourable Gentlemen that they have, why, I would ask, should they come here for a new law? I have always objected to the Bill of the Learned Serjeant, because I am of opinion that it would have a tendency to check that great disposition to reading and instruction to the spread of which nothing has so much contributed as the reduction that has of late years taken place in the price of almost every sort of publications. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman now comes forward and advocates the interests of authors, treating them as a class of individuals quite distinct from the rest of the community. And why? No doubt the generality of authors are men of talent and genius, and no man is more desirous than myself to see them receive the proper reward of their labours and their usefulness: but the object which we, who oppose the present Bill, have in view, is, to render that means of instruction which these authors, to their great honour, confer upon society, of as wide and general utility as possible. It has been said that an extended copyright would tend to render books cheap; and the Noble Lord opposite has recommended us, the people of a free and liberal country, to copy the example of Russia, where, he says, copyright is perpetual.

LORD MAHON.—Copyright in Russia only extends to 85 years.

Mr. HUME.—But does the Noble Lord mean to recommend us to take for our model a country where, as in Russia, there is not a single act done that is not in open and direct hostility to the true principles of liberty?

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear!

Mr. HUME.—We know that they, whose constant wish it is to keep the people in a state of ignorance and oppression will naturally use every means to check knowledge and education in their progress; but they, who are the advocates of liberty, and wish to see education spread abroad through the land—sound moral and religious education—have contributed to produce that pleasing result of their labours in the cause, which is evinced in the sale of millions of copies in consequence of the great reduction in the price of publications. It appears to me that this Bill has a tendency to stifle knowledge, and that my Honourable and Learned Friend wishes to hide even his own splendid talents under a bushel: it is an attempt to drive us back to the days of darkness; and such an object, surely, ought not to receive the sanction of this House. I say that the discussion of this measure ought not to be allowed to go on, for there have scarcely been forty Members in the House since it commenced; the Government are all absent, and there is only one Gentleman on the Treasury bench, and he (Sir George Strickland) is not a member of the Government. This is a Bill of great importance, and one which ought not to be brought forward when there is not a single member of the Government here to defend it. I cannot but express my regret and surprise that an Honourable Member professing such liberal opinions as those which have ever hitherto characterised the Honourable and Learned Serjeant, should now come forward and attempt to establish a monopoly in favour of authors, careless of the millions who, but for this Bill, should it unfortunately pass into a law, would be enabled to possess the means of instruction and enlightenment. I repeat that this is an attempt to throw us back to the days of darkness.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" and, "Divide!"]

Let not the House be in a hurry; we will divide presently. I am willing to believe that no man more highly values the blessings of education than the Honourable and Learned Gentleman himself; and I would ask him to reconsider the step he is now pressing us to take. Why should be wish to legislate on this subject without fuller information? I am convinced that before a Committee of this House, a body of evidence could be produced such as would refute all the arguments that can be used in support of this Bill, and show that while it would benefit one individual, it would be a loss and an injury to millions; and if we cannot do this, if a Committee be granted us, I, for one, will withdraw all further opposition to the Bill. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman will not consent to a Committee, because he well knows that he will be beaten if he do. The Gentlemen on the opposite benches are not the advocates and promoters of education; and I must say I am surprised that the Honourable and Learned Serjeant should now back himself with such support as theirs, for they are men of whose support he ought to be afraid,—enemies as they are of education, and opposed as they have always been to the liberties of the people. I do not speak without book, Sir; and I would entreat my Honourable and Learned Friend to be aware of what he is doing: I would entreat him to be cautious as to what he is about —— lest he lend himself to the accomplishment of evils most severely to be deprecated. He is not ignorant of what history tells us of the means employed by the opponents of liberty and enlightenment, in creating a monopoly of knowledge and instruction. He may depend upon it that the establishment of such a monopoly will be the effect of this very Bill.

[Laughter, and cries of "Oh, oh!"]

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Ay:—he will look back and regret the course which he is pursuing when it is too late; and I beseech him, if he thinks he has a good cause, to let the Bill go before a Committee up-stairs. But the Honourable and Learned Gentleman is acting under the conviction that his cause is not a good one, and is obliged to look for support, and a majority, among the Honourable Gentlemen opposite. On these grounds, then, Sir, and with these views, I can only say that I will on this occasion, as well as on all others, oppose the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's Bill, so long as he refuses to consent to the proposition for a Select Committee to consider this subject.

Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD. — I confess, Sir, I do not regret that I gave way to the Honourable Member for Kilkenny,—not because he has said anything on the real merits of this Bill, but because he has shown that nothing more can be said upon it. He has introduced party spirit into the discussion of a measure which ought to be independent of all party considerations, and which was, last year, supported by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, who expressed himself in favour of a perpetual copyright, and by many other Honourable Members on the same side of the House with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny himself, who now attempts to deprive us of our only resting place from the introduction of party topics. Why, Sir, how can he call this a party question, when he finds the names of William Wordsworth, of Thomas Campbell, of Thomas Moore, of Leigh Hunt, of Mr. Carlyle, of Harriet Martineau, and many other persons of high literary eminence, among the petitioners in favour of this Bill?

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I will tell the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, and also the Honourable Member for Finsbury, that I will not be deterred from giving an honest vote on any measure, merely because it may happen to be supported by Gentlemen on this (the Opposition) side of the House. It is not the first time I have met with support from them, and I will ever give them my support also, when they show a disposition to allow others the privilege of thinking for themselves. I have been taunted with bringing forward this measure before a thin House, and with the Treasury bench empty. But night after night, last Session, did I attempt to bring forward my Bill, at great sacrifice of time, and great inconvenience to myself. At last I was able to bring it in; and in a House in which ten Cabinet Ministers were present, and upwards of a hundred other Members who were in my favour, six hours were spent in opposing — not discussing — the question. I afterwards came down on fifteen or sixteen several nights in order to bring on another stage of the Bill, and, although I had the promise of the support of the Government, I was obliged to withdraw it at last; and I cannot but think it is most unjust now to taunt me with bringing it forward in a thin House. It has been pressed upon me, from various quarters, to allow the Bill to go to a Select Committee; but is not this the same proposition that was made, discussed, and negatived, two years ago? At that period, my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General, and the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon, were opposed to the measure; but now, the former is ready to accede to it, and the latter, if in the House, would — and I am proud that I have his authority for saying so — vote for the second reading to-night. The truth, however, is, that there are no new facts which call for inquiry; and this, I submit, is manifest from the arguments of the opponents of the Bill, who have only repeated over and over again the arguments which were used on former occasions, still asserting that the public will be injured, and that the price of books will be raised. It has been said, that only one out of every 500 authors would be benefited by this measure. No doubt, the works of only one out of every 500 authors ever reach the distinction of that bright reward, the stamp of time: but still, as those who succeed to this extent are the lights and ornaments of the age, they form the very cases for which we ought to legislate; — for, in legislating for them, we are legislating for the world. I cannot admit the truth of what the Honourable Gentlemen opposite assert, when they say that, for one author who would be benefited by this Bill, 6000 of the public would be injured. This is a mere fallacy; because the public could only lose in the proportion in which the author gained, and there could not be any gain or loss at all for twenty-eight years to come. The Honourable Gentlemen have entirely misunderstood the provisions of the Bill. If the Bill had any tendency at all to make books dear, at all events it could only make the particular book dear which would be stamped with the impress of time. The magazines and reviews would have passed away, but the one book would live and take the benefit of the extended term; and, I own, I am quite at a loss to know how, in such a case, the author alone would receive gain, and 5000 or 6000 of the public be injured. Yet these, Sir, are the considerations that are held out to me, forsooth, to induce me to submit this question to the chance of a Select Committee! I am exceedingly obliged to my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Liskeard for his excellent speech; and, as the House has now before it a statement of the case on both sides, I can only say, that if I had heard any one suggestion that would have removed any doubt which may exist on the subject of this Bill, I would readily consent to a Select Committee. Some persons seem to imagine that there is a kind of magic in the words "issuing a work from the press," and that, when once issued, it becomes the property of the world for ever, without any consideration for the author whatsoever. I do not understand what the public mean by what they call their "vested rights" in an author's works; and I differ from those Honourable Members who deny an author's right of suppression; for I think that even Gibbon might, when dying, have wished to blot out from his work the two chapters, and the notes interspersed throughout the Decline and Fall, which operate so insidiously and injuriously against religion. With respect to Clarendon's History, that work stands upon peculiar grounds, being the property of a university; but even that work is now to be obtained by the public at the moderate price of 15*s*. The copyright in Campbell's and in Rogers's poems still subsists; but, notwithstanding, the poems of the one are to be had for 2*s*., and of the other for 1*s*. 6*d*. Now, with respect to what has been said concerning patents, I confess I can see no analogy between the two cases. The fact is, that by the common law of England copyright has been perpetual; and this was decided in the case of "Donaldson v. Beckett," in the King's Bench, by three judges to one, and afterwards by nine to two in the House of Lords, although a majority of Peers, consisting of Lord Mansfield and others, considered that the right had been taken away by the statute of Anne. The question, then, is, are we to encourage light and ephemeral literature at the expense of those works which confer lasting advantages upon the public? It is said that authors now get large sums for their works, and, no doubt, in many instances they do; but I think that that is a proof of the necessity for this Bill; because publishers induce authors, under the present system, to write and fritter away their time upon light and frivolous works of fiction, and articles for magazines and reviews. Let us, then, do that which will encourage more enduring study and a higher class of literature, convinced — and I, for one, am convinced, — that after ages, as well as the people of these times, will say that this House will have done a great good, if it shall pass a measure for the benefit of those who, by the exercise of the noblest faculties of the human mind, confer such lasting blessings and benefits upon the world.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

The SPEAKER. — The motion is, — "That this Bill be now read a second time;" to which an amendment has been proposed, to leave out the word "now," and, at the end of the question, to add the words "upon this day six months." The question is, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

The House then divided: — Ayes 59; Noes 29; — Majority 30.

TRANSFER OF AIDS BILL.

Read a third time (according to order), and passed.

PRINCE ALBERT'S ANSWER TO THE LORDS' ADDRESS.

The Lord President reported the Answer of His Royal Highness Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, to the Message of Friday last, as follows: —

"I return the House of Lords my warmest thanks for the Message which you have now delivered.

"I learn with lively satisfaction their approbation of the choice which Her Majesty has made; and it will be the study of my life to justify the favourable opinion which you have now expressed."

The Message and Answer to be printed and published.

THE DUCHESS OF KENT'S ANSWER TO THE LORDS' ADDRESS.

The Lord President reported the Answer of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, to the Message of Friday last, as follows: —

"My Lords,

"I thank you cordially for your congratulations on an event so deeply interesting to me; and I assure you, that nothing can be more gratifying to me than the Address of the House of Lords on the marriage of my beloved daughter; which promises, with the blessing of Divine Providence, to insure her happiness, and to secure for her the love and affection of the people."

The Message and Answer to be printed and published.

Severally read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DUTIES ON EAST INDIA PRODUCE.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I beg to ask the Noble Marquess the President of the Council, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to accede to my intended motion for referring the petition of the East India Company to a Select Committee?

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I think it would be more advisable to wait until the Government shall have duly considered the several important topics contained in the petition; but if the Noble Baron choose to press his motion for a Select Committee, it will not be opposed by Her Majesty's Ministers. It would not be expedient for me now to state what are the points to which the attention of the Government has been principally directed. There are many subjects connected with the petition — such, for instance, as the more free importation of East India goods — which are of essential importance, and which ought to be well considered. I cannot but feel that there may be an inconvenience in hurrying this question forward, since there are several topics growing out of it which are likely to affect the revenue and the system of foreign customs; and I should be sorry if any step were hastily taken that would interfere, in any way, with those great principles of commerce which have been heretofore successfully acted on. At the same time, if the Noble Baron press his motion, I shall be ready to attend to any suggestion that the Committee may make to the House, and to render any services in my power for the purpose of conducting the inquiry which the Noble Lord proposes.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I am not going to say a word on the subject of the petition, but merely to remark that, after what has been stated by the Noble Marquess, it will not be necessary for me to offer any reason to your Lordships, on Tuesday next, for proposing that the petition be referred to a Select Committee. I shall, therefore, merely move for the appointment of the Committee; upon which I am exceedingly glad that we shall have the valuable assistance of the Noble Marquess. I will now move, my Lords, for the following Returns, to which, I presume, there is no objection: —

Account of the quantity and value of all articles of the growth or manufacture of the territories under the Government of the East India Company, imported into the United Kingdom in each year, from 1828 to 1839, both inclusive; together with an account of the rate of duty levied upon the import of each article in each year: Also,

Account of the quantity and value of all articles of the growth or manufacture of the United Kingdom imported into the territories under the Government of the East India Company, in each year from 1821 to 1838, inclusive: together with an account of the rate of duty levied upon the import of each article in each year: And, also,

Similar accounts of the imports from the territories under the Government of the East India Company and from the United Kingdom, respectively, into the British colonies, and from the British colonies into the United Kingdom and the territories under the government of the East India Company respectively; showing in all cases the rate of duty levied upon the import of each article.

Orded to be laid before the House.

CHINA.

The DUKE of BUCKINGHAM. — I wish to know from the Noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty, whether he has received any official accounts of the transactions that have been represented as having recently taken place in China?

The EARL of MINTO. — No official account of the transactions referred to by the Noble Duke has been received at the Admiralty. I have, however, received private information, which leads me to consider the accounts that are now before the public to be, in effect, substantially correct.

The DUKE of BUCKINGHAM. — I wish also to know whether any steps have been taken in consequence of the death of Sir Frederick Maitland?

The EARL of MINTO. — In consequence of the death of that gallant officer, Admiral Elliot has been ordered to act in his stead.

ANGLO-SPANISH LEGION.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I am desirous of obtaining from the Noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government some information with reference to the proceedings of the Commission which was appointed to consider and decide on the claims of the British Legion on the Spanish Government. What I want to ascertain is, whether any arrangement has yet been made by the Spanish Commission, with the sanction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, respecting the adjustment of the outstanding claims of the officers and men of the British Auxiliary Legion, not presented before the 30th of December last. I wish, also, to have a Return of the decision of the War Office, respecting pensions and compensations granted to wounded officers of the Legion. I shall be satisfied if the Noble Viscount will inform me, to-morrow, whether or not any arrangement has been made for the paying of the Auxiliary Legion by the Spanish Government; and, if no arrangement has been made by the Spanish Government, what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with respect to those officers and men, who are now in a state of the most abject poverty?

SUPPLY OF WATER TO THE METROPOLIS.

Select Committee on, appointed, as follows: —

The Lord President,
The Duke of Somerset,
The Marquess of Northampton,
The Marquess of Anglesey,
The Marquess of Westminster,
The Earl of Essex,
The Earl of Wilton,
The Bishop of London,
Lord Dacre,
Lord Howland,
Lord Lilford,
Lord Colchester,
Lord Duncannon,
Lord Ashburton,
Lord Portman,
Lord Sudeley,
Lord Colborne.

Committee to meet on Monday next, at one o'clock.

INLAND BONDING WAREHOUSES.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — My Lords, I rise, in pursuance of the notice which I gave to your Lordships on Monday night, to move for the production of certain papers which I hold to be absolutely indispensable to the due consideration of a measure of great magnitude and importance, — which your Lordships thought fit to reject last year, but which is again shortly to be brought before us, recommended and supported by Her Majesty's Government. When my Noble Friend near me (Lord Ashburton), last Session, moved that the Bill relative to inland bonding warehouses be read a second time that day six months, he stated a fact which was not then contradicted, — and which has since been stated elsewhere, likewise, without contradiction, — namely, that the opinions of certain fiscal boards, as to the probable operation of the Bill on the revenue, is, in the highest degree, unfavourable to the measure; and that it is the conscientious belief of these parties, that if the measure be carried into a law, it will have a most seriously injurious effect on the revenue. So many hasty experiments have lately been made with reference to what are, in fact, the sources of the revenue, that I think it would scarcely be wise to add that which is now contemplated to the number, without the fullest investigation being instituted, in the first instance, for the purpose of ascertaining its probable effects. No man, who heard the clear and lucid statement made, a few nights ago, by a Noble Earl (Lord Ripon) not now in his place, with respect to the financial position in which the country at present stands, — (more especially when the Noble Viscount opposite, in his answer, candidly and courageously admitted the constantly increasing expenditure, and the equally constantly decreasing revenue,) — no one, I repeat, who heard this, but must look with considerable anxiety and apprehension at any measure, of which persons peculiarly qualified to form a proper opinion upon it have an idea that it would produce an unfavourable effect upon the revenue of the country. Therefore it is, I confess, that I am extremely anxious, before we proceed with a measure of this kind, to have the advantage of the opinions of practical men, to which I attach much more importance than I do to the theory and speculations of those to whom they are subservient. I apprehend that the Noble Viscount is not disposed to grant the Returns, because, as he on a former occasion said, in the first place, it was unusual to produce such documents; and, in the second place, their production would be inconvenient to the public service. Unusual it certainly is not, for I now hold in my hand a Report from the Board of Customs to the Board of Trade, upon the question of bonded sugar from foreign states being allowed to be refined in London. As to its being inconvenient to the public service, I cannot see how it can, by possibility, be so. Inconvenient to Her Majesty's Ministers it no doubt may be; because the production of those documents may chance to place them in a position which they do not wish to occupy. If, however, any real case of inconvenience can be made out, I should be very sorry to press the motion; but I hope, in return for such forbearance, that the Noble Viscount will not object to give the House an assurance that the opinion given by these parties on the subject is not most strongly and decidedly against the measure. If the Noble Viscount will give that assurance, I, for one, will be perfectly satisfied. But if the Noble Viscount will not do so, and if he, at the same time, withholds these papers, what, I ask your Lordships, is the conclusion to which the country at large will come, from the fact of that double denial? It will come to the just and inevitable conclusion, that the Noble Viscount, in spite of the previous warnings he has had, and the recommendations he has received to the contrary, from persons whose opinions deserve the highest respect and consideration, persists in acquiescing in a measure of this description, with a full and perfect foreknowledge of the prejudicial result which it is likely to have on the revenue of the country. There are, at the present moment, in consequence of deficiencies in the revenue, dim visions of future taxation before the eyes of the people; and I warn the Noble Viscount, that when the country shall be called upon to pay more taxes, it will not do so without a previous inquiry as to whether they are imposed from uncontrollable and inevitable necessity, or merely to gratify the speculations and fancies of experimentalists, who are anxious to interfere with the old established sources of our national prosperity. I now move that there be laid before the House, "copies of any Reports from the officers of the Revenue Boards to the Treasury, or the Board of Trade, relating to the extension of the principle of bonding warehouses to inland towns."

The EARL of CLARENDON. — Having been for some years connected with one of the boards to which the Noble Viscount has referred, I feel myself called upon to offer a few observations to the House. It is perfectly evident that, whether there are or are not precedents for the production of these documents, there cannot be a doubt that, if the principle be once admitted, the practice must be exceedingly inconvenient to every Government; — I say every Government, for this cannot, in any respect, be considered a party question. The relations between the different boards and the Treasury must always be the same. Their communications cannot vary; and as in most instances the Reports of the Boards of Customs and Revenue are replies to references made to them from the Treasury or Board of Trade, and are answers to opinions asked of them, it would follow that by the publication of such Reports there should be published also the opinions of the Treasury and Board of Trade. This, in many cases, would be very inconvenient. The correspondence upon which the decision of the Government is ultimately founded, must be often of a controversial, and always of a confidential, nature. It is not at all binding on the Government to adhere to the recommendations contained in the Reports they receive from any of these boards, or to assign any reason for rejecting their advice. The Revenue Board informs the Government as to the law and practice, and it is the duty of the Government to decide as it may think best for the public good; which it oftentimes does (in opposition to representations made by the board) from being cognisant of things of which the Revenue Board knows nothing; and for which decision the Government, alone, is responsible. The Board of Trade is considered as representing the great commercial interests of the country. The Board of Customs that of the revenue exclusively. The Board of Trade is anxious to give every facility to commerce, and to relieve it from its embarrassments, and is bound to state its views in the strongest terms. Both are equally zealous for the public service; but, at times, their views are at variance the one with the other. It can answer no useful end to inform parties in what manner particular departments of Government advocate their wishes or interests, and to tell them why the Board of Trade thinks a particular law necessary to be passed, and why the Board of Customs thinks the contrary? Take the example of the measure which gave rise to the Noble Lord's motion. The Board of Trade is considered to have been all along favourable to it; the Board of Customs, on the other hand, is supposed to be unfavourable to it. The latter, having great general information and knowledge on the subject, has suggested to the Government various ways by which, under such a law, the revenue might be defrauded; so that to publish this Report would be to give a gratuitous lecture on the most approved mode of smuggling, by those best qualified to teach it. Your Lordships, I believe, would be of opinion, if the papers for which the Noble Viscount has moved were laid on the table, that they would not serve any purpose of his, because they do not, in any way whatsoever, criminate the Government. Ministers, in supporting the Inland Warehousing Bill, conceive it to be their duty, with reference to the interests that are brought before them, and the assistance which those interests have a right to receive at their hands, to call upon Parliament to pass that Bill; but I do not see that they are therefore bound to disclose those confidential communications on which that measure is founded. Many other reasons will occur to the mind of any one conversant with business, why these papers should not be granted. Many cases may be laid before the Treasury, affecting the reputation, the solvency, and the liabilities of individuals and of companies, without the parties who put them forward avowing their real motives. Well, these cases may be sent down to subordinate boards for consideration; and, if the practice contended for by the Noble Viscount were acceded to, the Reports of these boards might, on motion, be published. What would be the consequence? Why, in many instances, your Lordships might thus become the instruments of propagating libel; and we all know to what inconvenience we might thereby expose ourselves. I cannot conceive that there are any more grounds for granting these papers than for producing the opinions of the law officers of the Crown; and I believe we are all agreed as to the expediency of keeping them secret. There can be no more reason for calling for these communications than for calling on the Secretary of State to produce the confidential communications between himself and his under Secretary. If the practice be once established, it will totally alter the character of the communications between the superior and the subordinate boards. No communications will take place but such as both parties are prepared to publish. Consultations and references will occur as before, because public business cannot be carried on without them; but they will be carried on either verbally or by means of private letters, which each Chancellor of the Exchequer may carry away with him when he leaves office. His successor would, upon assuming office, find that a great deal of legislation had passed; but he would find no record left to show him the grounds and the policy on which that legislation had proceeded. He would, in fact, be left without any guide whatever as to the reasons on account of which the changes and alterations in the law had been made. In offering these observations, I have not applied myself so much to the impropriety of producing the particular papers in question, as to the general ground that the production of all such papers would be prejudicial to the public service; and, as I am convinced that the Noble Viscount can have no such intention, I hope he will not press his motion.

LORD ASHBURTON.—Now, I confess I never was more puzzled than in endeavouring to comprehend how there can be any possible objection to the production of the papers moved for by my Noble Friend. I cannot see how any evil results, either to the character of individuals or to the public service, are likely to spring from the simple declaration of these two boards, as to the effect of inland warehousing on the general revenues of the country. If there be anything of a confidential nature in the communications which have passed between these Boards and the Treasury, my Noble Friend will, I am sure, consent to alter the terms of his motion in such a manner as not to include that portion of those communications. At the same time I confess I am at a loss to conceive what private communications either the Board of Customs or the Board of Excise could have to make to the Government, in reference to a Bill for establishing inland bonding warehouses. That was the last corner into which I thought the Noble Lord would have been driven for an argument against the motion of my Noble Friend. How this difficulty of divulging matters — said to be of a confidential nature — upon questions of revenue, has arisen, is to me wholly incomprehensible; and as to the objection that the motion, if successful, would tend to facilitate smuggling, I can only say that, in my opinion, the smugglers neither of this, nor, indeed, of any other country, require much assistance derived from information of such a description. One of my objections to the Bill itself is this, — that it will place in the hands of the Government the power of choosing between one place and another for establishing bonding warehouses; which option may lead to favouritism on one side, and jealousies on the other.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—These papers, my Lords, are asked for in relation to a Bill which is not yet before your Lordships, and possibly may never be so. The Noble Viscount who brought forward the motion has stated, incorrectly, the admission which I made, in the course of a debate, in the earlier part of the Session, on the subject of the general finances of the country, — an admission which he has characterised as candid and courageous. Undoubtedly, I do not consider that it will long avail, either in financial matters or any other matters connected with Government, to court concealment, or avoid a fair and candid statement of difficulties. But my language has been somewhat misrepresented. I certainly said that there had been a great increase of expenditure of late years, owing to the increase of the public exigencies, and to the numerous schemes now-a-days suggested for the public good. But I never said one word that could induce in the public mind a belief that there was any difficulty, on the part of the country, to meet that increased expenditure. On the contrary, I declared that there was no symptom whatever of any decrease or failure in the real strength, the real energy, the real resources of the country. I most earnestly hope that the Noble Lord will not be induced to persevere in the present motion, for the reasons stated by my Noble Friend, and which appear to be quite unanswerable. These communications between the Treasury and the Board of Trade and the revenue boards are really of a most secret and confidential nature. They are carried on adversely, — as all communications of this kind between different boards and the Treasury must necessarily be, when points essential to the public service are to be elucidated; they discuss the means of evading the law, and abound in reflections upon classes of men, if not upon individuals. To introduce the practice of calling for papers of this nature would be in the highest degree prejudicial to the public service. The Noble Baron who spoke last contended that no disadvantage could result from the production of the opinion of the Board of Trade and the Board of Customs, as to the general effect upon the revenue of the proposed new system of inland warehousing. It is possible that no disadvantage may result from it; but what I contend against is, the principle which the Noble Viscount seeks to establish — the principle of calling for papers which are necessarily of a secret and confidential nature. If that principle be once admitted, the inevitable result of it will be, to array one department of the Government in opposition to the other. Unless such communications be kept secret and confidential, the government of the country cannot be continued to be carried on as it has hitherto been carried on; for if these papers are to be perpetually made public, it is perfectly certain that a different mode of conducting business between departments must be adopted. Everything now-a-days is made public. If one writes a letter, it is a hundred to one but it appears next day in a newspaper, or at all events will be read aloud in this House. What is the consequence? Why, that an end is put to all correspondence. No man in his senses will now write one single word more than he is compelled to do. Confidential communication is at an end; for if communications of this kind are subject, upon all occasions, to be canvassed in the public prints, or overhauled in Parliament, who will venture to be confidential? I do not say that it would be a prudent or a wise way, or a customary or a usual way, to deal with a Bill of this kind, when it comes up to your Lordships' House, to send it to a Committee; but, unusual and unwise as such a course might be, I think it would be far less objectionable than that now proposed. It would, at the same time, be more constitutional, and more parliamentary. I cannot pledge myself to accede to that course when the Bill comes up to your Lordships' House; but I must say that I shall be much more ready to accede to it than to the motion now made by the Noble Lord opposite. I therefore most earnestly hope that the Noble Lord will not be induced to persist in his motion.

LORD ASHBURTON. — The Noble Viscount wishes to establish the principle as a precedent, that papers such as are now moved for ought not to be produced for the conduct of the public business. I, on the other hand, contend, that if the privilege of calling for papers of this description be denied, Parliament will lose much of the power that it is desirable it should possess, for the benefit of the public at large. I hold in my hand a Report from the Board of Customs to the Board of Trade, relative to refined sugars, which, according to the principle laid down by the Noble Viscount, ought not to have been made public, and must have been made public in direct opposition to that principle; — a principle which, if established by this House, will never, I am sure, be conceded by the other House of Parliament.

LORD MONTEAGLE. — I do not see that there is any analogy between that Report and the papers now moved for, because the grounds upon which that Report was produced differ widely from those which have been urged in favour of this motion. Besides, I did not understand my Noble Friend to lay it down as a principle, that under no circumstances were Reports of this kind to be granted. All that is contended for is, that the principle ought to be the other way, and that cases of production should be the exceptions, and justified as exceptions. My Noble Friend who has just sat down has said, that if the doctrine of the Noble Viscount (Melbourne) were acceded to, not only would a difficulty be thrown in the way of the proceedings of your Lordships' House, but that a principle would be established which would never be agreed to by the other House of Parliament. Now, so far from that, if your Lordships refer to the Journals of the other House, you will find that the same motion was made, there, on behalf of the great interests that would be affected by this Bill (the Liverpool Dock Company), and that the same answer was given that has been given by my Noble Friend; which answer was considered so satisfactory that the motion was at once withdrawn. The papers were not pressed for, because their production would be inconvenient to the public service. With regard to the Bill itself, it has been objected to because it would confer on the Government the power of exercising favouritism, by selecting one place and refusing another equally convenient. But whatever objection applies to the Bill on that ground, applies equally to the present state of the law, as my Noble Friend, opposite, knows. He is aware that, at present, it is discretionary with the Government to select one port and to refuse another; and that is a discretion against which I have never heard a well-grounded complaint. The measure was introduced by the Government entirely and purely on its own merits, — as a measure of great relief and advantage to the commerce of the country. I hope, most sincerely, that your Lordships will not consent to this motion; for, from my own experience, I can say that it would be productive of the most injurious consequences.

LORD ASHBURTON. — I believe the truth to be, that there would have been no objection to the production of these papers, and that they would have been granted at once, if the Government had not gone into the measure directly in the teeth of their own officers. When the question came before the Board of Trade, my Noble Friend opposite was one of those who thought that there were great difficulties in the way of it; and he now tells us that he is in favour of it. The information sought for, I certainly think, we must have, in some shape or other.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — After what has fallen from the Noble Viscount opposite, I shall, with your Lordships' permission, withdraw the motion. At the same time, I beg to remind the Noble Viscount that he has not yet stated whether the Government, in pressing this measure, is not acting in direct opposition to the wishes of those persons who are best informed on the subject. The course which has been just hinted at by my Noble Friend will, I think, be the safest and best course to pursue, — I mean, that when the Bill shall come before your Lordships, it will be for you to consider whether you cannot obtain the information I ask for, by the means of a Select Committee? As to the confidential nature of these communications, I am not disposed to pry into the mysterious tendernesses which may have passed between the Board of Customs and the Treasury, nor do I want to make this House an originator of libels, or a " normal school " for the instruction of smugglers. I have only to add, that I can assure the Noble Viscount I did not mean to misrepresent him in the speech which he delivered the other night. I did not intend to assert that the Noble Lord had said that the expenditure was increasing while the revenue, or the resources of the country, were actually diminishing; but that the disproportion between them was increasing, and that, comparatively, the expenditure was greater and the revenue less.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PAPERS, RETURNS, ACCOUNTS, &c.

Resolutions of the Court of Directors of the East India Company, being warrants or instruments granting any pension, salary, or gratuity. — Delivered (pursuant to Acts), and ordered to lie on the table.

List specifying the particulars of compensation proposed to be granted to certain persons lately in the service of the East India Company, under an arrangement sanctioned by the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India (No. 103.). — Delivered, and ordered to lie on the table.

Particulars of all compensations, superannuations, and allowances granted by the Court of Directors of the East India Company, and confirmed by the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India, between the 1st January and the 31st December, 1839 (under the authority of the Act of the 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 85. sect. 7.), to persons who have been employed by or under the East India Company, whose interests have been affected by the discontinuance of the said Company's trade, and who have been reduced.

—Delivered (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the table.

Return of all peerages of Ireland created since the Union, stating the peerages on the extinction or supposed extinction of which each new peerage has been created; and, also, of all other peerages of Ireland supposed to have become extinct during the same period.—Ordered to be laid before the House. (The Lord Redesdale.)

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House met, and forty Members not being present at four o'clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS, VENERIS, 21° DIE FEBRUARII, 1840.

The EARL of SHAFTESBURY sat Speaker.

House adjourned during pleasure, and resumed by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

CATHEDRAL AND COLLEGIATE ESTABLISHMENTS.

The BISHOP OF ELY presented a petition of the clergy of Bury Saint Edmunds and its neighbourhood, taking notice of a recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and praying that, in any measure to be introduced to Parliament on this subject, such alterations only may be made as shall carry out more efficaciously the intentions of the founders and benefactors. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

The BISHOP of ELY presented a petition of clergy of Bury Saint Edmunds and its neighbourhood, — praying that, in any measure upon this subject which may be introduced to Parliament, provision may be made for the salutary exercise of episcopal power, upholding, at the same time, the appellate jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Courts. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The MARQUESS of BUTE presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, — of heritors, feuars, merchants, and others of Largs: and of inhabitants of Dunscore; Cullen; Drainey; Boharm; Cupar, Fife; St. Cyrus; South Parish, Aberdeen; Muckairn; Urquhart; Duffas; Lochwinnoch; Glasgow; Gargunnock; Monquhitter; and Aberlom.— Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Copy of a despatch from Sir William Nicolay, of the 21st day of May, 1839, transmitting a memorial from sundry inhabitants of Mauritius, addressed to the Queen, praying the removal of restriction upon the introduction of free labourers from India and elsewhere: And, also,

Copy of a letter from Mr. Barclay, of the 20th day of September, 1839, inclosing documents relative to the feeling of the inhabitants of the Mauritius on the subject of the introduction of Indian labourers.

CHINA.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I wish to know from the Noble Viscount whether the papers relative to China will be laid on the table at an early period?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — They are in course of preparation, and will be produced as soon as they are ready.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I beg leave to put two questions to the Noble Viscount, which, if he is not now prepared to answer, he will perhaps answer on Monday next. The first is, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to accompany the papers relative to China with any message from the Crown which will open the whole course of policy recently pursued towards that country? The second question is, whether Her Majesty's Government have formed any arrangement with the East India Company fixing the proportion of charge, to each, of any intended expedition by this country and the East India Company against China?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — As to the first point, no message will be sent down: and as to the second, I will avail myself of the suggestion of the Noble Lord, and take time to consider of it.

THANKS TO THE INDIAN ARMY.

Moved by Viscount Melbourne, — "That in the third resolution of thanks voted by this House on the 4th of February, there be inserted, after the words, 'Major General Sir Willoughby Cotton, Knight Grand Cross of the most honourable Military Order of the Bath,' the following names: — Major General Sir Thomas Willshire, Knight Commander of the most honourable Military Order of the Bath; Major General Sir Joseph Thackwell, Knight Commander of the most honourable Military Order of the Bath; Major General Edward H. Simpson; Major General William Nott."— On question, resolved in the affirmative, nemine dissentiente.

Then it was moved, That in the fourth resolution of thanks voted by this House on the same day, there be inserted, after the word "Ghuznee," the following words: "and Khelat."—On question, resolved in the affirmative, nemine dissentiente.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — I wish to put a question connected with the subject of the war in India to the Noble Viscount. I believe that one of the motives of the expedition to the westward of the Indus was to prevent the threatened attack on Herat by the Persians. Now, I wish to know whether, since that, any intelligence has been recieved that the chief of Herat has come to an understanding with the Persian Government, and has rejected the protection and assistance proffered to him by the British Government?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. —No intelligence has been received to the extent indicated by the Noble Earl; but intelligence has arrived which is calculated to excite suspicion respecting the Government of Herat.

AFRICAN TRADE.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — I beg to state to your Lordships that I withdraw the notice of motion, which stands for Monday, relative to the inconvenience sustained by the British trade on the coast of Africa, as I find that the question is of a more extensive nature than I at first supposed. I shall give notice when I mean to bring it forward.

SOCIALISM, AND EMPLOYMENT OF THE POOR.

Mr. WAKLEY, on presenting two petitions from Finsbury, praying for inquiry into the plans of Mr. Robert Owen for a new modelling of society, said:—These petitioners are exceedingly discontented with the arrangements of the old world, and are very anxious to have a new one, regulated under a system that shall expose them to less of that inequality and injustice under which, as they conceive, so large a portion of society, as at present constituted, is suffering.

PRINTED PAPERS.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — I beg to give notice that on Thursday, the 5th of March, I will move to rescind the resolution for the sale of papers, and also certain of the resolutions of 1837 regarding the privileges of this House; and for the appointment of a Committee to superintend the publication of such papers as the House may direct, or the Committee may think it advisable to publish.

PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.

Mr. EWART. — Sir, I beg to give notice that on Thursday, 5th March, I will submit a motion to the House, the object of which will be, to effect the entire abolition of the punishment of death.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

Mr. SHAW. — Perhaps it may be convenient to the House that I should now state, very shortly, the substance of the amendments which it is my intention to propose in the Committee on the Irish Municipal Corporation Bill. Clause 6.— As to the insertion of the parliamentary franchise to freemen, to leave the provisions of the Irish Reform Act unaffected by this Bill. Clause 15. — As to power of the Crown to grant charters of incorporation; that such charters shall be granted on petition of the majority of those persons who would be qualified to be burgesses in respect of rating. Clause 32. — As to qualification of burgesses, that it shall be 10*l.*, ascertained by rating in, all boroughs to be incorporated; to substitute twelve for six months' occupation with reference to enrolment, and to omit clause 33., as to qualification of burgesses after three years. To insert clauses constituting the standing governors of the Bluecoat Hospital, Dublin, a body corporate. To provide for trusts producing profits to shareholders or proprietors for their own benefit. Clause 152. — As to the appointment of sheriffs, that they shall be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, as in counties at large. Clause 172. — As to granting licences for the sale of beer and spirits, to omit proviso giving jurisdiction to borough justices. Clause 208. — As to officers, compensation to provide for the cases of officers who have succeeded to pre-existing and necessary offices since 20th August, 1836, and to introduce the substance of the Treasury minute made in respect of English corporations, in the year 1835. And to insert clauses to provide for the efficient audit of the corporation accounts.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I will also take this opportunity to give notice, that in committee on the Irish Municipal Bill, I shall move an amendment for the purpose of making it optional with the inhabitants of boroughs to avail themselves of its provisions; and I shall likewise move the substitution of the 11th clause in the Bill of last year for the 23d clause in the Bill of this year.

NEW WRIT FOR PERTHSHIRE.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I beg to move "That the Speaker do issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to issue a new writ for the election of a commissioner, to serve in the present Parliament for the County of Perth, in the room of Lord Stormont, now Earl of Mansfield and Viscount Stormont, in the kingdom of Scotland."

Mr. PRINGLE. — That seems a very premature motion. I should wish to know whether it consists with the personal knowledge of the Honourable Member, that Lord Stormont has yet received his writ of summons to the House of Lords?

Mr. F. MAULE. — It does not consist with my own knowledge that Lord Stormont has received a writ of Summons to the House of Lords as Earl of Mansfield; but it does consist with my knowledge that that Noble Lord is now Viscount Stormont, in the kingdom of Scotland.

Mr. PRINGLE. — Is the Honourable Gentleman prepared to say that the Noble Viscount has been legally served in Scotland as Lord Stormont? The Honourable Gentleman should know that without proof of service the Noble Lord could not claim to sit as a Peer of Scotland.

Mr. F. MAULE. — What! does the Honourable Member mean to tell me——

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!"]

does he mean to say that proof of service upon the Noble Lord as Viscount Stormont is necessary in this case? I deny it altogether. By the death of the late Earl of Mansfield, Lord Stormont became, ipso facto, a Peer of Scotland; and, as such, by the articles of union, I contend that he could not, for a day longer, sit as a Member in this House for a Scotch county.

SIR W. FOLLETT. — I recollect, very well, that a similar case to this has occurred since I have had the honour to sit in Parliament, — I mean the case of the present Earl of Scarborough. A writ was moved for on the death of his Lordship's father; but, on some objection taken, it appeared either that no writ of summons had been issued, or that there was no proof of that fact, and the motion was withdrawn. This appears to me to be a similar case. Here is no proof that Lord Stormont has become either a Peer of Scotland or a Peer of England; and, until a Nobleman has received his writ of summons, it is not usual to move a new writ for a place which he represents, at the time, in this House.

Mr. F. MAULE. — I am sorry to interfere with so high an authority as the Honourable and Learned Gentleman; but I apprehend that Lord Stormont will receive no written summons whatever to take his seat in the House of Lords as a Peer of Scotland. He will take his seat in that capacity, there, without any summons. That is one reason for my motion; and the other is, that I know of no reason why so large a district as Perth should remain unrepresented.

[Much laughter.]

SIR J. GRAHAM. — The circumstances of this case are very clear. The Earl of Mansfield died on Tuesday last, and is yet unburied. A writ of summons has not yet issued, and Lord Stormont cannot take his seat as a Peer of the British Parliament, till he has received such writ of summons. That writ of summons can only issue on proof of the decease of the late Earl, and the present Lord's succession as legitimate heir; and the case stated by my Honourable and Learned Friend — the last case in which the question arose, that of the Earl of Scarborough — removes all doubt upon that ground. Unless, therefore, the Honourable Member be prepared to state, of his own knowledge, that the writ of summons has issued, the time has not yet arrived for moving this new writ. The Honourable Gentleman has called attention to the fact that the late Earl of Mansfield was not only a British Peer, but also a Peer of Scotland. I am clearly of opinion that, before the Viscount Stormont can succeed to his Scotch peerage, or before he can be served as heir to his father in that dignity, some proofs of his legitimate succession to that title are necessary. But I think, besides, that that proof ought to be produced in relation to the British peerage as well as to the Scottish; and the usual proof in this respect is the writ of summons. Viscount Stormont's father is still unburied, and no such proof has been yet adduced. The Honourable Gentleman who has moved this writ is not in a condition to state that the writ of summons has been issued, or that due service has been made upon the heir. On these grounds, then, as a matter, not of feeling, but of strict law and usage, I maintain that it is premature, now, to move for a new writ.

The LORD ADVOCATE. — It is perfectly clear that, with respect to the law of Scotland, no service is necessary to Lord Stormont's accession to the Scottish peerage, and that, on the death of the father, the son immediately becomes, of right, a Peer of Scotland. Service is altogether unnecessary; and the present Earl of Mansfield, as Viscount Stormont, becomes a Scotch Peer, independent of any service, and independent of any proof of legitimacy. There is no doubt whatever upon this point, so far as the law of Scotland is concerned; and, whatever decision the House may come to, it is right that they should be aware of this fact.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — I consider that the House has no evidence on the point upon which to act. In the case of an English peerage, the House requires to have evidence of the issue of the writ. But, as we are told that no service or no proof of legitimacy is required by the Scotch law, it is clear that the custom of the Scotch peerage offers no ground for the House to act upon, and no evidence on which the House ought to proceed; and we must, therefore, fall back on the law as to the English peerage. Before the House, therefore, consents to issue a new writ in this case, for Perthshire, it ought to have the evidence afforded by the writ of summons, of Lord Stormont's accession to his late father's dignity.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — It appears, from what has fallen from the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke, that the Earl of Mansfield is dead; and there is no doubt that Lord Stormont, the late Member for Perth, for so I must call him, is his eldest son and legitimate heir. But the House must consider the case as if the late Earl had only been Viscount Stormont, of the peerage of Scotland; they should dismiss from their minds the fact that he was Earl of Mansfield, also. Well, then, considering him only Viscount Stormont, there is no doubt that his eldest son and heir, now Viscount Stormont, being a Scotch Peer, is disqualified from sitting in the House of Commons. The seat, therefore, is vacant. There is no Member, now, for Perthshire.

Mr. GOULBURN. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has made an assumption first, and then, upon that assumption, he has proceeded to settle the whole case. There is no question about the son being heir to his father's title in this particular instance. If the principle laid down by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman were adopted, the House must be prepared to act upon it in every future case. The House has guarded against any error in the case of English Peers by requiring that a writ of summons, in any case of this nature, shall have issued before any vacancy be declared. I think, upon a case of this importance, where we are establishing a precedent to guide the franchise to freemen, to leave the provisions of the Irish Reform Act unaffected by this Bill. Clause 15. — As to power of the Crown to grant charters of incorporation; that such charters shall be granted on petition of the majority of those persons who would be qualified to be burgesses in respect of rating. Clause 32. — As to qualification of burgesses, that it shall be 10*l*., ascertained by rating in, all boroughs to be incorporated; to substitute twelve for six months' occupation with reference to enrolment, and to omit clause 33., as to qualification of burgesses after three years. To insert clauses constituting the standing governors of the Bluecoat Hospital, Dublin, a body corporate. To provide for trusts producing profits to shareholders or proprietors for their own benefit. Clause 152. — As to the appointment of sheriffs, that they shall be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, as in counties at large. Clause 172. — As to granting licences for the sale of beer and spirits, to omit proviso giving jurisdiction to borough justices. Clause 208. — As to officers, compensation to provide for the cases of officers who have succeeded to pre-existing and necessary offices since 20th August, 1836, and to introduce the substance of the Treasury minute made in respect of English corporations, in the year 1835. And to insert clauses to provide for the efficient audit of the corporation accounts.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I will also take this opportunity to give notice, that in committee on the Irish Municipal Bill, I shall move an amendment for the purpose of making it optional with the inhabitants of boroughs to avail themselves of its provisions; and I shall likewise move the substitution of the 11th clause in the Bill of last year for the 23d clause in the Bill of this year.

On these grounds, then, as a matter, not of feeling, but of strict law and usage, I maintain that it is premature, now, to move for a new writ.

The LORD ADVOCATE. — It is perfectly clear that, with respect to the law of Scotland, no service is necessary to Lord Stormont's accession to the Scottish peerage, and that, on the death of the father, the son immediately becomes, of right, a Peer of Scotland. Service is altogether unnecessary; and the present Earl of Mansfield, as Viscount Stormont, becomes a Scotch Peer, independent of any service, and independent of any proof of legitimacy. There is no doubt whatever upon this point, so far as the law of Scotland is concerned; and, whatever decision the House may come to, it is right that they should be aware of this fact.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — I consider that the House has no evidence on the point upon which to act. In the case of an English peerage, the House requires to have evidence of the issue of the writ. But, as we are told that no service or no proof of legitimacy is required by the Scotch law, it is clear that the custom of the Scotch peerage offers no ground for the House to act upon, and no evidence on which the House ought to proceed; and we must, therefore, fall back on the law as to the English peerage. Before the House, therefore, consents to issue a new writ in this case, for Perthshire, it ought to have the evidence afforded by the writ of summons, of Lord Stormont's accession to his late father's dignity.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — It appears, from what has fallen from the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke, that the Earl of Mansfield is dead; and there is no doubt that Lord Stormont, the late Member for Perth, for so I must call him, is his eldest son and legitimate heir. But the House must consider the case as if the late Earl had only been Viscount Stormont, of the peerage of Scotland; they should dismiss from their minds the fact that he was Earl of Mansfield, also. Well, then, considering him only Viscount Stormont, there is no doubt that his eldest son and heir, now Viscount Stormont, being a Scotch Peer, is disqualified from sitting in the House of Commons. The seat, therefore, is vacant. There is no Member, now, for Perthshire.

Mr. GOULBURN. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has made an assumption first, and then, upon that assumption, he has proceeded to settle the whole case. There is no question about the son being heir to his father's title in this particular instance. If the principle laid down by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman were adopted, the House must be prepared to act upon it in every future case. The House has guarded against any error in the case of English Peers by requiring that a writ of summons, in any case of this nature, shall have issued before any vacancy be declared. I think, upon a case of this importance, where we are establishing a precedent to guide the House hereafter, it would be inexpedient that we should come to a hasty decision. In all these cases, it is desirable that precedents should be examined, and I shall therefore move that the debate be adjourned to Monday next.

Mr. F. MAULE. — I shall certainly oppose that motion, and for this reason, that the House has just now had the opinion of the Lord Advocate, most distinctly delivered, upon a point of Scotch law, as applicable to the present case. That opinion is, that, by the law of Scotland, Lord Stormont is now a Scotch Peer; and, by the Act of Union, he can no longer be a Member of this House; if he should any longer exercise his privilege as Member for Perthshire, he would subject himself to a very heavy penalty. Under those considerations, then, — and feeling that it would not be fair that this great county should be without its voice in this House at this particular crisis of the country,— I shall persist in my motion that the writ be issued.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I will most decidedly support the motion for an adjournment. The position of a Scotch Peer, in my opinion, very much resembles that of an Irish Peer sitting for an Irish constituency, and inheriting a title from his father. In that case he is disqualified from sitting, not in the House of Commons generally, but for any Irish constituency. Now, as we are about to constitute a precedent, it is important to ascertain the course pursued on such a vacancy taking place, — whether the Speaker issues his writ immediately, if the case have occurred during the recess, or waits until some evidence has been laid before the House on its re-assembling. The House should remember that they may establish, now, a precedent, not only for Scotland, but for Ireland. There was no representative for Perth yesterday, or the day before; but it was not thought necessary, on the death of the late Earl of Mansfield being known, that a race should be run in order to move the writ. The proposal of my Right Honourable Friend is not that we should suspend the writ indefinitely, but that the debate should be adjourned until Monday next, in order that we may have time to consider what the precedents are. If the precedents are in favour of this course of proceeding, let the writ be issued on Monday next; but before the point is decided upon, is it not decent, at least, to have the opportunity of eight-and-forty hours' consideration, before we establish an important precedent, which is to govern our proceedings, in future, under similar circumstances?

Mr. ROBERT STEUART. — I deny that the present case is analogous to that of an Irish Peer. The difference is, that an Irish Peer is not prohibited from sitting in the House of Commons, because he may sit for an English constituency; whereas a Scotch Peer cannot sit in the House of Commons at all. When it is so notorious that Lord Stormont is now the Earl of Mansfield in England, and Viscount Stormont in Scotland, I think that I am entitled to assume that there is something more on the other side than a mere wish to prevent a precedent being established.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

It being admitted that the Earl of Mansfield is dead, and that his son is a Scotch Peer, and the law being that no Scotch Peer shall sit in the House of Commons, I will say that the House has a right to suppose that there is something yet undisclosed which has induced Honourable Members on the other side to come forward and endeavour to prevent the writ's being issued.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I will inform the Honourable Member for Haddington on what ground I oppose this motion. I have been a Member of this House for some years, and I remember that when Lord Berkeley died, a motion was brought forward by some Honourable Gentlemen who now occupy the other side of the House, that Lord Dursley should vacate his seat as Member for Gloucester, because he had become Earl of Berkeley. That motion was opposed on the same ground that the present motion is opposed, — namely, that there was no evidence of the fact before the House. The writ for Gloucestershire was issued, however, on the ground that Lord Dursley had become Earl of Berkeley; but the House of Lords afterwards came to a different conclusion. With the recollection then, of the circumstances of that case in my mind, I wish to be cautious of acting upon my own judgment without some proof of the fact in dispute, and some evidence as regards the case before the House.

Mr. SHAW. — I think I can mention a case in point. On the death of Lord Farnham, Mr. Henry Maxwell, who represented the county of Cavan, succeeded to the title; and although Lord Farnham had died during the recess, the vacancy was not declared, nor did a new writ issue until the meeting of Parliament; because, as no writ of summons is ever issued to an Irish Peer, the Speaker had no official information on the subject until the meeting of Parliament.

SIR R. H. INGLIS.—I wish to call the attention of the House to the particulars of the case which has been alluded to by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, and which, I think, bears very strongly upon the present case. Here is, in this volume of our Journals, an account of the proceedings in this House on the 10th of January, 1811, on the motion that a new writ should issue for Gloucestershire, in the room of Lord Dursley, who had succeeded to the title of Earl of Berkeley. The Speaker, on that occasion, it appears, did issue his writ; but it turned out, afterwards, that the allegation on which he had proceeded in so doing was incorrect, as the other House of Parliament came to a solemn decision that the gentleman in question was not Earl of Berkeley. But before the House decided, on that occasion, an adjournment was agreed to; and that is all that is asked for, now. I think it is impossible for any Gentleman to state, as a fact within his own knowledge, that Viscount Stormont, by courtesy, is now a Scotch Peer. I therefore think that the House is bound to adjourn the consideration of this subject until an opportunity shall have been afforded of considering the subject.

Mr. HUME.—I feel bound to ask, after the observation of the Honourable Baronet, whether he means to state to the House that there are any doubts as to the legitimacy of Lord Stormont?

SIR R. INGLIS. — I most cautiously abstained from making any reference to the grounds of the decision which I alluded to in the case of Lord Dursley.

Mr. HUME. — The points of that decision are known to every one; and therefore I was justified in asking the question. It was because the Honourable Baronet had not stated what were the grounds of his own opposition to the motion, that I thought it was fit the House should know them.

SIR W. FOLLETT. — I can assure Honourable Gentlemen opposite, who have attributed motives to those who sit on this side of the House in this matter, that I, for my part, am totally ignorant of the local politics of Perthshire. My only object is, that the House should proceed according to precedent, and in a regular manner. I will not condescend to advert to the observation of the Honourable Gentleman, as to whether Viscount Stormont will, or will not, come to the titles of Earl of Mansfield in England and Viscount Stormont in Scotland, as I do not conceive that any one can have the slightest doubt upon that matter. The only question, then, is, whether the House ought not to proceed in the case in the usual, ordinary, and proper course? It has been said that there is no doubt whatever that Viscount Stormont, a Member of this House, has become Viscount Stormont of the peerage of Scotland, and Earl of Mansfield in that of England, and that therefore a new writ for the county represented by him should be moved for immediately. In the case of the Earl of Scarborough, which has been adverted to, there was no doubt of Lord Lumley succeeding to that title; but when a new writ was moved for the county of Nottingham, on the ground that Lord Lumley had been called up to the House of Peers, the Speaker stopped the motion by asking whether that Noble Lord had received a writ of summons; and after some discussion, the same course was taken as has been proposed in the present case by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, — I mean, that the debate was adjourned, and the subject was postponed until the claim had been duly ascertained. This was the case of an English Peer, and no one entertained the slightest doubt as to the death of his father. The Learned Lord Advocate has said, that at the death of a Scotch Peer, his eldest son immediately becomes a Scotch Peer, and is fully possessed of all his privileges; and that, in this respect, the case is not the same as it would be with respect to succession to an English peerage. But in the case of any Member of this House succeeding to an English peerage, this House does not issue a new writ until it is in possession of some proof of the fact of such Member's having become a Peer. I will not pretend to dispute the law of Scotland in the face of the Lord Advocate; but I still think that the House should be guided in this matter by precedent, and that they should pursue the usual course on such occasions, and not issue the new writ until an opportunity has been first afforded of making inquiries. I believe that a Scotch Peer cannot vote for the election of a representative Peer, or perform any of his functions as a Peer, until he has been by a jury first served as heir to the title. But can the Learned Lord, or any other Honourable Gentleman opposite, show a precedent of a writ having been issued immediately on the death of a Scotch Peer, whose heir has represented some Scotch borough or county? If they are not prepared to state any case of the kind, is it not better to pursue the ordinary course, and adjourn the debate? and I am sure that none of my Right Honourable Friends around me have had any other motive for taking the line they have done, but to induce the House to proceed with due deliberation. I trust, therefore, that the House will consent to act in this case as it has done in all similar cases of the kind.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I wish to draw the attention of the House to this fact. No Honourable Gentleman opposite has denied that Lord Stormont is now a Scotch Peer, and that a representative of this House is bound to attend and do his duty; and were Lord Stormont to attend and do his duty in this House, from that moment he would subject himself to a penalty under the provisions of the Act of Union, and of the Scotch Reform Act. I therefore think that so important a county should not be left without a representative.

Mr. J. JONES. — There can be no doubt that if the Noble Lord had merely succeeded to the earldom of Mansfield in the English peerage, something more than mere assertion would be required, before the House proceeded to issue a new writ; and I cannot conceive why the necessity for such a course is not equally strong as regards the Scotch peerage. For instance, — take a case which has recently been much before the public, where a person of the name of Alexander claimed the Scotch title of Earl of Stirling. Suppose that the eldest son of that gentleman had been a Member of this House, would the House proceed to issue a new writ merely on the allegation of any Honourable Gentleman, that that Member had succeeded to the peerage of Scotland? I therefore contend that in this case a new writ should not be issued until the House has been furnished with some proof in the matter. I believe that, before a Scotch Peer can exercise any functions, it is necessary immediately to serve him by a jury as heir of his father.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I do not think that the Honourable and Learned Member for Exeter has shown that, by a postponement till Monday, the House would be in possession of more facts connected with this case than they are now. The Honourable Member, himself, stated that there could be no doubt that Lord Stormont, who has been the representative of Perthshire, is now Viscount Stormont in the kingdom of Scotland. If, therefore, Gentlemen opposite wish to wait for a new writ until they can get a candidate for Perthshire, let them say so at once.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!"]

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It appears to me that there can be no doubt that the House is bound to issue a new writ for a place, if the person representing it is not able to sit and serve in this House. It is usual in cases of this kind, that the Member who moves for the writ should state that he himself is cognisant of the case. There are several recent cases of this kind; for instance, in moving for a new writ for Ludlow, in the room of Lord Clive, who had become Earl of Powis; in the case of Lord Ramsey, for Haddingtonshire, who had become Earl of Dalhousie; in the case of Lord Lovaine, who had become Earl of Beverley. The question, here, was, as to whether the House was satisfied with the statement of the Honourable Members who moved for the writs. If any Honourable Gentleman will say that the Noble Lord has not become a Peer, and that he is not Viscount Stormont in the peerage of Scotland, and Earl of Mansfield in that of England, and that he is still able to do his duty in this House, then it would be against all former practice and precedent to issue the writ; but having heard no such statement made, and believing that the Noble Lord has become a Peer of Scotland, I shall vote for the motion. My Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Lord Advacate is well acquainted with the law of Scotland, and he has declared that there is no doubt as to the matter; and, as no case to the contrary has been quoted on the opposite side, I think that there is no valid objection to our at once issuing the writ. With respect to the case of Colonel Berkeley, then called Lord Dursley, who, it was alleged, had become Earl Berkeley, a new writ was issued for Gloucestershire. I am sure that if, in a case of this kind, the House were to hesitate to issue a writ, very great difficulty might arise from its hesitation. I do not think that the House would say, in case there was any doubt on the matter, and if for two years or more it were disputed as to whether or not Viscount Stormont possessed the right of succession to the peerage; that therefore, for that time, the county of Perth should remain without a representative. If a case of this description were to arise, it would require great deliberation before the House could proceed to act, but not so, in a case where there is no doubt at all. When the writ was moved in the room of Lord Ramsey, on his becoming, by succession, Earl of Dalhousie, if it had been opposed, the seat for East Lothian might have been kept vacant for a long time. That also was the case of a Scotch Peer, and the writ was moved for without delay. I therefore think, on these grounds, that, in issuing the writ, we are only conforming to the usual practice. I shall therefore vote for the motion.

SIR WILLIAM RAE. — In my opinion there can be no doubt as to the Noble Lord having succeeded to the titles of Earl of Mansfield in England and Viscount Stormont in Scotland; but the House has not yet become cognisant of the matter in the proper form. There is no question, in this case, as to the right of succession, any more than in those of the Earl of Scarborough and the Earl of Beverley, and it was not denied that they were the legitimate heirs to those titles. I do not deny that a person could assume the title of a Peer immediately on the death of the previous holder of it; but he could not exercise any of the rights of the peerage until he had proved that he was the legitimate heir to it. This is the case in Scotland as well as England, and the successor to the title, in Scotland, cannot touch one single portion of the property connected with the peerage until he has been served by a jury as legitimate heir to his father; and this is also the case with respect to his right of voting in the election of the sixteen representative Peers of Scotland. It is the usual course, when the eldest son of a Scotch Peer succeeds to the title, to prove, immediately, that he has been served heir to his father.

The LORD ADVOCATE. — I contend that, immediately on the death of a Scotch Peer, his eldest son unqualifiedly becomes a Peer of Scotland, and no proceedings are necessary to give him all the rights of his station. It might be only after the lapse of several years, before it would become necessary for him to serve himself as heir to his father. If we were to wait, in every case, until the House had legal knowledge of the possession of a title, and that a Member had become a Peer, it would often be almost impossible to fill up a vacancy. If the House is satisfied that the Noble Lord has vacated his seat, in this case, by succeeding to a Scotch peerage, the course proposed by my Honourable Friend is, undoubtedly, the just one.

SIR G. CLERK. — It is perfectly true that, prior to 1811, it was the custom to move for a new writ, on a Member succeeding to the peerage, merely on the declaration of any Honourable Member. When, however, the House was guilty of the blunder of ordering a new writ for Gloucestershire in the place of Viscount Dursley, who, it was alleged, had become Earl of Berkeley, it was found expedient to abstain from doing so for the future until the writ of summons should have been issued from the other House. There is one case which has reference to the subject, and which has not been alluded to. When the present Earl of Wemyss succeeded his grandfather in the peerage, his eldest son, who was Member for the Haddington boroughs, became Lord Elcho. The House is aware that, previous to the Scotch Reform Act, the eldest son of a Scotch Peer could not represent a place in Scotland. The consequence was, that a new writ was moved for, to fill the vacancy created by Lord Elcho, who had become the eldest son of a Scotch Peer. Before, however, this was done, the House took time to have the matter inquired into. Again, in the case of the present Earl of Beverley, there was no doubt that Lord Lovaine, who was then Member for Beeralston, was, as the eldest son, the successor of his father. When a new writ was moved for that place, on the death of the then Earl of Beverley, it was objected that the House had not sufficient cognisance of the matter. That Noble Lord was then at Nice, and the House refused to issue a new writ until it had had some communication with him. I do not think that there is the slightest difficulty in this matter; and if the House is determined to adhere to all its former practice, it ought to consent to adjourn the debate on this subject.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I take the rule to be this,—that on the eldest son of a British Peer succeeding to the peerage on the death of his father, the House requires evidence of that fact, which is generally furnished by the writ of summons. It might be desirable that the House should have some evidence as to what is done on Members succeeding to Scotch or Irish peerages, if any one could say that the present proceeding is contrary to the practice which has been described by the Learned Lord Advocate, who has not been answered by Gentlemen opposite, nor have they shown that it is the practice of the House to require evidence of the death of a Scotch or Irish Peer on a Member of this House succeeding to a Scotch or Irish peerage. It appears to me that, if any such practice has existed, it is hardly possible that Honourable Gentlemen opposite should not have been aware of it, and that instances of it would be brought before the House. I have heard nothing to show that the practice has existed from the Right Honourable Baronet who was formerly Lord Advocate, or from any other Gentleman opposite. The Right Honourable Member for the University of Dublin has stated a case of succession to an Irish peerage, which, I think, rather bore against the argument taken by Gentlemen opposite. It is the duty of the House to adhere to the practice which has hitherto been followed in this matter, which certainly appears to me to be, to issue a writ on a case of this kind occurring. We have had no evidence that it is necessary to show that, in a case like the present, a Scotch or Irish peerage has been inherited; I have, after some doubt, made up my mind to vote against the adjournment of the debate.

LORD STANLEY. — It appears to me that the reasons given by my Noble Friend who spoke last, are such as ought rather to induce him to vote for, than against, postponement. All that the opponents of the motion have asked is, that the question should stand over till the next day the House meets, in order to ascertain what the rule is with respect to Scotch and Irish peerages. Every one is aware that the House, in the case of succession of a Member of this House to an English peerage, requires technical proof that a vacancy has occurred. Now, with respect to the present case, it appears that we do not really know what the practice is, and we ask for time to discover it. We do not know whether any proofs of preliminary proceedings are necessary or not in the case of a Scottish peerage; and I must say that it is rather too much of the Noble Lord opposite to require that we should have at our fingers' ends every case upon the subject, when no one on this side of the House could have had the least idea that such a question would be mooted to-night. It could never have been supposed, by us, that, within three days of the death of Lord Mansfield, such a motion would be made in the House of Commons. It is a proceeding hitherto unheard of. The recentness of the event might be some apology for those who have asked for adjournment, not being prepared with precedents; but it is that very circumstance which renders it so exceedingly inexpedient to adopt the motion. If the Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Home Department had brought forward precedents, showing the practice to be such as justified his motion, then he should at once have my vote. If the precedents and practice are in favour of the motion, it will not be opposed; but, on the other hand, if the motion is forced forward in this manner, we shall feel ourselves warranted in pressing the amendment. We are entitled to be made acquainted with the sound and solid grounds upon which we are to be called on to issue this writ, contrary to the practice as regards English peerages; and I must say that the rejection of the amendment will go to establish a most inconvenient precedent.

The House then divided: — Ayes 165, Noes 136; Majority 29.

The motion was then agreed to, and a new writ was ordered to be issued.

INVERNESS BURGHS.

On the motion of Mr. E. J. STANLEY, a new writ was ordered to be issued for the Inverness district of burghs, in the room of Mr. R. Macleod, who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

LEGACY DUTIES.

Mr. HUME moved for a Return showing the amount of capital on which the several rates of legacy duty have been paid in Great Britain and Ireland in the year 1839, distinguishing the amount of each rate paid in that year (in continuation of parliamentary paper No. 226. of 1839), with an abstract of the total amount under each rate since 1797: Also, For a Return of the total amount of revenue received in the Uunited Kingdom in the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840, for stamp duty on legacies (distinguishing those on direct and on reversionary bequests, if possible), on probates, administrations, and testamentary inventories; distinguishing the amount from England and Wales, Scotland, and Ireland (in continuation of parliamentary paper, No. 226. of 1839), with an abstract of the whole amount of duty received since 1797.

Agreed to.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I move that the dropped orders of yesterday be now proceeded with.

The dropped orders of Thursday were then proceeded with.

CASE OF FROST, WILLIAMS, AND JONES.

Mr. Leader fixed for Tuesday next, his motion on the petitions from Frost, and from Glasgow and other places, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased, under the special circumstances of the case, to grant a free pardon to Frost, Williams, and Jones.

The other dropped notices were then postponed.

AFFAIRS OF TURKEY.

SIR R. PEEL. — Before the House goes into a Committee of Supply upon the navy estimates, I wish to put a question to the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. It refers to a paragraph in the speech delivered by Her Majesty at the commencement of the present Session, which was to the following effect: —

> The affairs of the Levant have continued to occupy my most anxious attention. The concord which has prevailed amongst the five powers has prevented a renewal of hostilities in that quarter; and I hope that the same unanimity will bring these important and difficult matters to a final settlement, in such a manner as to uphold the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, and to give additional security to the peace of Europe.

Now, I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether the proper construction of this passage is, that the five powers are unanimous in the principle that the integrity and independence of the Ottomon empire should constitute the basis of the settlement? I will again read the latter part of the paragraph to which I wish particularly to call the Noble Lord's attention: —

> I hope that the same unanimity will bring these important and difficult matters to a final settlement, in such a manner as to uphold the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, and to give additional security to the peace of Europe.

I wish to know if the construction I am to put upon that paragraph is, that the five powers are unanimous in making the integrity as well as the independence of the Ottoman empire the basis of the settlement; and if I am right in that construction, I wish to ask whether that unanimity still continues, and whether there is any prospect that the affairs of the Levant will be speedily brought to a final settlement?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — The passage to which the Right Honourable Baronet has alluded expressed a hope that the five powers would be unanimous in bringing about a settlement, founded on the basis of preserving the independence and integrity of the Ottoman empire, as they had been unanimous in preserving peace in that quarter. The hope was founded, first, on the opinion entertained of the subject by Her Majesty's Government; secondly, on the opinion expressed on the subject in the speech of the King of the French at the opening of the Session, in which the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire were specially mentioned; and, thirdly, on the knowledge possessed by Her Majesty's Government of the opinions of the other three powers. With respect to the remaining part of the question, I can only say that these matters are, at present, the subject of negotiations between the five powers, and I am sure the Right Honourable Baronet would be the last person to wish me to enter into premature explanations and details as to the particular position in which negotiations of such magnitude and importance may happen to stand.

SIR R. PEEL. — I wish to put another question to the Noble Lord, which is, whether there is any—and what—prospect of these affairs being brought to a settlement at an early period?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — It would be impossible for us to anticipate the period; I can only say that the subject occupies the most anxious attention of Her Majesty's Government. We are in communication with the other four powers on the subject, and I believe they are all impressed with the great importance of bringing this question to a final settlement at as early a period as is compatible with its complicated nature.

THE MEDITERRANEAN FLEET.

CAPTAIN FRANCIS BERKELEY. — I wish to inquire from the Secretary to the Admiralty, whether the ships in the Mediterranean have a full war or a peace complement of men?

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — The Mediterranean fleet is not upon a war complement, but upon an increased peace establishment.

CLAIMS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ON PORTUGAL.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I move the Order of the Day for the House going into Committee of Supply.

Upon this question being put, —

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON said: — Before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I wish to call its attention to the claims of a number of our fellow countrymen on the Government of Portugal. I shall be, perhaps, excused for pressing this subject on the attention of Her Majesty's Government, on account of the length of time during which these claims have remained unsatisfied, and on account of what I trust will be the unanimous opinion of the House upon the question. As, on a former occasion, I brought this subject forward in detail, I think that the House are aware of the nature of those claims. The House will remember that, in 1832, several of our fellow countrymen were induced to enter into the service of Don Pedro, the Emperor of Brazil, and then a claimant for the throne of Portugal. The claims of these men were recognised not only by the Government, but also by the Cortes of Portugal, and by every successive administration which has since existed in that country, who contented themselves with praising, but at the same time starving, these unfortunate men. There can be no doubt that it was the bravery of these men that achieved success for the cause in which they were engaged, and that placed Don Pedro on the throne of his ancestors. When these services were performed, — when the enemy had disappeared from the field, — the Portuguese Government denied these gallant men the rewards to which they were entitled. It is unnecessary to mention to the House that those gallant men enlisted exactly on the same terms as the marines who served under Admiral Sartorius, at that time engaged in the service of Don Pedro. As soon as their gallantry had accomplished all that had been required by those in whose service they were engaged, then attempts were made to sow divisions among the British auxiliaries. A new proposition was put to them, that they should surrender the advantageous terms upon which they enlisted, and accept new ones instead of the original conditions. If these conditions had been left to the option of the auxiliaries, of course no objection could be made to them. But such was not the case. When these conditions were submitted to them, those who objected to accept them, and to abandon the original conditions, were treated with the greatest ignominy and cruelty. They were treated as common felons, confined in loathsome dungeons, reduced to utter nakedness, and left destitute of every means of support. When I had read the particulars of the treatment of these men, though by no means wishing to make it a party question, or to impeach the conduct of any one, I could not help inquiring what were her Majesty's Government about at the time? What were they about when hundreds of their fellow subjects were rotting in dungeons? Having alluded to the torments inflicted upon those who refused to serve upon the new conditions proposed by the Portuguese Government, I will now refer to the case of those who did not object to them, but who passively submitted without rejection or acquiescence. Their sufferings were not equal to those of the former class; but they were defrauded: no payment was made of their stipulated pay from the beginning of January, 1834, till September, 1835; and when a settlement was proposed, every fraud and evasion which could be employed were used to withhold their pay from these brave officers and soldiers, and not one shilling would be given them unless they brought a receipt in full. They were told, "Take this, whatever it is, or you will not get any." They were compelled to accept these terms, not having been supported by the British Government as they should be. For two years of valuable service they have not, to this day, received any remuneration whatever. Commissioners were, from time to time, appointed for the obvious purpose of delaying and defrauding these unfortunate men. Since 1835 these unhappy persons have been wandering through the streets of Lisbon supplicating for their own — some perishing for want, others destroying themselves in despair, while the rest remain defrauded. In August, 1839, the Noble Viscount opposite, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, engaged that a peremptory demand should be made upon the Government of Portugal, and, in default of a satisfactory settlement being made, he said a Commission would be formed similar to what had been established in the case of Spain — namely, one commissioner on the part of the claimants, another on the part of the Portuguese Government, and a third to be appointed by the Government of this country. The demand for such a Commission has accordingly been made; but hitherto it has proved to be abortive. At length it was intimated that if no attention were paid to these demands, the Government of this country would take the matter into its own hands, and appoint a Commission of its own, and would take means to obtain a peremptory settlement of their claims. This intelligence diffused joy among those unhappy men, and an anticipation of the fulfilment of their hopes. By the Portuguese official Gazette it appears that the application has been made by the Noble Viscount. That communication, however, has been disregarded by the Minister for Foreign Affairs in Portugal. The Noble Viscount proceeded again in a more peremptory tone than before, and gave instructions to Lord Howard de Walden to request the Portuguese Government to appoint the Commission for inquiring and deciding upon the claims of the auxiliary British subjects who had served as officers and privates in the war of the restoration; and to state that, in the event of such Commission not being nominated on the part of Portugal, the Government of England would appoint a Commission, and enforce from Portugal full satisfaction of the demand. That application was neglected, and another was made on the 9th of November last, but no redress from that day to the present has been obtained. The only change in the circumstances has been this — that a change of Government in Portugal has taken place, and that the present Minister of Foreign Affairs is a still more decided opponent to these claims than the former one. It is true that two Commissions have been sitting, nominally for the purpose of inquiring into those claims; but to show how inefficient they have been, I need only state that the second Commission, which has sat, now, for three years, has decided only on one claim, and that was an amount of 40*l.* An English officer sat on one of these Commissions, but he acknowledged to his countrymen that he could not assist them. I ask nothing extraordinary in this case, but only that Her Majesty's Government should carry out their own stated intentions of enforcing on Portugal that course which, in similar circumstances, has been pursued with regard to the Court of Spain. We hear nothing of French claims, or Belgian claims, or American claims; it has happened in this, as in all other cases, that the claims of other countries have obtained satisfaction while those of Great Britain remain unsatisfied; and in this instance the country which withholds satisfaction from British subjects is one which owes everything to British assistance. I have no personal concern whatever in this question; it has accidentally fallen under my notice; but, having perused the documents relating to it, I am determined that so just a cause shall not fail for want of an advocate. I will now, Sir, conclude by moving, as an amendment, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words, "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be pleased to appoint a Commission, to sit in London, forthwith, for the purpose of investigating the claims of British subjects upon the Crown of Portugal for civil and military services rendered to that power; and that Her Majesty will be pleased to take speedy and efficient measures with the Government of that country for procuring an immediate settlement of the claims so to be established," instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — I beg to second the motion.

Question proposed,—" That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I can assure the House that I am very much disposed to agree with the Noble Lord who has just sat down in a great part of what that Noble Lord has said with respect to the conduct of the Portuguese Government towards those parties in whose behalf he has just addressed the House. Undoubtedly the conduct of the successive Administrations of Portugal towards men to whom the Queen of that country is so deeply indebted, is entirely deserving of reprobation; but the Noble Lord is mistaken in supposing that Her Majesty's Government have been less urgent in their applications to the present than in those which they addressed to the former Administrations of Portugal, for the purpose of procuring the concurrence of the Portuguese Government in the appointment of a Commission which should sit in London. It is true that when the present Portuguese Ministry first came into office, and professed a sincere desire to do justice to the claims of British subjects, it did appear to Her Majesty's Government to be fitting and becoming to give that Ministry an opportunity of taking a short time to make the necessary arrangements to carry its good intentions into effect. But when it appeared that, whatever might be the inclination of the Government, results did not follow in as prompt and satisfactory a manner as we were entitled to expect, the Government of this country addressed to the Portuguese Minister the communication which has been mentioned by the Noble Lord opposite. An answer to that communication is now daily expected. The Portuguese Government have been told that the Government of this country cannot or do not expect justice from any Commission sitting in Lisbon, and that no arrangement will be satisfactory but the appointment of a Commission which is to sit in London; and the Portuguese Government has also been told by that communication, that if it will not concur in the appointment of such a Commission, the British Government will do that which the Noble Lord opposite proposes to effect by an Address to Her Majesty; — that is, Government will advise Her Majesty to appoint a Commission composed entirely of British subjects, for the purpose of investigating these claims; and further, whatever amount those Commissioners shall determine to be due on account of these claims, Her Majesty's Government will demand from the Government of Portugal. I think I have now exculpated myself with respect to the charge that Her Majesty's Government have been less pressing with the present Portugese Ministers than they were with former Administrations, on the subject of these claims. I have only further to say, in answer to the Noble Lord's question, why we have unsatisfied claims against Portugal, while we have had none against France, Belgium, or the United States ——

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I beg leave to explain. I have been misunderstood. What I said was, that claims made on Portugal by other countries — such as France, Belgium, or the United States — were attended to, while those of Great Britain were neglected.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I beg pardon for having misunderstood the Noble Lord. I believe there was a Belgian corps which was paid and sent home, because the Portuguese Government were very anxious to get rid of them; but what I at first understood the Noble Viscount opposite to say was, that this country had not met from Portugal the same justice that it had experienced from other powers; and, under this impression, I was going to say that the difference to which I supposed the Noble Lord to advert arose from the fact, that Portugal was still suffering under that demoralisation which is the consequence of a bad Government; but that when a constitutional and representative system of Government shall have been established in Portugal as long as it has now been in France and in the United States, we may look for a very different state of things. I would suggest to the Noble Viscount the expediency of postponing his motion for the present, since it is possible that the Portuguese Government may agree to the proposition which has been made to it on the part of this country, and then the Noble Lord's motion would fall to the ground.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE. — I very much regret having coming down to the House without having perused the papers now on the table. I am consequently unacquainted with all the circumstances connected with these claims; but I know that some British subjects who have served in Portugal have been driven by the injustice of the Portuguese Government to acts of mutiny, and have then been punished for those acts by being treated like galley slaves. It is quite notorious that British subjects brought about the restoration of the present dynasty to the throne of Portugal, and that to their resolution and discipline the present Queen of Portugal owes her crown. Nevertheless, when those men put forth their just claims, they met with such treatment as drove them to acts of mutiny; and is it possible to conceive that the representative of the English Government at Lisbon could see these persons chained together and forced to clear all kinds of filth from the streets, because they pressed for a settlement of their just demands, without making representations on the subject to the Portuguese Government? The Noble Viscount the Secretary for Foreign Affairs has fairly stated the case so far as regards the interference of the British Government; but the Noble Viscount has not satisfactorily shown how it is, that, for five years, those men have not been able to obtain a satisfaction of their claims. That appears to be the pinching part of the question. I do not know all the facts of the case; but, in general, I disapprove of men enlisting for pay in the service of a foreign state without the consent of their own Government, and I think that such a proceeding should be discouraged, and not encouraged; still, when British subjects are exposed to such infamous and shameful treatment as they appear to have suffered in this case, in the public streets of Lisbon, I cannot but think that it shows a want of energy on the part of those who represent Her Majesty's Government at that court.

Mr. HUME. — I think that there is no man who has heard the statements of our countrymen, but must feel convinced that the Government of Portugal has been guilty of the blackest ingratitude towards them. At the same time, the question arises, in what way the British Government have sanctioned the services of these individuals to the Queen of Portugal? If any sanction has been given by the Government, the Government ought long ago to have required satisfaction from Portugal; but if these men engaged themselves without the knowledge or sanction of Government, they have no right to call upon Government for assistance in the prosecution of their claims. I should be glad, therefore, to hear the Noble Viscount explain the exact situation in which they are placed.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I cannot agree with my Honourable Friend in thinking that the Portuguese Government has any right to canvass the question of whether or not these men entered the service of Portugal with the consent of their own Government. It is not for the Portuguese Government to canvass whether they were right or wrong in giving their services: it has taken advantage of their services, of their military prowess, and their inherent valour; and the exertions of these brave men have been attended with complete success. Nothing can be plainer than the case between them and the Portuguese Government. It was through their means that the ally of this country, the Queen of Portugal, was placed on her throne; and if it were not for them, she would now be an outcast from her country, and a dependant upon the bounty of some other power; and for the Portuguese Government, after all this, to hesitate about paying them, is most monstrous; and no British Government would or could be justified in allowing such an indignity to be offered to those men, or such a shameless robbery to be committed upon them. I shall not object to the motion being postponed; but I hope it will be but for a very short period. As long as we pray, and as long as we entreat the Portuguese Government, that Government will never do anything; it will not pay until we tell it that it shall pay. A peremptory tone should be adopted with a Government that could have the baseness and the meanness to act in the way that the Government of Portugal has done. The additional disgrace should then be imposed upon it of compelling it, however unwilling it may be, to make full and satisfactory compensation.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — Sir, in reply to the question of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, I beg to state that, undoubtedly, those who took part in the Portuguese war had not the sanction of Her Majesty's Government, like those who went into the Spanish service; yet there can be no doubt that there was an obligation imposed upon the Portuguese Government to pay them; and, under the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government have a right to see that they be paid. The Right Honourable and Gallant Member opposite has said that Her Majesty's minister at Lisbon did not interpose when the men in the service of the Portuguese Government were treated in the manner he has described. The fact is, that Her Majesty's minister did make as strong representations as he could, with respect to persons who were at the time in the military service of a foreign power, and which representations, moreover, were attended with satisfactory results.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE. — I must repeat that there can be no doubt that a number of British soldiers were put in chains, and employed in all the dirty offices in the streets of Lisbon. The Portuguese themselves — those who had been witnesses to what had been done by the British in the peninsular campaigns — were shocked and disgusted at such an exhibition. The representations, if made by a British minister, must have been very tardy, because the men were made to do this for several weeks. If representations were made by Her Majesty's Government, they were not attended with success, as for a long period these unfortunate men were half starved, were paraded about the streets, and treated as the scavengers of Lisbon.

LORD SANDON. — Sir, in consequence of what has fallen from the Noble Lord opposite, I will consent to suspend my motion, but I only suspend it. I do not hope anything in such a case as this from generosity; I do not hope anything from justice; but I do, from compulsion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

POSTAGE OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the transmission by post of the Votes and Proceedings of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to a question put to him by the Right Honourable Member for the University of Cambridge, stated, on a former evening, that the Votes and Proceedings of the House would go, free, to any part of the empire and of the colonies. The complaint which I have to make is, that, in granting a boon, he has, in reality, only granted half a boon. I have to complain of the inconvenience to which Members are subjected, in order to obtain stamps; for these Votes and Proceedings cannot be sent free unless they are sent from the House, and Members are thus subjected to the trouble of coming down to the House in order to send off their papers. I wish to ask the Secretary for the Treasury whether it is likely that any remedy to this evil will be afforded? If not, I will give notice of a motion on the subject.

Mr. ROBERT GORDON. — In answer to the Honourable and Gallant Member, I beg to say that it is confidently expected that the inconvenience complained of will be obviated by the general introduction of stamps, which I expect will shortly take place.

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — As an instance of the inconvenience resulting from the present arrangement, I may mention that, in consequence of there being no House yesterday, I was unable to send the Votes and Proceedings to my constituents, who will be disappointed at not receiving them this morning.

Mr. ROBERT GORDON.—That cannot be much cause of disappointment to the Honourable Member's constituents, as they will have them to-morrow.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I am well aware of the wit and humour of my Honourable Friend the Secretary for the Treasury, and no one admires it more than I do; but I certainly think that such a subject as the means of communication between a Member and his constituents should not be treated with levity, or made a matter of joke. With respect to the matter before us, I certainly feel that Members are, at present, subjected to much inconvenience, which it would be desirable to put an end to.

Mr. R. GORDON. — I am extremely glad to see the Right Honourable Baronet so anxious for the circulation of the proceedings and papers of the House. I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not now in his place, for it has devolved upon my Right Honourable Friend to make all the arrangements with respect to postage, and I do not interfere with them.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I must confess that the explanation is satisfactory, in so far as my Honourable Friend is concerned; for if he have not the information required, he cannot give it; but his confession adds one more to the many proofs we have lately received of the lamentable state of confusion in which the government is carried on.

Mr. HUME.—Sir, in my opinion, there must have been some mistake in the circumstance to which the Honourable and Gallant Member alludes. I was a member of the Committee who considered this subject, and we passed a resolution recommending that the Votes of the House and the Bills should be allowed to go free. I can only say that I then thought the provision satisfactory, and not open to blame.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I really do not think the Honourable Member understands what it is we complain of. What we complain of is, that we have not at present the means of sending Votes and Bills to our constituents, without being subject to the necessity of sending them from the House, and of directing them in the room below stairs. We cannot send them after the House has broken up, for we might find no one in attendance in the room below. This is a great inconvenience, and I think we ought to devise some means by which a person at the House might be allowed to send the Votes instead of the Member himself being obliged to come down for that purpose. I am sure that, if my Honourable Friend opposite would mention the matter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the inconvenience would be remedied.

SIR G. CLERK. — I wish to ask why we should make a distinction in respect to postage between the Votes and Proceedings and newspapers? The only reason why the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the present regulation was, in order that a person in the room below might keep an account with the Post Office of the weight and number of papers sent. Was this done to increase the returns? I do not see why Members should not be allowed to send the Votes and Proceedings and Bills, as before, in a cover open at both ends. There could be no danger that any improper use would be made of this permission; and, if anything be written within, let the papers be subject to postage in that case, in the same way as newspapers now are. I do not see why Members should not be allowed to send their papers from their own houses, instead of being obliged to come down to the House for that purpose, unless the object be to swell the Post Office returns by a few thousands.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I do not understand how, when we are engaged in a contest for the right of publication, in which I have joined, we can, at the same time, be throwing obstructions in the way of that publication. I have more inconvenience to complain of from these new arrangements than other Honourable Members, on account of the numerous and important constituency which I represent. I do not recognise the advantage of each department keeping a separate account with the Post Office; it can only lead to inconvenience, and encumber the public accounts. I hope we shall be allowed to return to the simplicity of the old system of forwarding our papers, as I think that every facility ought to be afforded to enable Members to communicate with their constituents.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I hope that, after the observation made by the Noble Lord, the House will look with very great jealousy at any attempt to break through the regulation advised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It appears, from the Noble Lord's observations, that the present is only the first step, and that the next demand will be for the privilege of franking for the whole of the public offices. If we now extend the privilege of franking to public officers, they would be found, as it used to be formerly, to be converted into the most monstrous abuse. I admit that there may be some inconvenience in the present practice. The parliamentary papers might be sent under the special direction of the Members; but they ought to be put in, in this House. It might be quite sufficient, if a Member were not able to attend at the House, to make out a list of the papers he desired to send, and have them given to the officer of the House. A facility of that kind might be afforded; but we ought not to depart from the regulation that it is from this House that papers are to be sent.

SIR F. TRENCH. — Perhaps I may be allowed to request that the Secretary of the Treasury will explain the meaning of that minute which appeared in the papers of yesterday, to the effect that Members may now send papers weighing four ounces, for one penny; whereas, formerly, they could only send the weight of two ounces, inconsistent as all this is with a memorandum I have read, emanating from Mr. Speaker, stating that printed papers were to be sent free.

Mr. R. GORDON. — May I inquire to what paper the Honourable and Gallant Officer alludes?

SIR F. TRENCH. — It is a Treasury minute.

Mr. R. GORDON. — May I ask its date?

SIR F. TRENCH. — The paper is headed "Treasury Minute," and bears date the 17th of February, 1840. It declares that Members may now send papers weighing four ounces for one penny, whereas they could, formerly, only send the weight of two ounces. This is wholly at variance with Mr. Speaker's memorandum, that they should be transmitted post free.

SIR W. JAMES.—While the Honourable Secretary for the Treasury is considering his answer, I will take this opportunity of bearing testimony to the truth of the statement of the Noble Lord the Member for Liverpool. I also represent a large commercial constituency, and have been very much obstructed in the transmission of important papers to them by the present regulation.

Mr. R. GORDON. — I believe that the order alluded to by the Honourable and Gallant Member is a general one, applying to all papers sent through the Post Office.

Mr. GOULBURN. — Sir, though not Secretary for the Treasury, I believe I can explain the discrepancy. Does the Honourable Secretary, then, give it up? If the papers are sent by a Member through the Post Office from his own house, the sum of one penny is charged for every four ounces; but if they are put into the box of the House of Commons, they go free.

Mr. GORDON. — My Right Honourable Friend has closed the case for the Secretary of the Treasury!

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — I do hope that some more convenient and satisfactory arrangement will be made with respect to the transmission of parliamentary documents; and in that expectation I will allow the matter to drop for the present.

PRIVILEGE (CASE OF THE SHERIFFS).

SIR M. WOOD.—Sir, I will take this opportunity to put a question to the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies. It appears, from the public papers, that in consequence of an occurrence yesterday, the progress of the writ of inquiry in the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard" has been postponed for two months; I beg, therefore, to inquire whether, as the sheriffs cannot be called on to do any act in pursuance of that writ till somewhere about the 20th of April, it is still the Noble Lord's intention to persevere in the imprisonment of the sheriff during the whole of that period? I do hope, after the exhibition of popular feeling on this subject, which I understand has taken place to-day, at a meeting where my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny was dragged out of the chair, and the Honourable Member for Finsbury tossed over the platform rail, —— the Noble Lord will see the propriety of relaxing somewhat in the severity of the sheriff's treatment.

[Laughter, and a cry of "Oh!"]

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I can only say that, if the sheriff has any application to make to the House, or any submission to make, it had better be done in the regular way, by petition.

Mr. HUME. — I trust I may be allowed to say a word or two, as my name has been introduced into this conversation. The Honourable Baronet, the Member for the City of London, is entirely misinformed as to the circumstances. The facts are simply these: — The freeholders of Middlesex met quietly, and for nearly an hour went on with the regular business of the meeting, when the deputy sheriff arrived, attended with a riotous assembly, and attempted to disturb the proceedings.

[Renewed cries of "Oh, oh!"]

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — I beg to say, having been present at the meeting, that the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, although presiding on the occasion, is not at all correct in his statement of what had occurred.

The SPEAKER. — Honourable Members must see that this discussion is quite irregular, as there is really no question before the House.

THE TRADE IN OPIUM.

Mr. HERRIES. — I beg to put another question to the Honourable Secretary for the Treasury, which I hope he will be enabled to answer with greater ease than the other. I wish to know whether any communications have passed between the Treasury and the applicants for compensation for opium destroyed in China, since the date of the last communication, in which the Honourable Secretary informed them that it was not the intention of the Treasury to make any application to the House for a vote to meet their claims?

Mr. R. GORDON.—There has been no written application from the parties, nor any communication to them from the Treasury, since the date of the note referred to by the Right Honourable Gentleman.

Mr. HERRIES. — I beg to repeat my inquiry — if there has been no intimation of opinion given to the parties since that time, on the part of the Treasury?

Mr. R. GORDON. — No intimation whatever. All that has taken place has been the mere fact that certain formal notices have been served at the Treasury by notaries public.

Mr. HERRIES. — I hope the papers connected with China will be laid on the table by the beginning of next week?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — Certainly.

Main question put, and agreed to; order read; Navy estimates referred.

opposite would mention the matter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the inconvenience would be remedied.

SIR G. CLERK. — I wish to ask why we should make a distinction in respect to postage between the Votes and Proceedings and newspapers? The only reason why the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the present regulation was, in order that a person in the room below might keep an account with the Post Office of the weight and number of papers sent. Was this done to increase the returns? I do not see why Members should not be allowed to send the Votes and Proceedings and Bills, as before, in a cover open at both ends. There could be no danger that any improper use would b made of this permission; and, if an thing be written within, let the paper subject to postage in that case, in the way as newspapers now are. I see why Members should not be to send their papers from th houses, instead of being oblige down to the House for that p less the object be to swell th returns by a few thousands.

th My Honourable Friend the Member for Halifax stated, last year, in moving the Navy Estimates, that the Board of Admiralty had decided on increasing the pay of petty officers, of assistant surgeons in small ships, of engineers; and on appointing naval instructors in the place of schoolmasters. The increase of 1000 men will require the sum of 36,700*l.* The increased employment of small ships adds to the expense by about 7460*l.*; and the increase of pay which I have stated will cause the total increase on No. 1. to amount to 60,060*l.* On the second head, entitled victuals for seamen and marines, the increase amounts to 50,597*l.*; of this sum, 18,690*l.* is for victuals for the in-their return to port; a great portion of the strength of the yards has been applied to the building of steam vessels, and to the increase of small vessels, of which the navy stood in great need; consequently, the building of large ships has not been as much attended to as is desirable, from the efforts making by other powers. When the peace establishment was fixed, in 1819, we had a number of large ships remaining, after the close of the war: at that time, no other navy existed in the world, and so the case continued up to 1830; but since that, great efforts have been made by every naval power in Europe to increase their fleets, more particularly by France. It therefore becomes us, if we wish to maintain our naval supremacy, to give attention to the subject in time, as the best, the cheapest, and most desirable means of preserving the general peace — in which all nations are interested. Even in the midst of our financial difficulties, — which, though temporary, are not less pressing, — the Government, looking to the importance of this point, with a view to maintain the maritime supremacy of this country, have not hesitated to come down to the House and propose what some would consider a large increase to the estimates. On No. 9., wages in our dockyards abroad, — there is an increase of only 900*l.* This is chiefly applicable to the salary of a shipwright officer in India, where it is proposed to construct 10 large ships of the line, which will convey to England the frames of 10 more. No. 10. Naval stores. The increase on this head is large; — it amounts to 136,153*l*. A portion of it will be applied under the head of standing contracts for materials to be employed in the steam factory at Woolwich; but a much larger portion is applicable to increase our supply of timber, and bring it up to the full establishment. An occasion now presents itself for obtaining a considerable supply of timber, of that quality most required, — which is at all times difficult to procure, and most desirable to possess. The store may be large, but if there be a deficiency of a particular kind, the remainder would be comparatively useless. The vote of this year will bring the whole of the dockyard stores up to the full establishment; so that, in the event of any sudden emergency, we shall have within our yards the means not only of equipping our large fleet in ordinary, but of continuing our works without being obliged to go into the market under circumstances which would considerably enhance prices. My Honourable Friend the Member for Halifax stated, last year, on the authority of the storekeeper general, that at no period since the peace had the stores of the navy been in so efficient a state. I can now repeat, on the same authority, that the vote of this year will place the stores of the navy — taking into account quality as well as quantity — in a more efficient state than at any former period. No. 11. New works, improvements, and repairs in the yards. This head of expenditure is one of great importance to the efficiency of the navy, and is well worthy of the attention of the country at a period of peace. There would have been a decrease of 77,277*l*., if no additional works had been proceeded with this year; but the Board of Admiralty, on full consideration, have determined to propose the new works I shall enumerate, which will cause an increase of expenditure over the vote of last year of 33,132*l*. At Deptford, it is proposed to erect new piers and a wharf wall, and to establish machinery for spinning hemp, causing a saving of 70 per cent. in the manufacture of rope. At Woolwich considerable works have been carried on for some time: two new docks and basins for steamers are in course of construction: the manufactory for steam engines is completed. It is now proposed to erect a large storehouse for machinery, and a railroad from the wharf. It is also proposed to erect machinery for the manufacture of fuel, on the plan of Mr. Grant,—a gentleman of great ability in the public employment, who is also the inventor of the machinery for making biscuit. This fuel is composed of coal dust and coal tar. It is one fifth better than Welsh coal, one half stronger than Newcastle coal, will keep a steamer one third longer at sea, and is a saving of 40 per cent. over coal. At Chatham it is proposed to expend 4000*l*. on the harbour, which it is hoped will produce a future saving of 3000*l*. per annum. At Sheerness a building will be erected for cement, which was formerly procured by contract; but the quality was so bad, it has been found necessary to resume the manufacture of it. At Portsmouth, saw mills and metal mills will be erected. At Plymouth, the piers, sea walls, and entrance to the docks will be improved. At Pembroke, two new slips for the construction of large ships will be provided, roofs erected over others, saw mills will be established, and timber sheds constructed. The victualling yard at Deptford will be improved by the erection of biscuit machinery transferred from Plymouth, which will cause a saving of 3000*l*. per annum. The late hurricane at Bermuda will render necessary the expenditure of 10,000*l*. on repairs and improvements of the dockyard. At Jamaica a careening wharf will be erected at a cost of 4000*l*.: 3700*l*. will be expended on the purchase of a victualling yard there, which is found to be cheaper than the repair of the Magnificent as a depôt for naval stores. I feel that the amount for new works is large; but the Committee will observe that every improvement in machinery effects an economy of labour, and adds to the efficiency of the yards in the event of a sudden armament being required. In the event of war, all our attention would be turned to the defence of the country, leaving little time to effect improvements for which a period of peace is so appropriate. No. 12. Medical stores. There is a small increase of 500*l*. No. 13. Miscellaneous Service. The increase is considerable; it amounts to 53,754*l*. These services, though not strictly naval, are of great interest, as tending to improve and increase our mercantile steam marine, and greatly to increase our strength in large steamers, which would be of great value in time of war. The contracts for which this sum is required are — 1st, Liverpool to Dublin, 9750*l*.; from Liverpool to Halifax, for nine months, from the 1st of June next, 45,000*l*. There are other small contracts for short periods; all that I have enumerated are contracts entered into in the last year. Nos. 14, 15, and 16. Half pay of navy and marines; civil pensions and allowances; military pensions. There is a reduction of 34,712*l.* on the estimate of last year. On Nos. 17. and 18. (freight on account of army and ordnance; freight for home department) there is an increase of 23,326*l.*, occasioned by the rise in price of provisions and freight. I have now gone through the various heads of expenditure, and have endeavoured to explain to the Committee the grounds for increase on each head. The total net sum to be voted is 5,659,051*l.* Of this sum, 2,287,012*l.* is for services not strictly naval, and includes the half pay. The net sum for effective service amounts to 3,372,039*l.* I have not referred to the estimates of former years, nor gone back to the acts of former Governments, to justify the scale of the present estimates. I consider that the vote of each year should stand on the circumstances of the period at which it is brought forward. The vote of men in 1819 — which was 14,000 less than the number proposed this year — was as large, compared with the circumstances of the two periods, as the present vote. I am unwilling to touch on any matter which could lead the Committee from the consideration of the subject before it. I have always heard that the navy estimates should not be considered as a party question, and I trust I have carefully abstained from any observation likely to cause a difference of opinion. I shall now move that 35,165 men be voted for the year ending 31st March, 1841, including 9000 marines and 2000 boys.

SIR G. CLERK. — Sir, the Honourable Secretary for the Admiralty has stated, in a concise and intelligent manner, the difference between the estimates for the present year and those of the past year. There is certainly nothing in the Honourable Member's statement to which the slightest objection can be made. But I must confess that I regret that, at the present moment, on the main subject of the naval service,— a subject attracting so much attention, — the Honourable Member has not gone more fully into the reasons which are to justify the increase of one thousand men, now demanded. I tell the Honourable Member, candidly, that I do not intend to object to that increase, having felt it my duty to object to the estimates of last year, on the ground of insufficiency. I certainly should feel that I was guilty of inconsistency, if I objected to the increase which appears on these votes. These votes are very large in amount; but I feel persuaded that, if the Admiralty do their duty, and use all diligence in the expenditure of the money we are now called on to vote, there will be no danger of inefficiency in the ships afloat. On the other hand, I consider that they will incur heavy responsibility, if, having these means in their power, they shall not be prepared to resist any attack on our own coasts, or to repel insults to our flag anywhere else. Having read these estimates, which are larger than any which have been voted for the last ten years, I cannot help observing that the amount is much larger than was asked in 1830, the last occasion on which I had the honour to propose the estimates. I will call the recollection of the House to the force kept afloat during that year. The charge then made against the Admiralty was, that they kept a greater force afloat in 1829 and 1830 than had been voted in the estimates. That circumstance arose from the fact that previous to 1831, the time when the Right Honourable the Member for Pembroke became First Lord of the Admiralty, a practice had existed of voting only the number of men permanently kept afloat, but the votes did not include the necessary reliefs. It therefore followed that, when the reliefs were to be sent out, a considerable number was necessary more than the amount of men voted. In that year, an alteration was adopted by the Right Honourable Member for Pembroke. In 1830, it was impossible to recall any ships from the Mediterranean; and although we had 33,000 men, being nearly the number in the present estimate, the sum voted was 35,000*l.* less than that now called for; but while 5,594,000*l.* was all we asked of the House, 5,300,000*l.* was all that was expended;—so much less was our estimate than the present. I wish to know what has been the cause of that excess? If I look to the wages of seamen, I find the sum for this year exceeds, very nearly by a million, that required then. I will admit, however, that Government has been latterly burdened with the expense of the Post Office packets, amounting to 105,000*l.* annually; but, then, the Committee should bear in mind, that in 1830 the Admiralty had the charge of protecting the revenue along the coasts of Kent and Sussex, and had, at the same time, several cruisers in the Channel. I am the more anxious to call the attention of the House to the excess of this year as compared with 1830, because it formed a ground of charge against the Admiralty of that day, that they took the surplus of one branch of the service to make up the deficiency in another. My Right Honourable Friend the Member for Pembroke, being anxious to prevent a recurrence of the complaint, did, during his time of holding office, order that a balance sheet should be laid on the table, which enabled the Committee to come accurately at the facts. I am bound to observe, that although, by this course, surprising accuracy was obtained, it would not have been applicable to times of difficulty.

At the time to which I allude, the affairs of the East assumed such an aspect that a great increase of men was necessary, and the only way we had to make up the deficiency was, to expend a large sum which had been voted for the purchase of stores. At that time the hemp was bad, and was, on that account, allowed to run low; but, with that exception, the stores of every kind were in ample quantity. I find that the cause of complaint at present is the exact reverse of that made against my Right Honourable Friend in 1830, because I find that 100,000*l.* has been taken for the wages of seamen, which has not been expended, and I find the excess in the purchase of stores to be 99,000*l.*, exactly balancing the deficit. I think it forms a very grave charge against the Admiralty, that they have not, during the last year, employed the sum voted; and the more so, because, if any Honourable Gentleman will take the trouble to compare the number of men voted, he will find that our ships must have actually been 2000 men short of their complement. And, although it does appear that, since the discussion in this House, great additions have been made, both in ships and men, the Admiralty are at the present moment, to some extent, liable to the same charge. The Honourable Secretary has stated, in answer to a question put, that our ships in the Mediterranean are on the peace establishment. I consider that, under present circumstances,—considering the large force kept by other nations in the Mediterranean, all of it fully manned,—it is not expedient that our ships should be sent there, without their full complements. Have they got their full complements? Let Honourable Members look to the paper marked letter "A," and they will find that the number required for these ships is 26,524: and it also appears that the whole number of men on board the same ships was, in January, 1840, only 21,524, their proper complement being 24,376. Therefore, on the aggregate of our ships, there is a deficiency of 2148. If I am wrong, I shall be happy to hear an explanation; but I believe that the last ships that quitted this country, sailed considerably short of their complements. I believe that was the case with the Powerful, and the same with the Benbow. Now, it is perfectly clear that if the ships are thus sent to sea short of their complements, without carrying any supernumeraries to supply casualties, there must be, in the fleet, a considerable deficiency of men. I confess that, after the answer given by the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to the questions put by my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Tamworth, with respect to the existing state of our negotiations with Turkey, I am very unwilling to say anything on that subject. But, then, it is clear that, if the circumstances of Europe are such as to require that we should have twelve sail of the line in the Mediterranean, nothing can justify us in sending out that force, except they be in such a condition as to exert a moral influence; and if this be the object, I say, that force is not enough, because England ought to have not only as many ships there as any other power, but, above all, it ought to be carefully provided that her ships should have an efficient number of men aboard; for I believe that no naval officer will contradict me when I say that, if a collision were to arise, he would rather engage with five ships well manned, than with eight, or even ten, imperfectly manned. What is the state of things in the Mediterranean? Last year, England had 9 sail of the line there; the French had 8 sail of the line. But in the present year, whilst we have increased our number of ships to 12, the French have increased their force to 15, the smallest of which is an eighty-gun ship. There are 2 of 120 guns, 1 of 100, 2 of 86, and 10 of 80 guns. I believe, also, that there is another ninety-gun ship fitting out for the Mediterranean, at Rochefort. If, therefore, it is our object to enforce the policy of the Noble Lord, we ought to have a larger fleet in the Mediterranean. The Honourable Member for Halifax last year quoted a remark of the Duc de Choiseul, intimating that if the object of France was to weaken and embarrass the English, she could not do it more effectually than by putting them in perpetual fear of attack, so as to force us to keep up a war establishment in time of peace, without actually giving us any occasion for hostilities. Now, whether the policy of France be, now, such as is here described or not, I do not know; but, certainly, the result is precisely that described by the Duc de Choiseul. The French are continually increasing their naval force, without any sufficient apparent cause to justify that increase; and I think that the proper course for our Government to adopt would be, to represent to France the apprehensions which her proceedings create, and to call on her not to go on increasing her naval force when there are no sufficient grounds for it. I am very sorry that the Honourable Secretary to the Admiralty has not made any allusion to two very important practical alterations which were said to have been in progress when last this subject was discussed — that he has not stated whether the new scheme of armament for the fleet, which was then discussed, has been brought into use; and whether the increased complements of men, as recommended by Captain Berkeley, have been adopted.

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — It was stated, last year, that an increase in the complement had been made.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — I am glad to hear it; but still I believe that the increased complement was 3½ or 4 per cent. below the full complement.

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — Only 3 per cent. below the war complement of 1815.

SIR GEORGE CLERK. — Yes, that may be; but the Honourable Secretary of the Admiralty must take into account that since that period our ships have been much enlarged in respect to the size of their scantling, and the weight and size of their yards and masts; and that a complement which might have been fully sufficient in 1815, would be very insufficient for the larger ships with the heavier spars now employed in the Mediterranean. I therefore do not think this statement so favourable as when I first heard it; and I consider it to be the bounden duty of the Admiralty not only to supply the deficiency of the smaller complement, but to put the ships in the Mediterranean on the full establishment. There is also another point to which I wish to refer. Since last year we have seen the extreme difficulty there has been found in making the slightest increase in the complements of our ships. If, indeed, a ship of war comes into one of our ports to be paid off, and another chances to be lying in that port waiting for a complement to sail, there is not, in that case, much difficulty in engaging the crew to transfer their services from one vessel to the other. But if we require an additional 1000 or 2000 men for our navy, and have to draw them from the merchant service, it is well known that that cannot be done without extreme difficulty. It is, therefore, a matter of the utmost importance that we should have more efficient means in reserve for manning our navy, in any case of emergency, than we now have. One of the means on which, in 1830, we were enabled to rely, was the coast blockade, — a force which has since been done away, and a coast guard substituted in its stead. It was stated by the Secretary of the Admiralty, last year, that he was sorry to find that the coast guard had not proved so efficient a reserve as he had expected it to be, and that he had it then in contemplation to appoint a Commission with the view of putting the coast guard in a more effective state. I wish the present Secretary of the Admiralty had said whether or not anything has been done in this respect. I quite agree in the sentiment expressed in conclusion by the Honourable Gentleman opposite, that the state of the navy, and the means of promoting its efficiency, cannot be considered as a party question. There can be but one object common to all parties with respect to the navy, namely, that of removing any difficulty in the way of putting that service in the most efficient condition. I am afraid, also, that very little advantage is to be obtained, in a case of emergency, from the men in ordinary; for I find that the greatest number which could be obtained from that source last year was 500; a number by no means sufficient for the public service.

I must now take the liberty of adverting to what I pressed upon the attention of the Committee last year, — the distribution of the naval force employed, and the means possessed by us of resisting sudden aggression, or protecting our commerce, in any case of emergency. There are twenty-one ships of the line now in commission, and, of these, twelve are in the Mediterranean. There are three first-rate guard-ships in our harbours at home; but these guard-ships have only one third of their proper complements, and the crews of the whole three would man only one ship properly. Three of the remaining six ships are destined for service on the coast of China, and three are in the Tagus. The Government has not, therefore, a single ship of the line at its disposal; and if any circumstance should arise in the East or West Indies, or on the coasts of North or South America, to render it necessary to have a naval force to protect our commerce, the Government would not be found to have within reach even one line-of-battle ship for that purpose. Now, why — I should like to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs — has he kept, for the last three years and upwards, three line-of-battle ships in the

Tagus? I shall probably be told that to keep them as guard-ships at home tends to promote bad discipline; but where is the difference between the discipline of ships lying at anchor in our harbours at home, and lying, as the flag-ship has done for three years — for 1200 and odd days — in the Tagus, without even lifting her anchor? Where is the advantage of the flag-ship of Admiral Gage or Admiral Ommanney lying for so long a time as that in the Tagus without lifting her anchor? The House has this night heard from the Noble Lord a confession of his total want of influence at the Portuguese Court, which, for the last five years, he has warmly been soliciting to do justice to those British subjects who have the most undeniable claims upon it; and I cannot help thinking, that when the Noble Lord found his remonstrances not acceded to, if he had intimated a determination to recall those three line-of-battle ships from the Tagus, he would have found his representations more respectfully and more promptly met. Is it to be said that it is necessary to the security of the government of Donna Maria, that we are to maintain three line-of-battle ships in the Tagus, at an annual expense of 100,000*l.*? That, surely, cannot be admitted as a valid argument, unless the Noble Lord is prepared to show that the Portuguese Government is exposed to difficulties and embarrassments in consequence of its attachment to British interests. But, by the Noble Lord's own confession, he is, at Lisbon, — and the same may be said of him at every capital in Europe, — utterly without influence. One of these three ships the Government has lately been obliged to withdraw, namely, the Blenheim, because there were none at home that could be employed in a service where they were much wanted. And let the Committee here observe the inconvenience of such a disposition of our vessels. It was at the end of July, last year, that the first intelligence reached this country of the unfortunate rupture at Canton. If a sufficient naval force had been kept in reserve at home, it would not have been necessary to wait till the Blenheim had been recalled to join the two frigates which have, only within the last few days, sailed for that destination, — although the first intelligence of this disastrous state of affairs, there, arrived so many months since. I do not know whether there is or not any sufficient force in the East Indies; but, whatever force there is there would not, I suppose, sail for China until joined by the Blenheim and the two frigates. As to the ships in the Mediterranean, it is certainly necessary that there should be a sufficient force there, and one corresponding at least to that of the other powers which have fleets in that sea; but I maintain that it is most essential that the coasts of this country should under no circumstances be left without adequate protection. Many persons, last year, pretended to sneer at the Russian fleet in the Baltic; but I believe the Admiralty has, since that time, received very important intelligence upon this subject, and is now by no means inclined to treat the squadron in the Baltic as a "pasteboard fleet."

I wish that the Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty had given us some information as to the ships in ordinary in the ports of this kingdom. That Honourable Gentleman has said, that, owing to the great expense which has been incurred in building steam vessels and the repairs of the Post Office packets, the Admiralty has been unable, with the number of men at present in the dockyards, to build large ships; and I am glad to learn from the Honourable Gentleman that the Admiralty intends, now, to recommence the building of large line-of-battle ships, and that it is also intended to lay down two new first class line-of-battle ships in Pembroke dockyard; but, in reference to the ships in ordinary, many of them have now been fifteen or twenty years in ordinary, and are, I fear, in a very bad state of repair. When, therefore, I am told that we possess twenty or thirty sail of the line in addition to those now at sea, I very much fear, from the time that has elapsed since these vessels were in active service, that a very considerable delay would arise before any large squadron could be fitted out and put in an efficient state; and I regret that there has not been made, of late, that accurate personal examination into the state of our ships, which, some years since, it was the annual practice to hold. I am glad to find, however, that the Admiralty is about to add to the number of ships in our harbours; and, with the great increase in the number of naval artificers which they now propose to make, it will be their bounden duty to take care that every ship in ordinary shall be put in a state to proceed to sea at a short notice. When the Duke of Wellington was in office, it was thought that 6000 artificers in the navy yards were insufficient to keep the ordinary in a proper state. Last year, when the Honourable Secretary for the Admiralty brought forward his estimates, he made a considerable addition to this branch, his total being 7591; and now the Honourable Gentleman opposite has provided for a still larger addition of 800 men, making the total number of artificers 8391, — a number which really comes so near the greatest number employed in time of war that the Admiralty will be guilty of the grossest neglect of duty if it do not, in a short time, remove from the minds of the people of this country that alarm and suspicion which generally prevail, that the ships of our navy in ordinary are in a very weak and ineffective state; — and if they do not provide a proper succession of new ships. I agree with the Honourable Member, that it is impossible, from former estimates alone, to decide what is necessary and what not, without taking into account the circumstances under which the country is now placed: but it is as impossible to avoid seeing that not France alone, but other maritime states, are not only increasing their navies, but are building ships of larger dimensions than those, even, formerly employed by this country. If, therefore, Britain is to maintain that naval pre-eminence which has so long been her boast, and which is so essential to her position among the nations, it becomes imperatively necessary that we should build ships of a class and size sufficiently capable of meeting those with which, in the event of a war, we are likely to come into collision; and I am sincerely glad to hear of the determination which has been, to-night, announced on the part of the Admiralty, to build two ships of the largest class at Pembroke. I am unwilling to go into further details as to the other statements of the Honourable Gentleman, on which there will be an opportunity of remarking in future votes. The particular vote now before the House for the number of men is the most important of all the estimates, and I believe that the country is in a situation to render a great increase in our naval force necessary. The Noble Lord has told the House that we are in a state of profound peace: but that is a singular state of peace which calls upon us to increase our force to this extent; and the manner in which other countries have enlarged their armaments seems to indicate, as I have said, that they are endeavouring to embarrass us by carrying the Duc de Choiseul's recommendation into effect. The navy of this country is so important a service, that it must be kept up to an adequate amount, whatever exertion it may require to do so; and reposing this kind of confidence in the Government, that they have means of information which are not within reach of other Members of the House, and consequently ought to know the number of men that is required for our naval service, I shall not oppose the vote now proposed of 35,000 men for the service of the ensuing year.

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — With respect to the increase of 3 per cent. of which I have spoken, that was not with reference to complement alone, but to armament. Thinking that the subject might be discussed, I had made a minute of the increase in some of the new class of ships to which the Honourable Baronet has alluded, and which will better illustrate my meaning. The Pique is one of those ships to which the Honourable Baronet has alluded as having larger masts and heavier spars and yards than formerly. Her former complement was 275 men, which has now been increased to 305, being an increase on the complement alone of 11 per cent., instead of 3 per cent. In the Revenge, the former complement was 570, the present 590, or an increase of 3½ per cent. In the Blonde there has been an increase from 275 to 280, or 2 per cent. In the Andromache, from 175 to 185, or 6 per cent.; the increase of complement being in all cases in reference to the armament. As to the coast guard, a Committee was appointed last year, which sat for some time, but it has not yet made its report. With respect to the flag-ships, the Honourable Baronet has stated that the guard-ships are not sufficiently manned; but in the statement he made he was not quite correct, inasmuch as though the complement of the guard-ships is below that which would be required to go to sea with, yet there is quite a sufficient number of men in ordinary to make up the complement of the guard-ships to the full war amount — and this I have fully ascertained — upon any emergency. With regard to the question touching the China ships, I believe I could give a satisfactory reply; but as that question will come on at another time, I think I had better postpone any reply on that point. As to the state of the ships in ordinary, the Honourable Gentleman is wrong in his apprehensions that they have been neglected. Certainly, when the state of the yards is not so good as could have been wished, the same attention cannot be paid to their repairs as when they are in a more efficient state; but there has been constantly an annual survey, and a minute report made of the state of every ship; and I can inform the House that the condition of the ships in ordinary is very satisfactory, and such as to enable the Admiralty, if required, to send to sea, within two months, a fleet much larger than any other country could send to sea, and, indeed, almost as large as any two other nations could send out. With reference to the alleged neglect in building large ships, I can state that, although so much attention may not have been paid to that point as was desirable, yet that it has not been altogether neglected. Since last year there has been worked up of the ships on the stocks timber equivalent to the completion of three. I am not aware that there is any other point I have not answered.

SIR G. CLERK. — Will the Honourable Gentleman give us any information as to the shortness of the complements in the Mediterranean?

Mr. M. O'FERRALL. — From the last report from the Mediterranean it does not appear to be the case that the complements are short. The fleet was, at the time of that report, only forty-five short, and that deficiency has been since made good.

Mr. HUME. — I can understand no reason, Sir, for so great an increase in the number of our ships and men, merely because France and Russia have increased their navies. If that, Sir, is to be taken as a reason for increasing our naval force, the country must bear the expenses of war under the guise of peace, and we shall have the appearance of being at war at the very time that Her Majesty is assuring us, in the Speech from the throne, that our relations with foreign powers are in a satisfactory position. I complain that the Noble Lord (Lord Palmerston), whilst stating that the utmost concord exists between the great powers on the Eastern question, has, in fact, by his policy, produced the greatest discord, and that it was owing to the policy of our ambassador at Constantinople that the unfortunate expedition was fitted out which ended in the defeat at Nezib, and that this country is put to the enormous expense of keeping up an extensive fleet in the Mediterranean. I verily believe that this question of war between the Porte and the Pacha of Egypt would, ere this, have been settled to the satisfaction of both parties, if it had not been for the interference of the Noble Lord. There can be no doubt, from the appearance of things, that we are falling into the views of Russia, the greatest enemy of Turkey, and of whose desire, from her past encroachments, to seize Constantinople, there are the strongest possible indications. There are forty ships of war of different countries in the Mediterranean, and the Secretary to the Admiralty now asks us to increase the number of ships which we have already in that sea. Doubtless, if our naval force is to go on increasing in this manner, we must vote more men and more stores; but I object to this increase of our fleets, and wish the Noble Lord had informed the House why it is that the differences have been kept up between the Porte and Mehemet Ali; and why it is that the Noble Lord has obstructed peace between those powers, by the interposition of his interference? Each party has been compelled to maintain an army of at least 100,000 men; and the resources of Turkey have thus been wasted, leaving her an easy prey to Russia. It now appears, too, that England and France are decidedly opposed to each other on this question; and I believe that the battle which ended so fatally for the Sultan last year, would never have taken place if we had not interposed in the quarrel. The Sultan was at that time quite ready to accede to the views of Mehemet Ali, and to give him the hereditary possession of Egypt, and the governorship of the other provinces; but the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs interfered, and caused that state of affairs in the Mediterranean by which the expenditure of this country is now so materially increased. The Sultan was willing to do this in order to unite the whole races of the Mussulman faith together; but what has been the course adopted by the Noble Lord? It has been, to forbid the settlement of the question. Mehemet Ali had agreed to terms, and had consented to pay a tribute amounting to about 200,000*l.* a-year to the Porte for the advantages to be conceded to him; but the Noble Lord must needs step in and prevent this arrangement. Mehemet Ali himself complained of this interference, and of this country interposing on the 28th of July last, to prevent the execution of a treaty which had been agreed upon between himself and the Porte only two days previously. And what has been the result of this ill-advised intervention? Why, that seven months have now passed over, and yet matters are as much at issue as ever. It has been stated, that the British minister at Constantinople had insisted on our fleet being sent to Alexandria, for the purpose of intercepting and destroying, in conjunction with that of Mehemet Ali, the Turkish fleet; and I only mention this, that the Noble Lord may have an opportunity of contradicting the rumour, as such a circumstance — if a fact—would necessarily be, of all others, the best thing that could possibly happen for Russia. I complain, that in consequence of the bad and mischievous course of policy this country is pursuing in regard to the East, there is now all this augmentation required in our naval establishment, and a consequent increase of the burdens of the country. The Government is playing into the hands of the natural enemy of Turkey, and giving Russia every possible advantage over that power; and I believe that the existing difference between France and England on the Eastern question is to be attributed to this imprudent course. The French people believe that Russian councils find more favour in the eyes of our Government than the councils of that country. But France and this country are influenced by the same desire as to the nature of their institutions; and are, at this moment, most anxious as to that natural interchange of the manufactures of each which their neighbouring position seems ever to warrant; and the present estrangement is most deeply to be deplored, but it is attributable, as I have already expressed my firm belief, to the prevalence of Russian councils with the Government of this country. It is absurd to suppose, for a moment, that France has any design upon Egypt, or that, at all events, she would at this time risk a rupture with England for any such object. I say, then, that policy more mischievous than that which has kept up and is still keeping up this state of things, there could not possibly be, acting as we are in such a manner as to favour the designs and wishes of that power which longs to see Turkey prostrate at her feet. Mehemet Ali, after placing Arabia in a state of subjection, offered to restore it to the Porte; and he wishes to retain no more territory than may be necessary to insure the maintenance of peace. And does the Noble Lord not think that it will be a great loss and disadvantage to British interests if one of the results of his mistaken policy shall be to convert Mehemet Ali into an open enemy? Why should he be compelled to give up so large a portion of Syria to the Porte — a country which has, as history shows, never been really under the control of Turkey? and why should we persevere in keeping up a state of warfare which divides Mussulman from Mussulman, and can but be productive of most mischievous consequences? I protest, then, against this addition to our naval force, although I will not, on the present occasion, draw any comparisons as to what may have been done with respect to the naval affairs of the country by one side of the House or the other. I will not move any reduction on the vote proposed, much as I object to it; but I will say, that, so long as this description of policy is carried on, we can never maintain peace in Europe, or be prepared for war, ourselves. If England has the welfare of Turkey at heart, she should make it her first object to remove the deadweight which now presses on the resources of that country — I mean the heavy military force which she is obliged to keep up at this moment. That object would be attained by settling the terms of peace between that power and Mehemet Ali, and not by fomenting war, as we now are. Besides this, the maintenance of our own force in the Levant, required by this unsettled state of things, there, has cost an additional outlay of half a million of money. It has been stated, too, that our consul in Cairo has been denied access to the Pacha in consequence of the conduct of our Government. But does the Noble Lord reflect upon the injurious effect which the enmity of Mehemet Ali would have upon the interests of this country, now that he has it in his power to stop our overland communication with India, and whilst we are at war in India? I repeat, Sir, that I cannot conceive any motive for continuing the state of warfare at present existing in the East, unless it be to benefit the natural enemy of the Porte — Russia. I therefore protest against this vote; but as it has received so much encouragement on the other side of the House, it is useless for me to attempt to propose to amend it.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE. — The Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has, it appears to me, been discussing foreign affairs all through his speech, rather than the subject before the House, — the affairs of the navy of England. I shall not, however, follow the example of the Honourable Gentleman, in that, any more than in any other respect; but, in the few words I have to say, shall confine myself to subjects of a strictly professional character. The Honourable Secretary of the Admiralty has, in my opinion, wisely, and with much good taste, abstained from all allusion to party in the statements he has made; and I, Sir, shall endeavour to do the same in what I have to offer to the attention of the House. In matters relating to the service of the country, party considerations should never be suffered to intervene, and the good of that service, "only," should never be lost sight of. However much, in the present state of the finances of the country, I may regret any increase of our expenditure, I cannot but rejoice that the Government have come down to the House to ask for an increase of men in the navy, as well as for a grant to augment its resources, on the ground of the present political position of this country with regard to other nations. I will not now enter into the question of the grievances and wants of officers and men in the navy, as I trust that those subjects will be fully considered in the Report of the Naval and Military Commission shortly expected to be laid before the House; but I must observe, that the present proceedings of the Government afford ample confirmation of the necessity for an increase in the naval force of the country, and which was so strongly desired by them in the last session of Parliament. When the navy estimates were brought forward last year, an argument was thrown in the teeth of Members on this side of the House, that they had endeavoured to show the weakness and inefficiency of the navy as contrasted with the navies of other countries. I am free to confess that it is a disagreeable thing for this maritime country to have its weaknesses exposed; but I think it much more essential that we should know our weakness, than go on in fancied security, and expose ourselves to danger when it is least expected. I am led to make these statements from a comparison of the Navy List of England with those of France and Russia. The House will hardly credit the extent to which the French navy has lately been increased. I will, however, with the permission of the House, read a statement of the extent of the French navy, as published in their official Navy List in the month of January of this year, and compare it with that of our own navy, as seen in our Navy List. The French have now in commission 2 ships of 120 guns each, 1 of 106 guns, 3 of 90 guns, 4 of 86 guns, 4 of 80 guns: these are ships of the line. Besides these, she has 1 frigate of 60 guns, 1 of 58 guns, 5 of 52 guns, and 5 of 50 guns, two of the latter being armed en flute to carry troops. Now, what is the condition of the British navy? We have 22 line-of-battle ships in commission; out of these there are 3 three-deckers. We have 2 ships of 120 guns, and 1 of 104 guns. These ships are manned at one-third of their complement of hands, and lying in port; and I am informed that such is the shortness of the manning in the Britannia in particular, that they are actually obliged to put petty officers and marines to the oar whenever the Admiral goes on shore. A great deal has been said with respect to the increase of men in our navy; and they have recently been very much increased in number; but that shows the propriety of discussing these matters both in and out of the House. The Government, which has always said that the ships were perfectly well manned before, has given a practical denial of its own statements by adding to the complement of hands on board them. Now, to make a comparison of the state of the ships of the two services, the Committee must bear in mind that the French have a very large proportion of frigates as compared with us. We have altogether, of all sorts, only eight or nine frigates in commission. Out of these, we have only 2 of 50 guns, and those are of a moderate scantling in comparison with recently constructed vessels of the same class. But how is the French navy in respect to crews?

—	90 86	—	840	each.

and so on downwards. Then again, in the case of Russia, there are now, in the Baltic alone, belonging to that power, 28 sail of the line, while in the Black Sea she has as many as 14, and all very large and efficient ships, as I can state as an eye witness, with a great number of heavy frigates in both seas. Now, what I contend for is, that it is the duty of this country so to conduct our negotiations, that, if possible, we may prevent the necessity of having large armaments afloat; or else, that we should have our armaments fit to enter into collision with those of any other country in case any emergency should arise. I am also of opinion that we are much more likely to preserve peace by showing the world at large that we are ready to meet an enemy whenever we may be called on. I do not say this with the view of provoking any hostile feeling to any country whatever; but when we see other countries increasing their fleets, we are perfectly warranted in putting our naval armament in the best possible condition. I must also observe, before I leave this point, that the French have 1 ship of 120 guns, 3 of 80 guns, and 1 of 46 guns, all ready for sea; and they are building 4 of 120 guns, 12 of 100 guns, 9 of 90 guns, and 2 of 80 guns; whilst we in England have on the stocks 2 ships of 120 guns, 3 of 110 guns, 1 of 90 guns, and 6 of 80 guns. In this calculation I have omitted taking anything below frigates, because I take it for granted that the case is pretty much the same with regard to them in both countries; at all events I find no great difference in that particular. With respect to steam boats, about which my Honourable Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. C. Wood) has taken great credit for saying that we were building our steamers in a very effective manner — the French have, at this moment, 25 steamers afloat and in commission; and we have only, besides packets running between Dublin and Liverpool, Holyhead and Dublin, and this country and Calais, 10 or 12 steamers, and only six of these are heavily armed vessels. I find, too, that the French have in employment for their service afloat 23,173 men, and on shore 10,844 men, making a total of 34,017 men. We have 24,165 seamen, 2000 boys, and 5,550 marines afloat, making a total of 31,715; we have also 3500 marines to be employed on shore, making a grand total of 35,215; being an increase over the French navy of only 1,198 men. When I make a comparison between the number of men employed by England and France, I am bound to take into consideration the difference between this country and France. We are essentially a maritime nation; — we have immense colonies to watch over, and a trade carrying on with every part of the world. France has never yet assumed the character of a great maritime nation; and therefore I think we have a right to make observations when we see her navy equalling, in ships of a large scale, though not number, the ships of this country; and almost equal — I may say equal — to us in the number of men employed. Under these circumstances, I think the country has a right to complain, when it sees the Government stand still, while the Governments of other countries are making such rapid strides in naval improvements. The very great encouragement given by France to her navy is most worthy of the attention of this House. The King himself has made personal exertions in its behalf, and put one of his sons, the Prince de Joinville, in command of a frigate. In Russia, also, the Emperor every year makes an inspection of the fleet, and goes on board every ship himself. I would also remark, that there is a greater facility of manning the ships of those countries than we possess. I understand that it took four months to prepare the Powerful and the Impregnable for sea; and that those ships, together with the Pique and the Blonde, have put to sea, at last, short of their proper complement of men. The Grecian, I also believe, is in the same predicament. Our sailors are flocking to the American service, because there they are better paid; and it is a fact that we always find the American ships half manned with English seamen. This has been stated—and my own observation convinces me of its correctness — in a recent work published by Captain Marryat. This, it must be confessed, is a state of things that requires to be speedily amended.

It has been said by the Secretary of the Admiralty, that the ordinary seamen at Portsmouth assist to man the ships in case of any emergency. I find, however, that the total number of men entered on the books at Portsmouth is 583; the total establishment should be 879. I find that about 200 of these are warrant officers; leaving only 383 men to man any ship for sea. Will the Gallant Admiral opposite (Sir C. Adam) tell me that 383 men are enough to man a ship for sea? I do not therefore think that the ordinary can be very much relied on as a resource for manning our fleet. A scheme should be devised of a fresh scale of pay to encourage our seamen to remain in our service, and ships should be provided for boys to enter the service, who should be entitled to increased pay, and have pensions after a certain time, in order to keep them attached to the service. I also think it essential, in a country where, I am glad to say, there has always been a great feeling for the navy, that we should now and then see a fleet at our ports to keep that feeling alive: on the contrary, however, our harbours are, in these days, altogether deserted by our ships. I hope that the case of the men and midshipmen has been considered in the Commission now sitting; for we see mates leaving the service every day; — men who, after a hard service of six or seven years, have passed their examination, and who are then doomed to serve seven, eight, nine, ten, or eleven years more, and, after all, to get no rank, and very small pay. We cannot wonder at officers leaving the service; neither can we wonder if we find very great difficulty in getting boys to enter it, when they see what they are likely to have to undergo. I understand that the Revenge had such difficulty in getting midshipmen the other day, that she sailed at last with only ten on board. There are but 387 mates in the whole service, 488 midshipmen, and 430 volunteers. I find, too, that the midshipmen are getting gradually disgusted with the service. When our foreign relations are in a state that require us to arm at all, I think that we should arm in a way to show that we are determined not to suffer any aggression on the part of foreign powers. I put it to the House to recollect whether in the last two or three years we have not witnessed a few circumstances to make it quite necessary for us to have a proper armament. The insult to the Express packet, I think, has been very lamely got out of; and the affair at the Mauritius has never been thoroughly sifted in this House. There are no vessels of war to protect our ships at Buenos Ayres pending the blockade, and there is certainly a great want of vessels of war to protect our shipping pending the blockade of Mexico. I think, also, that the French having made an asylum port of Port Mahon is a circumstance likely to be very injurious to our interests in that quarter. My opinion is, that it would be very satisfactory to the country if a Channel fleet were to be manned and kept at sea, in that state of discipline so necessary to the service, if it were only for the purpose of giving the officers the opportunity of gaining experience in sailing ships of the line. I am very glad to hear that we are likely to go on building large ships; and I must say that that department of the navy has been for some time very much neglected. My Right Honourable Friend the Member for Pembroke established a rule, which has been departed from, of building three large ships every year; and the sooner that plan is resumed, the better. I cannot sit down without saying a word as to the patronage of the navy, however much I regret to introduce a subject which may have the colour of party; but I think I am justified in doing so when I see the party colour given to the appointments which have recently been made. The recent appointment to the governorship of Greenwich Hospital has been a source of disgust to the navy in general; and I will say no more than this, that in the official list of the navy I see fifteen officers wearing the Grand Cross of the Bath, of rank and standing above the gallant officer who received that appointment. I do not want to say anything against that officer; but it is an appointment which reflects anything but credit on the Admiralty. In a debate which has taken place elsewhere, the Noble Lord at the head of the Administration has said that he did not consider it necessary to distribute honours exclusively among those who had distinguished themselves in action; and the other evening the Gallant Admiral (Sir C. Adam) indignantly said that Sir J. Gordon had come to him with tears in his eyes, and expressed his regret at his removal from Chatham dockyard. Had that distinguished officer been nominated to the appointment in Greenwich Hospital,—he being, as the Gallant Admiral has stated, in distressed circumstances,—the country would have been, I venture to say, perfectly satisfied. I am convinced that the House of Commons will never refuse supplies to the extent necessary for the maintenance of our national honour, though not to the extent of wasteful extravagance. With our shores unprotected, — and I defy Honourable Gentlemen opposite to say that they are protected, — it is the duty of the Government to ask Parliament for a supply adequate to the keeping up of a respectable fleet on our shores. I will not detain the Committee longer. I have ventured to make these few observations with a sincere desire to benefit the service to which I have the honour to belong, and which I feel confident will always uphold the credit and glory of the country.

SIR CHARLES ADAM. — Sir, it is my intention to follow the excellent example set by the Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty in opening the estimates, by abstaining from touching on matters not directly connected with the subject under consideration. With all that has fallen from the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, and from the Noble and Gallant Lord opposite, relative to the diplomatic relations of the country, I have nothing whatever to do; and after the remarks which have fallen from my Honourable Friend near me, I shall detain the Committee but a very few minutes. I have no intention of going into the subject of the appointment to the governorship of Greenwich Hospital; nor should I have alluded to it, had not the Noble Lord brought forward the case of Sir James Gordon, and intimated that I was under feelings of awful indignation on a former occasion when the circumstance was mentioned. I certainly regret the occurrence, inasmuch as it prevented me from making use of those arguments which I should have adduced in a cooler moment. With respect to the treatment of Sir James Gordon, there really was nothing to complain of. He had been appointed a captain in ordinary, and of course his appointment lapsed when he was appointed a flag officer. There was no dismissal in the case. The precedent in the case of Sir Samuel Warren was followed; who, on being made a flag officer, was removed from his command at Woolwich. The Noble Lord has made some observations tending to show that the state of the French navy is very superior to that of our own. All I can say is, that our force in the Mediterranean is considerably larger than that of France. Some of our ships certainly are smaller, but our numerical force places us on more than an equality. There are 14 sail of the line employed about the Mediterranean belonging to France; but our force is, as I have said, superior; besides which, we have another vessel ready in Lisbon in case of any emergency. I admit, on the testimony of officers who have recently returned from that station, that the French have gained a considerable degree of expertness, and are more efficient than formerly; but our ships are much superior, and as efficient as they were in the year 1793; and in support of this assertion I can adduce the testimony of Sir Robert Stopford and Sir Frederick Maitland, who observed that the idea of the superiority of the French marine is quite unfounded. I am convinced that unless the French have changed very much since I was in the Mediterranean, they are not near so expert in nautical manœuvres as the English; and it is a subject of general remark, that they, as well as the Russians and Americans, always avoid an opportunity of entering into comparison with English vessels. Now, with respect to the state of the Russian navy, to which the Noble Lord has alluded, no one can deny that the Russian fleet is in a wonderfully efficient condition, considering the little practice it has had. If it did not exercise its men, who are soldiers and sailors indiscriminately, in the Baltic, it would have no opportunity of learning to manœuvre at all, for it has no colonial trade to employ it at a distance. Surely that is a very different state of things to the state of the navy of this maritime country, where we have 200,000 registered seamen, and where our merchant vessels are the nursery for the navy; and it is quite impossible, without negotiations or explanations that we could be so suddenly plunged into a war as to be unable to obtain the full complement of men in sufficient time for any hostilities that we might have to encounter. With respect to the number of men in the estimates, that number has been adopted after full consideration and discussion with Sir Thomas Maitland and other officers, as to the number necessary to work the guns of ships in commission. It is true that some admirals may prefer five ships fully manned to six with less than their proper complement; but that is a matter of arrangement, and can be adjusted, in the nearest port, by the admiral, at his pleasure. As to the want of men in the event of a war, I conceive that the Noble Lord's fears are groundless, for there are always plenty of sailors in our ports, and fishermen on our coasts, available for such an emergency, independent of the crews that would be unemployed at such a hazardous time by the mercantile interest; whereas, at present, the merchants, having the advantages of peace, their marine has increased very much; and considerable difficulties are thrown in the way of Government, by their giving higher wages and keeping the mass of seafaring men profitably occupied. It is the same in the East Indies, in the West Indies, and generally throughout our colonies. The Noble Lord has spoken of the inadequacy of our force for the protection of our shores. But during the last year there were not less than 8 line-of-battle ships lying in our ports; and with regard to the ships in ordinary, they could have been equipped and sent to sea in the course of a very short time. The Noble Lord has not only asserted the superiority of the French navy, generally, to ours, but he has stated that their frigates can only be opposed by our small ships of the line, which are infinitely inferior, especially in point of sailing. Now, although the English ships are inferior in point of size, I maintain that they are more handy, more active, and more effective in engagement with the enemy than the French ships. I can speak on that point from my own experience. It may be a question, if we were building all new ships, whether our frigates should not be of the same size as those of other powers; but whilst we continue to possess a vast number of small line-of-battle ships, I am convinced that it is infinitely more advantageous to make use of them in that shape, than to cut them down for the purpose of converting them into large frigates. Most of these small line-of-battle ships sail as fast as frigates, and are quite as useful for the purposes required of them. The Honourable Baronet (Sir G. Clerk) has stated that the ships in the Mediterranean are short of the complements of men assigned to them. Upon that point the Honourable Baronet is completely mistaken, for, according to the last returns, there appear to be from twenty-five to thirty supernumeraries. I have now said all that I think necessary in reply to the observations which have been made, and will not trespass longer on the time of the House.

CAPTAIN A'COURT. — I had hoped that the Gallant Admiral would have given some sort of answer to what has been stated by the Noble Lord (Lord Ingestre), respecting what I must call one of the most flagrant abuses of patronage that has ever been committed; — I mean the appointment of Admiral Fleming to the governorship of Greenwich Hospital. What, I ask, have been the naval services of the gallant officer to entitle him to that appointment? I distinctly reply, none. It is painful to me to make these personal observations; but in this case they are forced upon me, and I will not shrink from avowing my real sentiments upon the subject. If the situation of Governor of Greenwich Hospital be, as it has hitherto been considered, an honourable retreat for the most distinguished of our wounded flag officers, then I must say that Admiral Fleming has no earthly claim to it. However long and faithfully he may have served, he certainly never partook of any of the gallant actions of the last war, and is therefore clearly ineligible, while so many distinguished officers, who fought, and bravely fought, in those actions, stand senior to him on the navy list. I will venture to say that no act of the Government, since its accession to office, has given such dissatisfaction to the navy as this appointment. And how can it be otherwise, when they see an appointment which ought only to be gained by the most gallant services bestowed upon an officer, who, however excellent may be his private character, has never had the good fortune to distinguish himself in an engagement with the enemy? If distinguished gallantry in a naval officer is to be no recommendation, or merely a secondary one, and if the governorship of Greenwich Hospital is only to be made the reward of political services, the sooner the Noble Lord abolishes the useless sinecure the better, for the emoluments of the office would go far towards supporting 100 gallant veterans, and would be much more worthily employed than in swelling the patronage of the minister of the day. And, now, with respect to the navy: its inefficient state has been so ably pointed out already, that I feel it almost unnecessary to say a word in addition to the statements of my Noble Friend and the Honourable Baronet near me, which clearly showed that our shores are totally unprotected, and that our ships are too few in number and too small in size. I would ask any Gentleman conversant with naval affairs, how our 72-gun ships with 500 or 600 men can compete with foreign ships of 80 or 90 guns and 700 or 800 men? It would be unjustifiable and cruel to place British seamen in such a position; for, however gallant and zealous they may be, they would not have the physical force to uphold the honour and the glory of the country. I had hoped that the occurrences which took place during the American war would have opened the eyes of the Government to the impolicy and the injustice of exposing small vessels to those of greater force and power; but experience and remonstrance are equally disregarded. As to what has been said of fitting out twenty sail of the line with the greatest expedition, it is my firm conviction that they could not be fitted out in less than twelve months; and what, during all that time, would become of our colonies and of our commerce? It is true that we cannot have a larger fleet without a greater outlay; but how much better would money be employed for that purpose than in the useless expedition we have had serving on the coast of Spain. I call it useless, for we have obtained nothing by it. The French alone are the gainers, for they have obtained a footing in Minorca. Add to this the expenditure caused by the never-ending Commissions in this country, and you would have a sum amply sufficient to keep the navy in a state fit for any emergency. Looking at the present agitated state of the world, I think it very probable that a war may suddenly break out; and if such should be the case, I earnestly pray that the assurances of the Admiralty, that we have ample means both for offensive and defensive operations may be realised.

SIR T. COCHRANE. — Sir, I am very unwilling to intrude on the patience of the House; but, considering that the best interests of my country are at stake, I cannot avoid making a few remarks. It appears to me that the question of our naval establishment divides itself into two parts. The first of these is as to its comparative strength, when contrasted with the naval armaments of other nations; and the other, whether it is sufficient to promote the extension of our commerce, and to afford it protection when extended. With respect to the first point, — namely, the comparison of foreign naval armaments with ours, — I will, in the first place, refer to our own naval establishment. It has been said that the number of effective seamen, marines, and boys amounts to 35,565, and that 1000 have been added this year, to increase the force of our vessels in commission. Both these statements I venture to deny. We have not that number of men and boys, and even the trifling addition of 1000 has not been made. It will be in the recollection of the House that the packet service has, of late years, been handed over to the superintendence of the Admiralty, and this service is as distinct from the navy as is the military service. Indeed, it is even more distinct. The packet service cannot become available to our naval force, whilst the aid of the troops has been frequently resorted to. The packet service, then, ought not to be even mentioned as a part of our effective naval force. Then there is a considerable number of men engaged in the surveying department, who should also be deducted. The number of men employed in these two services, last year, was 2788, and, in the present year, 3093; so that one third of the 1000 men added this year have been diverted from the particular purpose stated, and transferred to the packet or survey service; consequently, the number of seamen will be, thus, reduced from 24,165 to 21,072. We therefore have, for efficient service, 2,1072 seamen, 9000 marines, and 2000 boys; and, taking two boys for one man, the whole number is 31,072, instead of 35,565. But there is another reduction which has also weakened our effective force very considerably, — namely, the number of small craft which we have employed on the coast of Africa and in the West Indies, for the purpose of suppressing the slave trade. The propriety of this employment of our navy is not to be questioned; on the contrary, it redounds highly to the honour and reputation of this country, that our vessels and men are so employed; but, at the same time, it is obvious that they cannot be called into operation should any sudden emergency render their assistance necessary. They are neither more nor less than an oceanic police. There are only 22 sail of the line in commission; and from these I feel that I have a perfect right to deduct 3, which compose part of the squadron sent to destroy the unfortunate Chinese, whom you have not yet poisoned with your opium; and had it not been for the accidental circumstance of the Government ordering these vessels to be armed, you would not have had ships to send even upon that service. When the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke presided over our naval affairs, with so much credit to himself, and so much advantage to the country, and for which he has been so justly lauded, he established a description of vessels, called demonstration ships, which were rigged, stowed, armed, and put in a perfect state of preparation. Now, what has become of these demonstration ships? We have been told by the Secretary to the Admiralty that, practically, they were found to be of no use in the short-handed state in which they were kept, and that it was far preferable to put the rigging in store, and lay the ships up. But the great point is, not so much the number of ships, as the number of men. I recollect that, in the year 1815, when Buonaparte returned from Elba, the Royal Sovereign was only ten days from hoisting her pendant to being towed into Plymouth Sound. But it is quite impossible that such expedition could be used at the present time. Now, let us look to the naval condition of other countries. See how that of France has increased: her naval force, at present, amounts to from 31,000 to 32,000 men. The French estimate for 1840 was 20,498; but there have been added, since the budget was published, —

	Men.
9 sail of the line . . .	7821
8 corvettes, less 3 corvettes avisos	1270
3 brigs, 226; 7 brigs avisos, 644 .	870
4 brigs, canonniers . . .	208
18 brigs, and 3 small vessels . .	1098
5 steamers	360
	11,627
Add amount of estimate .	20,498
Total . .	32,125

The complements are not official, but they are calculated at the same rate as those given in the budget; so that, in round numbers, the two fleets are nearly equal as to the seamen employed. Now, what is the state of the Russian fleet? She has 1 ship of 120 guns, 3 of 100 guns, 7 of 84 guns, 19 of 74 guns, — making, in all, 30 sail of the line; — 1 frigate of 56 guns, 3 of 52 guns, 18 of 44 guns, besides corvettes, and the whole manned by 33,000 men. Of these there are 16 sail of the line in the Black Sea. It was said, last year, that the Russian fleet was ineffective, — indeed, that it was hardly seaworthy; but a different statement has since been made by an officer who has seen that fleet, and whose report to the Admiralty has produced a different impression there. I have not asked any questions on this subject of the gentleman himself, for I felt a delicacy in applying for information which I might afterwards use in the House; but I understand the communication has been unreservedly made to naval men at the different clubs. Now, with this comparative view of the state of the naval armaments of other countries, I will appeal to the House, and ask whether, looking at France alone, — looking to the extent of her naval armament and your own, — you could reduce one single ship? God forbid that we should anticipate the possibility of a war with France. It would be the most lamentable thing which could occur to the world at large. We are under a moral responsibility to unite with that country to draw nearer the ties which bind us, and not to sever them. The question of peace or war in Europe depends on the union of the two countries, and a dreadful responsibility will rest on the shoulders of those who, from intemperance, folly, or wickedness, would attempt to sow dissension between these two nations. But, I say, looking to the extent of the naval establishment of France, if Russia did not exist, and if the American continent had not been discovered, you could not reduce your establishment by one single ship. But, we ought not to forget the state of the Russian fleet, and that our relations with the United States are of a very delicate nature. I am persuaded that the President of the United States and the American Government have not the slightest wish to go to war with this country; but they have little power when they come into contact with the excitement of the people. Very recently, we were in danger of being involved in a contest with the State of Maine; and it is well known that the insolence of a democracy rises in proportion to the inability to control them. If we were called upon to send a force there, it would scarcely be in a condition to act before the expiration of twelve months; and therefore, in the event of a war breaking out, we should be in a most critical position, for every one must admit that our naval establishment is not on an efficient footing. Let us now consider the state of our navy with regard to its capability to protect our commerce, and, in doing so, I will compare the extent of our commerce, now, with what it was at a fomer period. I will go back to a favourite period with this House; — I mean to the period between the American war and the French war — to the period between the year 1783 and the year 1793. Let us, then, see what was the state of our commerce in the year 1790. At that period, independent of our European commerce, our trade was confined to our East India possessions, to the West India islands, and to the United States of America. From every other port we were excluded. In the year 1790 this country employed 15,015 vessels, with a tonnage of 1,460,000. The value of our exports amounted to 18,544,205*l.*, and the value of the imports was equal to 17,783,572*l.* What is the position of our commerce at the present time? In the first place, England has vast colonial possessions, now, which she had not at the period to which I have referred. England has, now, possession of Malta, the Cape of Good Hope, the Mauritius, the islands of Trinidad, Tobago, and St. Lucie. We are also in possession of a large portion of Guiana, while the whole coast of Spanish America, extending some thousands of miles, is open to our commerce. At this moment, from east to west, from north to south, the ocean is white with the sails of English vessels, and our exports and imports have increased in an enormous degree. On the 31st of December, 1837, this country employed 26,037 vessels, with a tonnage equal to 2,791,018 tons, while their crews amounted to 173,506 men. The number of vessels employed in foreign trade, exclusive of those in ballast or engaged in the coasting trade, was, inwards, 12,252, with a tonnage of 2,346,300, and, outwards, 10,614 vessels, with a tonnage of 1,861,121. The official value of the exports, in 1838, amounted to 105,170,549*l.*, and the imports to 61,268,320*l.* The number of vessels employed between Great Britain and Ireland was 16,347, with a tonnage of 1,585,624; and, in carrying on the rest of our coasting trade, 122,443 vessels were engaged, with a tonnage of 9,315,563.

Such is the state of our commerce now, as compared with what it was in the year 1790. Let us now consider what the state of the English navy was during the peace, or from 1783 to 1793. In the years 1785, 1786, 1787, and 1788, there were 18,000 men employed in the navy; and in the year 1789, 20,000 men. But, before I proceed further, I wish to call the attention of the House to the mode in which the naval force of the country was, at that time, distributed. According to an account printed by order of the House of Commons, on the 23d of June, 1814, the following was the disposition of the navy in the year 1787. In the East Indies there was not a single ship. In Jamaica there was one 50-gun ship, two frigates, and three smaller vessels. In the Leeward Islands, there was one frigate and two smaller vessels; in Nova Scotia, six small vessels; in the Mediterranean, one 50-gun ship and three frigates: the whole force only amounted to nineteen vessels. But, besides these, we had, cruising about the British islands, two frigates and thirty-three smaller vessels; there were also at Portsmouth seven ships of the line, two 50-gun ships, one frigate, and three smaller vessels. At Plymouth there were five line-of-battle ships, one 50-gun ship, one frigate, and three smaller vessels. In the Medway, we had two line-of-battle ships and one small vessel. In the Downs we had one small vessel, and in the Thames we had one frigate and five smaller vessels. In short, we had, abroad, 19 vessels, and at home 68 men-of-war; whereas, now, there is not a pennant to be seen on the whole coast. This statement refers to a period of our effective naval force. Then there is a considerable number of men engaged in the surveying department, who should also be deducted. The number of men employed in these two services, last year, was 2788, and, in the present year, 3093; so that one third of the 1000 men added this year have been diverted from the particular purpose stated, and transferred to the packet or survey service; consequently, the number of seamen will be, thus, reduced from 24,165 to 21,072. We therefore have, for efficient service, 2,107 seamen, 9000 marines, and 2000 bo and, taking two boys for one man whole number is 31,072, instead of But there is another reduction wh also weakened our effective f considerably, — namely, the ol. small craft which we have ere is the coast of Africa and in t m most for the purpose of suppr the House, trade. The propriety erence between of our navy is not to public opinion with the contrary, it re nt, and that which honour and repu to which I have al- that our vessels time, impressment was but, at the sar matter of course; but now they cannot with horror, and it cannot be should any without exciting the strongest assistance detestation. Yet, if any sud- more ne emergency should arise, and it be- There necessary to send out an armament missic America, we should have no resource have impressment. Such a state of things is cor greatly to be deplored, for that abominable de system ought only to be had recourse to in cases of absolute necessity; and it is the duty of this House to take steps to guard against such an emergency. What, then, is to be done to prevent the necessity of resorting to impressment? It is my opinion, and the opinion of officers of high authority, that we ought to keep up a larger home squadron, — a squadron sufficient to command the fear of some nations, and the respect of all. At present, the whole of our force is employed, and we could not send out one vessel should an occasion suddenly arise for so doing; and no one will say, looking at the state of our foreign relations, that it is wise or politic for a great commercial country like England to be so destitute of the means of defence.

I may be told that to increase our naval force would be to create a great additional expense to the country; but, if that increase were made, England would be in a situation to command the respect of other nations, and even to force them to disarm. The expense, therefore, would not be greater than we are put to, at present; for, if we were in a position to en- ght be called being towed into Pl tes were set- it is quite impossib might then be could be used at emed necessary. let us look to nt establishment countries. should become ne- increased ergency, to arm, we amount spatch the vessels at The F nt where their services but and replace those so sent b s. That was the principle the country formerly acted, e no hesitation in saying that principle upon which we ought t present. It is because this coun- as always been prepared for war, even the midst of peace, that it has hitherto commanded the respect of the first maritime nations of Europe. I therefore trust the House will follow the example set in former times, and do everything in its power to put the naval establishment on a footing of the most perfect efficiency. I hope the House will permit me to allude to the great interest which was felt in the state of the navy in former times. In the first place, I will refer to the period when Oliver Cromwell was at the head of the Government of this country. The Protector was so sensible of the respect paid by foreign states to the naval power of England when kept in a respectable condition, that, instead of reducing his navy at the conclusion of the war, in 1654, he ordered all the ships to be repaired, and put into good condition: he also ordered new ones to be built, and filled the storehouses and magazines with all necessaries for the fleet, as if it had been a time of greatest danger. Now, what was the conduct of Parliament in the year 1695? The House of Lords sent up an Address to His Majesty, stating, —

> That, having spent some time upon consideration of the fleet, both at home and abroad, and of the great increase of the naval force and strength of our neighbours, we conceive it to be our duty to your Majesty and the kingdom humbly to represent that the honour and safety of this nation, under the providence of God, chiefly depend upon your strength at sea; and whereas, by the long continuance of this war, the number of your ships must have been diminished, and those remaining greatly impaired, we think it of the highest importance to your Majesty's service, and the security and interest of your people, that you would be pleased to give speedy and effectual directions for the repairs and increase of your royal navy.

In 1697, the King acquainted Parliament, after the peace of Ryswick, —

> That the naval fleet of the kingdom was increased nearly double what it was at his succession, and that the charge of maintaining it would be proportionably increased as it is certainly necessary for the interest and reputation to have always a great strength

I should e Gentleman, of sufe in this House, proess to the Sovereign in the circumstances of the country, a view, before it be too late, to place our navy in such a condition as will command the respect of foreign nations, and secure our honour and welfare at home. I beg to apologise to the House for having trespassed so long upon their time; but, feeling strongly upon this subject, and being convinced that the welfare and prosperity of the country mainly depend upon the efficiency of our naval establishments, I could not sit silent when a question of such importance was under consideration.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON., — I am anxious to say a few words on this question, chiefly because some observations have been made, in the course of this debate, upon that branch of the affairs of the country which have been confided to my care. On the actual subject of debate I need scarcely say anything, for almost every one who has spoken, has approved of the amount of the vote called for on the present occasion. The Honourable Baronet the Member for Stamford, who commenced the debate, gave his testimony in favour of the judicious arrangement of the provision stores, and also as to the number of workmen employed; and I appeal to the Honourable and Gallant Officer who has just sat down, whether we have proposed too great a number of ships. The considerations which ought to guide a Government with respect to the navy are two fold. One question is, what should be the amount of the ships possessed by the country? and that must necessarily depend on a general view of the existing naval resources of other nations, with whom we may possibly come into collision. What portion of such force shall, from year to year, be placed in commission, is quite a different question, and one that must depend on the ever-varying circumstances of the day. The distribution of the naval force of the country, so put in commission, must also depend on circumstances of a still more fluctuating and temporary nature. Now, it has been already shown that the Government are taking the most vigorous and effectual means to place the aggregate amount of the naval force of the state on such a footing as is necessary for the permanent safety and defence of the country. All who have spoken on this question have admitted this, except the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, who, alone, is of opinion that there are already too many ships in commission. While the Government have been by some accused of carrying on a war with a peace establishment, by others they have been charged with maintaining a war establishment in a time of peace. I am willing to put those two assertions against each other, and thus to show that the Government have adequately and judiciously judged of the exigencies of the public service. To be sure, the Honourable Baronet has stated it as his opinion, that although the amount of the naval force is not more than is necessary, yet the Government have given rise to that necessity by their mistaken course of foreign policy; that they have kept the world in a state of constant agitation; and by so doing, have created the necessity for an increased naval force. Now, I can only say, that in our foreign policy we have been, at least, tolerably successful; that, whether the objects at which we have aimed have or have not met the approbation of the Honourable Baronet, we have generally succeeded in carrying the points to which we have directed our attention. And if we have so succeeded in effecting our objects, still preserving a peace establishment — (always reserving the objection of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that even that peace establishment is too large,) — and thus saving the country from additional expenses, those, even, who disagree in the policy of our measures, must at least admit that we have shown judgment in carrying them into execution. But the Honourable Baronet says we are the dupes of France; that France is pursuing the policy of the Duc de Choiseul, — that France, intending to undermine our strength, is compelling us to wear ourselves out in time of peace, by forcing on us the expenditure necessary in a time of of profound peace; and, at the present moment, there is a prospect of war from almost every quarter. It may be said that many of the vessels I have enumerated were only guard-ships; but, even if they were to be so considered, still they could have been sent out on an emergency, and their places would have been supplied by others. But what was the fact? In the year 1790, in consequence of a dispute with Spain, about a miserable plot of ground, not worth 1000*l.* on the north-west coast of America,—and in consequence of the capture of a small vessel,—this country called upon Spain for redress. Spain declined to comply with the demands, and this country armed itself, and prepared for war; and, so far from our sending out guard-ships and nothing more, upwards of 3,000,000*l.* were expended in preparations. There is one material fact to which I am most anxious to call the attention of the House, and that is, the great difference between the present state of public opinion with regard to impressment, and that which prevailed at the time to which I have alluded. At that time, impressment was resorted to as a matter of course; but now it is viewed with horror, and it cannot be resorted to without exciting the strongest feelings of detestation. Yet, if any sudden emergency should arise, and it became necessary to send out an armament to America, we should have no resource but impressment. Such a state of things is greatly to be deplored, for that abominable system ought only to be had recourse to in cases of absolute necessity; and it is the duty of this House to take steps to guard against such an emergency. What, then, is to be done to prevent the necessity of resorting to impressment? It is my opinion, and the opinion of officers of high authority, that we ought to keep up a larger home squadron,—a squadron sufficient to command the fear of some nations, and the respect of all. At present, the whole of our force is employed, and we could not send out one vessel should an occasion suddenly arise for so doing; and no one will say, looking at the state of our foreign relations, that it is wise or politic for a great commercial country like England to be so destitute of the means of defence.

I may be told that to increase our naval force would be to create a great additional expense to the country; but, if that increase were made, England would be in a situation to command the respect of other nations, and even to force them to disarm. The expense, therefore, would not be greater than we are put to, at present; for, if we were in a position to enforce our rights, our fleets might be called home as soon as the disputes were settled, and such reductions might then be made as might be deemed necessary. If a strong permanent establishment were kept up, and it should become necessary, on any emergency, to arm, we might at once despatch the vessels at home to the point where their services were wanted, and replace those so sent out, by others. That was the principle upon which the country formerly acted, and I have no hesitation in saying that it is the principle upon which we ought to act at present. It is because this country has always been prepared for war, even in the midst of peace, that it has hitherto commanded the respect of the first maritime nations of Europe. I therefore trust the House will follow the example set in former times, and do everything in its power to put the naval establishment on a footing of the most perfect efficiency. I hope the House will permit me to allude to the great interest which was felt in the state of the navy in former times. In 1697, the King acquainted Parliament, after the peace of Ryswick,— of England to have always a great strength at sea.

In 1707, another Address was presented to the Crown on this subject, in which it was stated that —

> It is a most undoubted maxim, that the honour, security, and wealth of this kingdom do depend upon the protection and encouragement of trade, and the improving and right managing its naval strength. Other nations, who were formerly great and powerful at sea, have, by negligence and mismanagement, lost their trade, and have seen their maritime power entirely ruined; therefore, we do in the most earnest manner beseech your Majesty that the sea affairs may always be your first and most peculiar care.

The documents which I have quoted relate to times of peace; and I trust the House will not now neglect the precautions which were then taken. I should be happy to hear some Gentleman, of sufficient importance in this House, propose an Address to the Sovereign in the present circumstances of the country, with a view, before it be too late, to place our navy in such a condition as will command the respect of foreign nations, and secure our honour and welfare at home. I beg to apologise to the House for having trespassed so long upon their time; but, feeling strongly upon this subject, and being convinced that the welfare and prosperity of the country mainly depend upon the efficiency of our naval establishments, I could not sit silent when a question of such importance was under consideration.

I am willing to put those two assertions against each other, and thus to show that the Government have adequately and judiciously judged of the exigencies of the public service. To be sure, the Honourable Baronet has stated it as his opinion, that although the amount of the naval force is not more than is necessary, yet the Government have given rise to that necessity by their mistaken course of foreign policy; that they have kept the world in a state of constant agitation; and by so doing, have created the necessity for an increased naval force. Now, I can only say, that in our foreign policy we have been, at least, tolerably successful; that, whether the objects at which we have aimed have or have not met the approbation of the Honourable Baronet, we have generally succeeded in carrying the points to which we have directed our attention. And if we have so succeeded in effecting our objects, still preserving a peace establishment — (always reserving the objection of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that even that peace establishment is too large,)—and thus saving the country from additional expenses, those, even, who disagree in the policy of our measures, must at least admit that we have shown judgment in carrying them into execution. But the Honourable Baronet says we are the dupes of France; that France is pursuing the policy of the Duc de Choiseul, — that France, intending to undermine our strength, is compelling us to wear ourselves out in time of peace, by forcing on us the expenditure necessary in a time of war. The answer to that assertion, however, is given in the speeches of Honourable Gentlemen opposite, who tell us that France is keeping up a much larger peace establishment than we are. So that, according to this argument, the mode adopted by France, in order to ruin us is — first to ruin herself. But the fact really is, that there exist no such hostile intentions on the part of France as are imputed to that power by Honourable Gentlemen opposite. Even the amount of the naval force now stated to be kept up by France is, in some degree, temporary, because, of the ships at present at Toulon, a great number are getting ready for sea, in order to take the place of others whose time of service has expired, and which are on their return from the Levant and other parts of the world. The Honourable Baronet also complains of the distribution of our forces, and says that we ought not to have large ships of war lying in harbour at Lisbon. I differ from the Honourable Baronet on that subject, because I think that ships lying in harbour at Lisbon are quite as available for any emergency as if they were lying in our own harbours at home. Nay, more, — ships so situated are, in many respects, more available; because, if it was necessary to send them on a particular service, and if, at the same time, it was wished that their destination should not be known, those ships can be sent with much more secrecy with sealed orders from Lisbon, than if they were to sail direct from any of the harbours of this country. Lisbon is one of the most central stations in which ships can be placed; and, whether it may be necessary to send them to the Mediterranean, or to any other part of the world, they are quite as available for the purpose as if they were lying at Portsmouth or Plymouth. The Honourable Baronet also says, that we have made a very great mistake in having the ships at Lisbon, if our object be to maintain any influence over the Portuguese Government; and that, if we wanted to compel the Portuguese Government to adopt any measures, we should have done better by keeping those vessels out of sight until the moment when it might be necessary to make the required demonstration. Push this argument to its legitimate consequences, and it will follow that we should be better off if we had no fleet at all. If the absence of ships would give us influence, then the fault of Government must be, the having too many ships, and not the having too few! With regard to the distribution of the fleet, that is a matter which must be governed in a great measure, if not entirely, by the circumstances of the day. It is obvious that at the present time we ought to have a considerable force in the Mediterranean; and there the great bulk of our fleet is at present stationed. But it is said that our own shores are not sufficiently protected. Undoubtedly, if there were reasonable ground for expecting any hostile attack, we should not have force enough; but I am happy to say that from no quarter is there the least ground for apprehending any such attack. As far as Russia and her fleet are concerned—(and the state of our relations with Russia has been made matter of reproach), — it would be quite preposterous to ask the country to go to the expense of putting to sea a fleet against a power to whom no inimical intentions are imputed.

I will now say a word or two on what has fallen from my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny, on the subject of the general system of our foreign policy, particularly with regard to affairs in the Levant. I am not going into a detailed argument on that question, in the present state of affairs; but I must say that my Honourable Friend has laid down principles which would lead to consequences inconsistent with his own views. My Honourable Friend has stated that the object of the foreign policy of this country ought to be to maintain the integrity and independence of Turkey, — that the Ottoman empire should not be dismembered; yet he, at the same time, argued, that we ought to re-establish peace between Mehemet Ali and the Sultan. And how? Why by inducing the concession, on the part of the Sultan, of all the demands of Mehemet Ali; by the virtual, nay, by the actual, cession of a large portion of the dominions of the Sultan. I contend that the course which the British Government have pursued, for the maintenance of the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire, is founded on a just regard for the best interests of this country as connected with the state of affairs in that part of the world; and that, so far from tending to bring on war, it is the only course to prevent events taking place in those parts of the world which must ultimately lead to a general European war on an extensive scale. This is not a time for going at any length into that question. I have merely touched upon it in order to enter my protest against the doctrines of my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny. I am quite sure my Honourable Friend does not desire war; but I am equally sure that, if the course recommended by him were acted upon, the peace of this country would be sacrificed, and a general war in Europe would be the consequence.

SIR R. PEEL.—Sir, it is my intention to give my vote, without the least hesitation or reluctance, in favour of the full amount proposed for the navy estimates of the present year; and I cannot concur in the view which has been taken by the Honourable Gentleman (the great and consistent advocate of economy in this House), who proposes to maintain the establishments of this country without any reference, in time of peace, to the establishments of other countries. I conceive it to be quite impossible to disregard the efforts now made by other countries to maintain a great naval establishment. A profound peace may prevail, yet the gradual progressive increase of the naval power of a neighbouring country may be indicative of hostility to us. The very efforts made by a country, without any apparent necessity, to lay the foundation of a great maritime power, may, when those exertions are completed, if our inferiority be satisfactorily established, enable that country to choose a moment for the commencement of offensive operations. And in the relations of any two great European countries, unfortunately, there seldom is a time at which some plausible cause for hostilities may not be found; and, therefore, I consider it impossible that we should so conduct our affairs as to be entirely irrespective of the establishments of other countries. If we permit other countries to increase their naval establishments, while, at the same time, we diminish our own, so far from promoting the ends of true economy, we may be undermining the foundations of our security on the one hand, and, on the other, entailing a great additional expense upon the country. It was with the utmost surprise that I heard the Honourable Gentleman attribute to Her Majesty's Government, and particularly to the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the whole responsibility of the progressive increase in our establishments,—and ascribe, too, the decrease of our financial prosperity to the gross impolicy with which our foreign affairs have been managed, when I recollect the apparent cordiality with which the Honourable Gentleman, a few nights since, voted—his entire confidence in that policy: and I must say, that if the Honourable Gentleman had made upon that occasion the speech which we have heard to-night, I think his modesty must have prevented him from recording that vote. The Noble Lord opposite has congratulated himself upon maintaining a happy medium, because some persons complain that the naval establishment of this country is not sufficient, while others aver that we are maintaining a war establishment in time of peace. The Noble Lord argued that these two observations, being contradictory, afforded a strong proof that Her Majesty's Government had hit the happy medium. Now, so far from these propositions being contradictory, they may be reconciled with the most perfect ease. It may be true that we are in a nominal state of profound peace, and that, as stated in Her Majesty's Speech from the throne, assurances may be received from all quarters that foreign powers are desirous of maintaining with her Government the most amicable terms; it may be that we have a war establishment, and an inadequate one; and yet I cannot see how these two propositions are in the slightest degree contradictory, or how they prove that Her Majesty's Government have preserved this happy medium. I believe that it is in a great measure owing to the policy which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government that we are in our present condition.

But the Noble Lord says, "Whatever complaints you may prefer in particular instances, at all events you must admit that my foreign policy has been successful." Now, this is a very happy assumption on the part of the Noble Lord; but it is one which we entirely dispute. I should like to know what is the ground of success. Twenty-five years have now elapsed since the establishment of a general peace throughout Europe. What progress have we made since that period towards a diminution of the national burdens? I should have imagined that the indications of our success would have been, that so great was the confidence which we had established amongst foreign powers,—so prevalent was the influence of our mediation and example,—that the powers of Europe generally were discontinuing or greatly diminishing their armaments; and that now, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, we were enjoying the beneficial fruits of internal tranquillity, and reaping a rich harvest of commercial industry. But can we make that boast? Has the Noble Lord given proof of the success of his foreign policy, by diminishing our military expenses? On the contrary, has there not been a gradual increase?—a necessary increase it may be; but let not the Noble Lord say that his policy has been successful. Surely, in the twenty-fifth year of peace, the success of our policy ought to have been demonstrated by a considerable reduction in this important branch of expenditure. But, instead of retrenchment, have we not been making preparation for war during a time of peace? Is the state of our finances a happy one at the present time? Does the Noble Lord bear in mind, that, for the last four years, there has been a regular deficiency of income? In 1837 there was a deficiency; in 1838 a deficiency; in 1839 a deficiency; in 1840 an increased deficiency;—mainly on account of the increase in our military establishment. So far, therefore, as the state of our finances and the indications of general tranquillity are considered, I do not think that the Noble Lord has much to congratulate himself upon. I am willing to abide by the test which the Noble Lord himself has proposed, as to the merits of his foreign policy — the test of that eminent success of which he has boasted. Let us examine that policy in detail. The point, I presume, upon which the Noble Lord chiefly rests his allegation of success is the quadruple alliance, — the treaty which was intended to form a lasting bond of amity between the four western powers of Europe, as a counterpoise to the diplomatic influence of the despotic powers in the north and the east. The Noble Lord prophesied, that between those four powers— England, France, Spain, and Portugal — bound together by the common sympathies of a liberal and constitutional form of government, there was to be entire concord and harmony; that the influence of England in the Peninsula would be established on a permanent basis; and that the intimate union between the four powers would present an impenetrable barrier to all the aggressions of despotic Governments. I will begin with Portugal. The Noble Lord says, "At least our efforts have been successful there." That may be, and yet it may be no proof of merit, although it would undoubtedly, primâ facie, afford a presumption that the policy which led to those successful results was correct in principle. But what is the Noble Lord's influence in Portugal? Why does he keep three sail of the line at Lisbon? An Honourable Member has said, "Remove them, and you will have more influence with the Portuguese Government." Upon what assumption? Why, that you keep three sail of the line there to protect the Government which you have established, and that, relying on their protection, Portugal is enabled to defy our power and disregard our representations, because she is safe in the protection of our own three sail of the line. On this ground the Honourable Member asks the Government to try the effect of removing the fleet. Upon which the Noble Lord thinks it a triumphant answer to say, "It is rather a proof that you think, if England had no fleet at all, her influence would be increased throughout Europe." Now, what account has the Noble Lord given of his influence with Portugal? The debate commenced with the presentation of a petition by my Noble Friend the Member for Liverpool, complaining that Portugal has treated with the greatest injustice, and with utter disregard and contumely, the just claims of British subjects, and accompanied this injustice with every species of insult. Does the Noble Lord deny the allegation? Not at all. He says, that he agrees in almost every word stated by my Noble Friend; that the faithless conduct of the Government of Portugal has been well described, — that Government which we established, and to establish which we departed from the ordinary line of British policy, not to interfere in the domestic concerns of foreign countries. The Noble Lord says that his influence with that Government has been so small for the last five years, that, notwithstanding every successive change in its constitution, and in the individual members of whom it is composed, he has not been enabled to procure for England that satisfaction — that bare justice — which it appears Belgium has obtained for her subjects in Portugal. The Noble Lord's defence is, "I admit all your allegations; but so small is our influence with that country, whose Government we ourselves established, that, although for five years I have been repeating my entreaties and remonstrances, they have not been attended to; but I now promise you that a Commission shall be appointed in London, — if possible, with the concurrence of Portugal; if not, without it, — and whatever it may report, that will I exact from the Government with which I have been so successful." So much for what private claims are. But what did the Noble Lord tell the House during the last Session, with respect to the slave trade? What did he say of Portugal, — this ancient ally of England, which formerly was attached to this country by feeling as well as by interest, and whose present Government owes its very existence to our departure from the principle of non-intervention in the domestic concerns of other nations? I am now quoting from memory, but I believe the Noble Lord said, last year, "If ever there was a flagrant violation of national faith, it was that which had been committed by Portugal. It was not merely that she had turned a deaf ear to the interests of humanity — that she had disregarded every appeal which had been made to her — that she had positively violated her compact with this country — (for Portugal had received a pecuniary equivalent from England, about half a million sterling having been paid to her to induce her to relinquish her traffic in slaves); — but, although we had a pecuniary claim on Portugal, and had made her an advance beforehand, upon a specified condition, yet she had swindled us out of our money;" and then the Noble Lord added, "I ask of you, the Parliament of England, to pass a Bill to prop up my defective influence, and force from Portugal that justice which she will not render to my remonstrance." Such, then, is the success with which the Noble Lord's policy has been attended, in the case of one power which was a party to the quadruple alliance! I will now come to the case of Spain. A short time ago I saw a correspondence in the papers, from which it appeared that the British merchants resident at the Havannah, having subscribed a considerable sum to provide a religious service, there, in accordance with the rites of the Church of England, applied to the Noble Lord to use his influence with the Spanish Government to obtain the desired permission. The Noble Lord, in consideration of all the important services which he had rendered to that country, could surely not have the smallest difficulty in obtaining so slight a favour. And this appeared to have been the Noble Lord's opinion at the time, for he stated at once that he would make the desired application to the Spanish Government. And the Noble Lord did make the application; but for several weeks no answer was returned. At last the Noble Lord acquainted the House that, having made his application to the Spanish Government, backed by all the influence of the British Crown, which was upon so friendly a footing with Spain, — such was the forgetfulness of the obligations which Spain owed us, that he found it impossible to procure from the Spanish Government the small boon, to the British subjects resident at the Havannah, of permission to celebrate divine service according to the ritual of the Protestant religion. I thought that one great object of the treaty of quadruple alliance was to introduce greater toleration into the international dealings of the Peninsular powers; that the progress of civilisation and refinement, which a liberal form of government would introduce, was one of the grounds upon which we were called on to interfere. That interference has taken place, — our money has been advanced, — the blood of British soldiers has been spilt, — and yet, what is the proof of our influence with the Government of constitutional Spain? Why, that the Noble Lord has not been able to procure this small favour from the Government which he had established, three months after the success of his interference in its behalf! But, on the other hand, what is the influence of the French Government with Spain? I do not think that the interference of France, in arranging the domestic affairs of Spain, was carried to a greater extent than that of England. One of the great recommendations urged, when the project of the quadruple alliance was introduced into Parliament, was, that British influence would become paramount in the Peninsula. Now, how did the French succeed when they applied to Spain for the possession of Port Mahon? The Spanish authorities at Port Mahon protested against it. It was protested against by a committee of the Cortes; the Noble Lord himself entertained a strong feeling of jealousy on the subject; but, notwithstanding all these objections, the island is now in the possession of the French. How much more important is the concession made to the French, than the favour which was asked, in vain, for the British residents at the Havannah! So much for Spain, the second party to the quadruple alliance. And now, I come to France. Again, I repeat, that I most deeply lament the manifestation of a growing jealousy between this country and France. What greater proof could the Noble Lord have given of the success resulting from the quadruple alliance, than the reduction of the national establishments, and the increase of mutual confidence; but, above all, a forbearance on the part of France, during a time of peace, to increase her naval force to such an extent, that we are compelled to provide extravagant estimates, in order that we may not be taken unprepared. Success! Our cordial relations with France! Can the Noble Lord deny that the French have fifteen sail of the line in the Mediterranean? Why have we twelve sail, there, at this moment? Why does the Noble Lord boast that Lisbon is so conveniently situated, that we can easily add to that force? Why, having only twenty-one sail of the line altogether, have we fifteen of them stationed in the Mediterranean, or its immediate neighbourhood? Is it for the purpose of interfering between the Porte and Egypt? Is it not, undeniably, on account of the predominant influence of France, that you are unwilling to leave the Mediterranean without three fifths of your naval force either there or in its vicinity? Then, with respect to the demands of this country on France for compensation for the grievances and wrongs sustained by our merchants on the coast of Africa; have they been adjusted? Have those grievances, which were brought forward by one of the keenest supporters of the present Government (the Honourable and Learned Member for the Tower Hamlets) been redressed? If the influence of the Noble Lord with foreign powers be sufficient to justify the boast which he has this night made — (and I am now speaking only of those powers which are united, in a peculiar bond of amity, by the quadruple alliance); — and, if the policy of the Noble Lord have been so successful; I ask how does it happen that, up to this hour, he has not obtained the slightest reparation from France for the injuries which he admits the British merchants have sustained? I say, in the first place, that the Noble Lord cannot give the House any indications of that complete success in his foreign policy, which would have been best shown by retrenchments in his estimates, and by reduction in his military establishments; and I have now proved that the Noble Lord cannot give the House any indications of it in the compliance of foreign powers with the just and equitable demands of his Government. It is possible that the Noble Lord may boast of the complete success of his policy in settling the boundary question on the north-east frontier of the United States. That question has been long pending between the two Governments of Great Britain and the United States; and the indications which I see in the papers before the House are not such as to induce me to place any confidence in the boast of complete success which the Noble Lord has uttered, upon this portion of his policy.

Travelling to the east of Europe, I recollect a boast, or rather a pledge, given by the Noble Lord, in his place in Parliament, that three months should not elapse without England's having a representative at Cracow. If the Noble Lord had not made a boast on that subject, no one would have had a right to quarrel with him. Difficulties may have occurred which it was not possible for the Noble Lord to encounter; but then the Noble Lord — knowing, as he must have done, the jealousies which he would have to encounter in any negotiations relative to Cracow — ought not, as a Member of the British Parliament, and still more as the Foreign Minister of the British Cabinet, to have given a pledge in public that such and such an event should take place within a given time. I do not mean to say that, under peculiar circumstances, it might not be right to give such a pledge; but this I do mean to assert, that such a pledge ought not to have been given unless it were intended to redeem it; and that, at any rate, he who gave it, and did not redeem it, ought to abstain from boasting of the complete and uniform success of his foreign policy. Into the great questions connected with the present state of affairs in the Levant, I will not now enter. At the commencement of the Session, I asked the Noble Lord a question on the subject, which he desired me not to press, as a sense of public duty would forbid him from answering it; but if I were to enter into that question, I think that there, again, I should find room for arguing that the Noble Lord can produce no proof that the success of his foreign policy has been complete and triumphant. I intended to take no share in the present debate; but I could not hear the Noble Lord's triumphant declaration that his foreign policy had been so successful, without entering my decided protest against its correctness.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — Sir, I have listened to the speech of the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth with a mixed sensation of pain and of pleasure, — with pain to think that an individual standing in his eminent position, and filling so ample a space in the eyes of Europe, should, in discussing the important interests of this country, and the tendency of its foreign policy, have taken so narrow and so limited a view of it as to put the great issue — whether the foreign policy of the Government be wise or not — on such petty matters as those which he has mentioned, totally forgetting all those great considerations which ought to have presented themselves to his mind, and the absence of which has been to me a source of pleasure, because I well know that the Right Honourable Gentleman had too statesmanlike a mind not to have adverted to them, if those considerations would have served his purpose. I am almost ashamed to follow the Right Honourable Gentleman through what I must call, without meaning the slightest disrespect to him, the miserable, paltry details on which he has rested the whole strength of his case. Out of deference, however, to the House, I will pursue the Right Honourable Gentleman through the different subjects which he has made the theme of his vituperations against the Government. And, first, with respect to Portugal, which is always a sore point with the Right Honourable Baronet, because it was the first point on which the policy of the Liberal Government came into collision with that of the Right Honourable Baronet. It was in Portugal that we found the Right Honourable Baronet the defender and protector of Don Miguel. It was in Portugal that we found him on the very point of acknowledging an usurper, merely because that usurper had overthrown a constitution. It was in Portugal that the first attacks were made by the Right Honourable Baronet and his supporters on the foreign policy of the Liberal Government; and it was because that Government supported the cause of Donna Maria and of the constitution in Portugal, that every term of contumely and reproach was heaped upon me, personally, as the organ of it, and that every prophecy of disgrace and discomfiture was hurled against me from the other side of the House. I say that the cause which we undertook has succeeded, in spite of all that the Right Honourable Baronet has said to the contrary. Nay, the Right Honourable Baronet himself has admitted that it has succeeded, for he has talked of the form of government which we have "established," and, by so doing, he has "established" the very doctrine which he had attempted to refute. Perhaps it was not to be expected that the Right Honourable Baronet would concur in the feelings of those who thought they had done a service to the cause of good government in rescuing Portugal from the tender mercies of an usurper, like Don Miguel. "But," said the Right Honourable Baronet, "you have no influence now in Portugal, because Portugal refuses to admit your claims." Now, I will ask the Right Honourable Baronet whether Don Miguel admitted the claims of the British Government when he was the Minister who advocated them? Was the Right Honourable Baronet more successful than the present Government has been in getting satisfaction for British claimants? Were the former Governments of Portugal — those Governments in which the will of one man was the law of all — more disposed to put down the slave trade than the present constitutional Government? If the Right Honourable Baronet will only look back to what occurred in Portugal under his protegé Don Miguel, he will not find that the spirit of the Portuguese Government to support the slave trade is more intense, now, than it was, formerly. We have, however, done that which the Right Honourable Baronet did not even attempt to do. We have taken vigorous measures to compel Portugal to put down the slave trade, and we have not been afraid to incur the displeasure of the present Government of that country, whatever may have been the ceremony which the Right Honourable Baronet used towards the protected Administration of Don Miguel.

Now, with respect to Spain, — a country in which a severer struggle has recently been carried on between a despotic and a popular form of government than any which has been witnessed in modern history. Looking at the conduct of Spain, and judging of the policy of the British Cabinet, its motives, its objects, and its success, the Right Honourable Baronet can find no spot in it on which to place the finger of scorn, except the refusal of the Governor of Havannah to allow a Protestant chapel to be established in that port. Will the Right Honourable Baronet permit me to ask him one question in return for the many which the Right Honourable Baronet has put to me? Does the Right Honourable Baronet think that, if Don Carlos and the Inquisition had been established at Madrid, there would have been a stronger disposition in the Court of Spain than there is at present to allow the legalised introduction of Protestant worship into the dominions of that country? But can the Right Honourable Baronet look with indifference on the success of the Spanish people in shaking off the yoke of a despotism which was calculated to cramp all their energies, and to wither, in the bud, every hope of prosperity? Can he not enter into the feelings of those who have, in despite of every attempt to thwart their endeavours, stedfastly supported that cause? Can he not enter into the feelings of those who feel some triumph — and, surely, it is a justifiable triumph — in the complete success of the policy they have pursued?

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I say, the complete success ——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

— for, whatever any man may anticipate as to the precise period at which the embers of the civil war still smouldering in Spain shall be extinguished, one thing is quite certain,—that the flame of liberty will not be extinguished, but will continue to burn on with a clear and steady lustre, because the constitution of Spain has been established; and that country, having been rescued from the debased situation in which she has so long been sunk, is qualified to become, as she soon will become, an important element in the balance of power in Europe. Can the Right Honourable Baronet, who aspires to be the first Minister of this great country,—who thinks himself qualified, and whom so many persons consider so well qualified, to guide the destinies of England, and to direct its foreign as well as its domestic policy,—can the Right Honourable Baronet close his eyes and blind his views to the various important results, and their bearings, which must arise from re-establishing Spain as an element in the balance of the powers of Europe? Can the Right Honourable Baronet see no other advantage likely to result to this country from such a consummation, except that of obtaining permission to establish a Protestant church at Havannah? "But," says the Right Honourable Baronet, "I will try the present Government, not only by the failure of their influence, but by the test of the success of French influence, in Spain." And what is the mighty success alluded to? Why, I could hardly believe my own ears when I heard the Right Honourable Baronet mention, as a triumph of French influence dangerous to this country, the fact that the French have obtained a lease for two years of a small island off Port Mahon, for which they pay a rent of sixteen dollars a month; a lease, too, which they bought of the Americans, as anybody would buy a lease of a house. But if the Right Honourable Baronet asks what we have done to rescue Spain from any foreign influence whatever,—be it that of France or any other country,—I will tell him that, by establishing a constitutional Government, by introducing popular control over the Executive, we have done more to secure the independence of Spain than we could have done by getting the Spaniards to concede the lease of a paltry island.

Then the Right Honourable Baronet turns to France, and says that we have boasted of having cemented a good understanding between the two countries; but, he asks, what has it all come to? and he tauntingly remarks, that France has fifteen sail of the line in the Mediterranean. The Right Honourable Baronet complains, moreover, that a spirit of hostility towards this country is growing up in France. If I were to be asked what is the cause of that spirit of hostility,—what, at least, is the probable cause of it,—I should say, it is the language which has been held during the last four or five years — not by the Right Honourable Baronet, because he knows too well the consequences of indulging in that strain, but — by all the Gentlemen who surround him, and by all the party in another place, who, seizing on every little incident which they think may be used for creating ill-will between the two nations, endeavour, by every means, to excite the jealousy of England, and to revive her ancient animosity against France; and, by so doing, to provoke, of necessity, corresponding feelings on the part of France towards us. That part of the public press, too, which may be supposed to speak the opinions of Gentlemen opposite, has been, for a great length of time, holding the same irritating language, and exciting a return of it from the French newspapers. If there were, which I do not believe, a growing spirit of jealousy and unfriendliness towards England with any considerable party in France, I certainly could not be surprised at it, seeing the tone and manner in which everything connected with France has, for a long time past, been treated by Gentlemen on the other side of the House. But I am happy to say this is not the case, and that there are obvious bonds of union, deeply rooted, and firmly founded on the most vital interests of the two nations, existing between Great Britain and France; and I can relieve the mind of the Right Honourable Baronet, by assuring him that I have the firmest conviction that the Government of France, and all those statesmen who have the greatest influence on the policy of that country, are as strongly convinced as we are, that the friendly union now happily subsisting between these great powers is as essential to the interests of both nations as it is to the general peace and happiness of Europe. I have not thought it worth while to dwell on the instances of our "success" that may be considered an excellent set-off against the cession of the lease of an island off Port Mahon, and the existence of fifteen French sail of the line in the Mediterranean. I have not thought it worth while to mention that from Spain, a Government with which we have no influence, according to the Right Honourable Baronet, we have obtained a treaty for the suppression of the slave trade, which no Administration was ever before able to obtain; that from France we have obtained a treaty of the same kind, giving a mutual right of search, — a right which it is obvious there were many reasons to prevent the French from conceding, except with great difficulty. I will not dwell on these things, though I think them no bad set-off against those on which the Right Honourable Baronet has laid great stress; but I assert that, if it has been a main object of our policy, as it undoubtedly has been, to cement a good understanding between England and France, in that object we have entirely succeeded.

But, then, the Right Honourable Baronet has ventured on another topic of accusation, and charged me with having, on a former occasion, boasted that in three months a consul should be sent out to Cracow. Now I boasted of no such thing. A Right Honourable Friend of mine had submitted a motion for an Address to the Crown, among other matters, to appoint a consul at Cracow. I then stated that it was the intention of Government to appoint a consul at that place, and thereupon the motion was withdrawn. Undoubtedly that was our intention; but circumstances afterwards occurred which induced us to alter that intention.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I repeat, that I made no boast on the subject; but we did not carry our intentions into execution, because we found that such a step would give umbrage.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

In the first place, it would have given infinite umbrage to the powers which had the chief command over Cracow, and, in point of fact, if those powers had chosen to make the Cracovian authorities refuse to receive our consul, they would have refused, and we should have had no power to compel them to accept him. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, it did not appear to us that there was a sufficient motive for sending a consul thither.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I know that strong feelings are entertained by some Honourable Members on this point; but whenever the matter is brought under consideration, I shall be perfectly ready to meet it. These, I believe, are all the topics on which the Right Honourable Baronet touched, except the accusation, that the present Government has not succeeded in composing differences. Why, I maintain that in that object we have been most successful, for we have, notoriously, composed differences, and those of a very embarrassing and delicate kind. A great difference had been growing up between two powerful countries, with each of which it was of the utmost importance that the British empire should maintain peaceful relations—France and the United States. Those countries were quarrelling on a point of honour, and could not come to an accommodation without the intervention of a common friend. We stood forward; — we settled, we composed that difference; — we prevented a war which would have been most calamitous to both parties, and which might have involved this country, too, in the blaze. Again: there had arisen a difference between France and Mexico, which might not have had consequences so serious to the contending parties, but which would have caused great injury to England in its commercial relations. The present Government composed that difference too. "Oh, but," says the Right Honourable Baronet, "you have not composed the difference respecting the north-eastern boundary of the American provinces." We have not yet done that, certainly; but I beg to ask the Right Honourable Baronet whether former Governments have been more successful — whether the Right Honourable Baronet himself was more successful? Did he find it an easy question, or was it more near to a settlement in the Right Honourable Baronet's day than it is at present? If the Right Honourable Baronet had endeavoured to pick out the narrowest and smallest topics to which to draw the attention of the House, he could not have succeeded better. But to be able to judge of the foreign policy of a Government, a higher and broader range ought to be taken than a few isolated points. Our great object has been to preserve peace. We were told by an Honourable Member opposite, on succeeding to power, that we could not preserve peace for three months; but we have preserved it for ten years. Our policy has not been to intermeddle in the affairs of other countries, but, by the legitimate exercise of the influence of Great Britain, to support other nations in their struggles to obtain for themselves institutions similar to those which have been described as forming the boast of this country. In that object we have succeeded; for in no equal period of time, I will venture to assert, has civil liberty made such progress, as in those years during which, according to the Right Honourable Baronet, we have been singularly unfortunate. We have really been successful in so many things, that I had almost forgotten to recall to the recollection of the House the successful close of the negotiations relating to Belgium. That was an arrangement of no small difficulty,— of no inconsiderable importance to Europe, — of no small moment, especially to England; and yet we brought those intricate negotiations to an end without involving Europe in war, which was so often predicted as the inevitable result of all our efforts. But while we have protected the friends of civil liberty in Europe, have we thereby forfeited the friendship and good-will of those powers whose Governments are constructed on a different principle? I answer, confidently and boldly, No. Although reproached with having alienated for ever our ancient allies, the Dutch, we have obtained from them a treaty of commerce, abolishing those differential duties, which former Administrations, disposed to be most friendly to Holland, endeavoured in vain to get rid of. We have concluded with the Governments of Turkey and Austria treaties of the utmost importance, which, when fully in operation, will confer extensive benefits on our trade. I ask, again, whether, in pursuing that course which we considered best adapted to secure the interests and welfare of the empire, we have lost the friendship or forfeited the good-will of other states? I confidently affirm — No: for if, at any one time more than at another, the Governments of Austria, Russia, and Prussia were disposed to place confidence in that of England, it is at the present moment. I therefore say that the Right Honourable Baronet has utterly failed to establish the positions with which he set out; and I fearlessly assert, that in everything of importance which we have attempted to accomplish, we have hitherto succeeded.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and, "Oh, oh!" from the Opposition benches.]

I know that many of those objects are distasteful to Gentlemen opposite, but I nevertheless consider them calculated to promote and secure the best interests of England.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

So far from the Right Honourable Baronet having shown that I boasted of success where we had not accomplished our objects, I think I have established not only the entire futility of his objections, but have stated sufficient to convince the House that I did not make the assertion which has been so much commented on, without good and substantial ground for so doing.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, there are two or three points in the speech of the Noble Lord which I will very briefly notice. In the first place, I will advert to the general tenour of my own observations. They were made in answer to a boast by the Noble Lord that under his administration of the foreign policy of this country the influence of England has had a predominating weight. I therefore referred to the extent of our influence with three of the parties to the Quadruple Treaty. I first alluded to Portugal, and I turned to our negotiations on the subject of the slave trade with that power, by whom, upon the admission of the Noble Lord himself, every engagement made with us has been violated, notwithstanding our advance of half a million to enable her to carry out the objects of those negotiations. I noticed, also, the claims of the British subjects which have this night been brought forward by my Noble Friend, which claims, by the Noble Lords's admission, have not been satisfactorily adjusted; and I did infer from this circumstance that the policy of the Noble Lord has not been so successful as he had represented it to be. The Noble Lord says that Don Miguel would not have given this country more than the present Queen of Portugal has given. That is the whole amount of his defence. "It is true," says the Noble Lord, "that I have got nothing for you; but you would not have got more from Don Miguel." The Noble Lord says that the members of former Administrations would have been guilty of the enormity of recognising Don Miguel. Why, supposing they had been guilty of such an enormity, they would only have done what Lord Althorp said ought to be done. That Noble Lord, whom you wished to become the leader of your party in the House of Commons, called us to account for not recognising Don Miguel, and said, that whatever Don Miguel's character might be, in his opinion, the time was come, when, in conformity with the ancient policy of England, we ought to recognise Don Miguel, who appeared to be, de jure and de facto, the Sovereign of Portugal. The Noble Lord says that the matters to which I have alluded are, in themselves, trifling and of no importance. He says that the question of the establishment of a Protestant chapel at the Havannah is not important, and he says the same thing with respect to what has taken place at Port Mahon. Now, I mentioned these instances for that very reason. Just as they are unimportant, exactly in proportion to their triviality, is my proof conclusive that the influence of England is not predominant, and that the policy of the Noble Lord has not been successful. The Noble Lord says he has maintained peace; but has he reaped the advantages of peace? Has he been able to make the reductions which ought to be made in time of peace? If the peace which is now maintained be of so feverish a nature that it is necessary to increase the establishments of the country, and, consequently, to add to our debt, the Noble Lord has very little reason to boast of the maintenance of peace. I will now refer to the case of Cracow. The Noble Lord says he made no boast of what he would do in that instance; but when a motion with reference to Poland was brought forward, he made a public delaration (which led to the abandonment of that motion), that three months should not pass before he sent a consul to Cracow. And yet the Noble Lord says he made no boast of what he would do. The Noble Lord declares that he was deterred from sending a consul to Cracow by the apprehension of giving umbrage to the other powers. That was a very good reason, perhaps, for abandoning his intention; but it is no reason why, after stating that he would act upon that declaration, he should boast of the influence of England and the success of his policy. Now, with respect to our relations with France. The Noble Lord says that the language of the party with which I am connected, and the language of our press, has endangered the stability of our alliance with that country. Now, I will tell the Noble Lord that my alarm arises from the language of the Noble Lord's press. And when the Noble Lord speaks of the language of the press supposed to express the opinions of the Conservative party, is he not perfectly aware that the language of the journals supposed to be under his influence, and speaking the sentiments of Her Majesty's Government, has done more to create irritation in France than all the speeches which have been made in either House of Parliament by individuals, and all the language used by the press, which is opposed to him? I will not, at this late hour of the night, enter further into the subject; but I thought it proper to remark upon the cases of the chapel at the Havannah, and the conduct of the French Government with regard to Port Mahon, as raising an argument to show that the influence of England, abroad, is not so predominant as the Noble Lord wishes us to believe, and that his own policy has not been advantageous to the interests of this country.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I cannot allow the strong assumptions of the Noble Lord to pass without remark. The Noble Lord has talked largely of his influence with Spain and Portugal, when he is well aware of the inutility of his efforts to establish more extended commercial relations with those countries, and when, in fact, increased hostility has arisen in them to our commerce. The Noble Lord ought not to look to the establishment of abstract principles in other countries, but to the substantial interests of his own. He professes, indeed, to be a follower of the principles of Mr. Canning, but he seems to have forgotten the words of that statesman, who said, that while he was a Minister of England, he would look, like a Minister of England, to the interests of England, and not to the propagation of abstract principles abroad. Does not the Noble Lord know that, year after year, the merchants of this country have been praying him to prevent the gradual exclusion of British shipping from Portugal? At this very moment, I have a letter in my possession, from one of the principal merchants of Liverpool, who is connected with the trade of Portugal, complaining of the exclusion of British navigation therefrom, owing to the want of attention, or the want of influence, of our Government. After the statement of facts which has been made, surely the Noble Lord has no right to say that the influence of England is predominant, or that his own policy has been successful? Surely, he has forgotten how France laughed to scorn our interference when her own aggrandizement was in question? Surely, he must have forgotten how long the interests of England have suffered from neglect in the Gulf of Mexico, and in the Rio de la Plata? Surely, he must have forgotten the establishment of new principles of blockade, which were denounced by the Judge of the Admiralty, the Noble Lord's zealous supporter in this House. On former occasions, the Noble Lord has boasted, that no Minister has ever done so much for commerce as he has done. It is always the Noble Lord's way to meet charges of the kind which have been brought forward to-night with the boldest assumptions. If the case be as the Noble Lord has represented it, certainly there never was so ungrateful a body of men as the merchants of this country.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I had not intended to enter into this debate, but having been frequently made the channel of complaints, that our commercial interests have been neglected, I could not listen in silence to the boast of the Noble Lord, of the attention paid to our commerce in all quarters of the globe, and of the success with which his efforts had been followed.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — Sir, I rise to protest against the language which has been used in this House and elsewhere, with respect to the appointment of Admiral Fleming. It has been stated, that the disgust created in the navy by that appointment is such, that in case of a war breaking out, officers may not be found to serve on board our ships. It is most painful to hear such language applied by one officer to another. I have seen Admiral Fleming in command of a ship of the line, more than thirty years ago. He served faithfully during the war, and although it may have been his misfortune not to have been in any engagement, I must say that he was one of the most active and diligent of our cruisers; and that his deeds in the "Egyptian" and the "Revenge," stand recorded in the annals of the service. If fault is found with the appointment of such an officer to the governorship of Greenwich Hospital, it would be better to do away with the office altogether. I consider that the Gallant Admiral is well qualified to discharge the duties which have devolved upon him. ——

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I would ask Honourable Gentlemen, is it indispensably necessary to appoint some worn-out officer, who may be incapacitated from acting in an efficient manner? I cannot see why Honourable Gentlemen should complain of the choice made by the Government, on this occasion. No one found fault with the appointment of Sir Thomas Hardy, who was selected by the Right Honourable Baronet opposite. We do not complain of that nomination, but of the comparisons which have been instituted. It has been stated, that services on the quarter deck have been made secondary to services on the hustings. Now, I do not believe that that has been the case: but even if it were so, the charge comes with a very bad grace from Honourable Gentlemen opposite, for the Right Honourable Baronet was the first to set the example in the case of Sir Harry Neale; and that transaction certainly gave more disgust than anything which has taken place with regard to the governorship of Greenwich Hospital. I am sure the Gallant Officers who have spoken on this subject will admit that they did not intend to cast any reflection on Admiral Fleming. I certainly have not witnessed the dissatisfaction which is said to exist out of doors, on this subject; and I must say that I do not believe that such feelings are entertained by the officers of the navy.

[Cries of "Adjourn, adjourn!"]

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE.—I did not wish to say anything personally against Admiral Fleming. The remark which I made applied to his political appointment. I think it would have been much more creditable to the Government to have appointed one of the distinguished officers above him on the list, and who had not been quite so useful to them on the hustings.

SIR E. FILMER. — Sir, the Gallant Captain has put himself forward as the champion of Admiral Fleming, but he has forgotten to state how many times the admiral has been in collision with the enemy? I now beg to ask the Gallant Captain that question.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I cannot admit that I startad up as the champion of Admiral Fleming. I rose to defend the navy, generally, and to protest against the language used with respect to the navy, as well as to Admiral Fleming, who has distinguished himself in various ways.

SIR E. FILMER. — In which way?

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — In all his actions. I hope that will satisfy the Honourable Baronet.

CAPTAIN A'COURT. — I wish to say nothing against Admiral Fleming; I believe he has served as long and as faithfully as any man; but I think that he ought not to have been appointed to the governorship of Greenwich Hospital, when there were so many officers above him, and below him too, who have fought and bled for their country, and acquired distinction by their gallant services, and who certainly ought to have been considered before Admiral Fleming. It is very unpleasant to be under the necessity of making these observations; but on the part of the service to which I have the honour to belong, I must enter my protest against that most unjustifiable appointment;—an appointment which, I am sure, is reprobated and condemned by the country at large.

[Cries of "Adjourn, adjourn!"]

Mr. MACLEAN. — I think that so important a discussion as the present ought not to be allowed to terminate in so unsatisfactory a manner. I am not satisfied, and I do not think the country will be satisfied, with the limited view that has been taken of it; and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate to Monday next.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, if the Honourable Gentleman is not satisfied with the long discussion that has taken place, I believe Honourable Members on this side of the House are perfectly satisfied. I do not think that the votes for the service of the navy ought to be delayed for the purpose of having an irregular discussion on foreign affairs. Unless the Honourable Gentleman has something to urge against the vote, I shall object to the adjournment.

Mr. MACLEAN. — If the Noble Lord takes the same view of the subject as the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, a considerable portion of new matter may be introduced into the debate, for the latter Noble Lord considers that only the most trivial points of his policy have been touched upon. I think it very unreasonable to terminate the debate in this way, particularly as the discussion proceeded from that side of the House.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I think, as the vote is not objected to, that it had better be now taken. The discussion, if it should be thought necessary, can be continued on the next vote.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I will not now interrupt the vote, if another opportunity of expressing my opinions is likely to be afforded.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved, That 35,165 men be employed for the sea service for thirteen lunar months, to the 31st day of March, 1841, including 9000 Royal Marines and 2000 boys.

The House resumed; resolution to be reported on Monday next; Committee to sit again on Monday next.

STAGE CARRIAGES (IRELAND) BILL.

Second reading deferred till Friday, the 6th of March.

INLAND WAREHOUSING BILL.

Second reading deferred till Monday next.

VAGRANTS' REMOVAL BILL.

Considered in Committee; to be reported on Wednesday next.

FLOUR IMPORTATION (IRELAND) BILL.

Committee deferred till Friday, the 6th of March.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

SALE OF BEER.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I beg to move that the House resolve itself into committee to consider the Acts (1 Will. IV. cap. 64., and 4 & 5 Will. IV. cap. 85.) relating to the sale of beer. I trust the House will have no objection to go into committee pro formâ.

Question put.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — Sir, I certainly object to proceeding with the Bill at so late an hour.

SIR R. INGLIS. — The Honourable Gentleman opposite, no doubt, exercises a sound discretion; but it is, certainly, a very remarkable one, as to the period at which he interrupts the business of the House. I do not recollect an instance of his moving the postponement of any measure proceeding from his own side of the House. For three weeks the Honourable Member kept a notice on the books which he was unable to carry; and he now takes the opportunity, when there is not a sufficient number of Members present, to object to a motion which would otherwise be agreed to as a matter of course. It is, certainly, in the power of the Honourable Member to prevent the House going into committee; but I beg to remind him, that the course he is now taking may be imitated by this side of the House on other occasions.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — Sir, my reason for objecting to the further progress of the Bill at this hour is, that it is the intention of the Honourable Member for Bridport to oppose it; and I think that, in fairness, it ought not now to be pressed.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — It is a mere matter of form. The first reading was not objected to, and the second was going on when the objection arose. All I ask is, to be put in the same position in which I was before. I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. F. MAULE. — Sir, the question seems to turn upon this point. If it be a rule that dropped notices are not to come on without the sanction of the House, the Honourable Member ought to give further notice. I have no objection to place him in his former position; but the Honourable Member must not consider me as pledging myself to support the measure by so doing.

Motion agreed to; House in committee.

1. Resolved, That the annual duty of 3*l.* 3*s.*, now payable upon every excise licence to be taken out by any person for selling, by retail, beer to be drunk or consumed upon the premises where sold, shall cease, and that in lieu thereof there shall be paid an annual excise duty of 5*l.*

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to alter and amend the laws relating to the sale of beer.

The House resumed; resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

To SIR DENHAM NORREYS, one month, — urgent business.

GRAMMAR SCHOOLS BILL.

Second reading deferred from Wednesday next till Wednesday, the 4th of March.

COMMISSION.

The following Bill received the Royal assent: — Transfer of Aids.

RATED INHABITANTS EVIDENCE BILL. — FRIVOLOUS SUITS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Second reading (which stood appointed for this day) put off to Thursday next.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE SUPPLY OF WATER TO THE METROPOLIS.

On the motion of the Marquess of Westminster, the Report of the Commissioners on the State of the Supply of Water in the Metropolis, dated 21st of April, 1828, was referred to the Committee of the present Session.

Evidence taken before the Committee from time to time to be printed, for the use of the Members of this House; but no copies to be delivered, except to the members of the Committee, until further order.

SOCIALISM.

The Earl of Shaftesbury presented a petition complaining of the alarming progress of the system, and praying for the adoption of measures for the protection of morality and religion, — of inhabitants of Romsey. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition presented by Lord Abinger, of the British and Foreign Seamen and Soldiers' Friend Society and Bethel Union, convened in the Mariners' Church, Wellclose Square. — Read, and ordered to be received as the petition of the persons who, only, have signed it.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The Marquess of Bute and the Earl of Aberdeen presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, — of the minister, elders, and others of Liberton; St. Peter's, Glasgow; and St. David's, Glasgow: of members of the Church Session of the parish of Fraserburgh: of inhabitants of Fordoun; Gairloch; Collessie; Dumbarton; Dunlop; Woodside; Cumbray; Kilmarnock; Ayr, Newton, and Wallacetown; Carmylie; New Monkland; Edzell; South Kirriemuir; Dalmellington; and Kippen; and of female inhabitants of South Kirremuir. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH RATES.

Petition praying for the release of John Thorogood, and for the abolition of church rates, and of the criminal jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, — of inhabitants of Rothwell. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CORN LAWS.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY presented a petition for the repeal of, — of electors and non-electors resident in the borough of Marylebone. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SHAFTESBURY CHARITIES.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER presented a petition of Bevan Rake, William Burridge, and others, trustees of said charities, praying for the adoption of some measure to remedy certain defects in the law respecting said charities. The Noble Marquess, on presenting this petition, said: — This is a petition to which I beg the particular attention of the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack. The petitioners complain that the expense of appointing trustees under the Municipal Corporation Act is more than the funds of the charities can bear, and they therefore pray for some measure of relief.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — I admit that the grievance complained of is one which deserves the serious consideration of the Legislature. The subject, however, is attended with considerable difficulty, as regards the views which are entertained amongst the parties in whom the power over the charity estate is vested; for, although the greater number of them may desire some alteration of the law, yet, before that can be effected, it is necessary to have the concurrence of all. If any mode present itself to me by which the difficulty can be overcome and the grievance removed, I shall feel it my duty to bring it immediately under the consideration of your Lordships.

Ordered to lie on the table.

OCCUPATION OF KING'S ISLET BY FRANCE.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — Seeing the Noble Viscount at the head of the Government in his place, I am desirous of asking him a question respecting what is called "the temporary occupation," by the French, of King's Islet, near Minorca and Port Mahon. When, on a former occasion, an inquiry was made relative to this point, the Noble Viscount said he was quite assured that the papers which would be laid before your Lordships would be found to give a perfectly satisfactory explanation. Now, I must declare that those papers are not at all satisfactory to me; and to show why they are not, I beg leave to refer to the despatch (No. 4.) from Sir George Villiers to Viscount Palmerston, dated November 4. 1837. It is there stated, —

> A Report of the Committee of State on the occupation of the King's Islet, in Port Mahon, by the French, has been read, and was approved without discussion. The proposition on which the Report was founded was to the effect that the measure adopted by the Government with respect to this island should be suspended; and the Committee declare, that they have observed with the greatest regret the steps that have been taken by the Government on the subject. It appears, the Committee state, that the French have for some time rented the island from the local authorities as a depôt for coal, and as it is now likely to be more necessary to them than ever, on account of their occupation of a portion of the coast of Africa, the French ambassador at this court received instructions from his Government to apply to the Government of Her Catholic Majesty for the use of the buildings on the island for a fixed period. The Government consulted the authorities of the island, and, although their report was unanimously against acceding to the request, it was granted by the Government, on account of its being politically convenient not to deny this favour to an ally, when, on the other hand, the inconvenience attending the refusal of it were taken into consideration. The French Government were, therefore, permitted to hold the premises in question for the term of two years, renewable at pleasure, for the annual rent of 300 reals (3*l.*). After having heard the Minister of State, and although extremely desirous of manifesting a sincere wish to maintain the most friendly relations with France, the Committee, nevertheless, advised the Chamber to offer to the French Government the best buildings on the island of Minorca itself, which may be adapted for the objects in view, instead of the spot called King's Islet, by which proceeding, they state, the wants of the French vessels of war, will be consulted, and the national anxiety on the subject tranquillised.

Now there is, in my opinion, a great deal of difference between occupying houses and barns situated on the island of Minorca, and occupying King's Islet, in the centre of Port Mahon. Looking to the last letter, dated January 16. 1840 (received February 6. 1840), from Mr. Gaynor, the British vice-consul at Port Mahon, to Viscount Palmerston, on this subject, I find that it merely states that —

> Since the departure of Consul Lieutenant Colonel C. L. Fitzgerald, nothing has occurred worthy of remark, except the renewal of the lease, by the Spanish to the French Government, for two years, of the King's or Hospital Island, situate in the centre of this port, with its hospital and its appurtenances, at a monthly rent of sixteen dollars, with the reserve, in case Spain should not have occasion for it.

It is to be observed, that not a single reason has been given why the buildings and barns on the island of Minorca were not appropriated instead of this islet. I believe that any person who is acquainted with the position of this islet will say, that if our late powerful rivals, the French, are to have possession of it for two years, unless they be absolutely prohibited from erecting fortifications, they may make it so formidable a post, that, if we ever return (as is by no means impossible, although God forbid it!) to a war with France (in which case, I have no doubt that the waters of the Mediterranean would be the scene of conflict), it will be found to operate injuriously to our interests in that quarter. I cannot, therefore, avoid looking with jealousy at their occupation of an island in the centre of Port Mahon. I wish, consequently, to know whether any communication has taken place explaining the reason why buildings and outhouses on the island of Minorca were not given up to the French, instead of a separate island? The subject is very important, and unless some very satisfactory explanation be given, I shall, on some future day, propose a motion with reference to it.

The EARL of CLARENDON. — I do not see, my Lords, what right the British Government has to ask the Spanish Government its reasons for not having adopted a resolution of a committee of the Cortes. This, amongst other matters in that committee, was made use of, to excite great opposition against the Government. The lease having been granted long before, the Spanish Government saw no reason to rescind it. The warehouse and hospital, so leased, belonged first to the United States, and were in a strange manner handed over by the Spanish Government to the French, who wished to keep it as a depôt for coal; and there was no reason for refusing it to them for that purpose, on the same terms as the American Government had held them. There is, moreover, a clause in the first lease, which stipulates that the French shall not exceed the authority exercised by the previous occupiers of the island; and in the lease now granted to them for two years there is a similar stipulation; besides which, they are only to hold the station in the event of the Spanish Government not wanting it for their own use. Inquiry has been made of the French Government as to what are their intentions respecting the place. The answer given by Count Molé was, that they merely wished to use it as a coal depôt; and it appears to me that there can be no objection to their using it for that purpose. The French Government will not be able to fortify the island more than the main land, if they are even desirous of so doing; but I believe their intentions, as declared by themselves, with regard to it, are solely directed to commercial purposes, and that they only wish to turn it into a convenient coal depôt, for the use of their steamers.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — My Lords, this matter is one of considerable importance. It is not the first time the French have endeavoured to establish a footing in the island. They requested permission to place a depôt there ten years ago, but the Spanish Government then refused to allow the French to form any such establishment. The Noble Earl has stated that the matter has excited a great deal of alarm and of interest in Spain. Those feelings, in my opinion, are very natural. The Noble Earl has also stated, that the Opposition in the Cortes have taken up the question. Surely, it is very natural that they should do so, and I am afraid that the Opposition in this House will also find it necessary to take it up, in order to show that it is a matter which may lead to very serious consequences. TheCortes' committee recommended that if the French formed an establishment of the kind, it should be on the main land, where they would be more under the control of the Spanish Government, which might prevent them from erecting such works as at a future period might become formidable. The Noble Earl, however, says that it is a temporary agreement, and he asks, what right have we to interfere with the distribution of any portion of the Spanish territories? I answer, that we claim that right for the best of all possible reasons — for the security of our position in the Mediterranean. Our interest there renders it imperative on us to interfere. I conceive that we have a right to complain, not that the French Government have placed themselves in this situation, but that the Spanish Government have given to France this facility for forming an establishment which may seriously affect the interests of this country. The Noble Earl has not told us that by the terms of the lease the French are prohibited from strengthening themselves on the island, — which is a very important point. If it can be shown that the French mean only to have a depôt for coal, or an hospital for the sick, on the island (it being strictly provided that they shall not convert it into a post of strength), the matter will then assume a different aspect. But, unless the Noble Earl declares that they are positively prevented from erecting any buildings that shall partake of the character of barracks, or have a hostile appearance,— unless he shows that it is impossible for them to construct any buildings on that island which may be available to them in military operations,— in that case the objection to the continuance of the French there becomes exceedingly strong. Considering all that has taken place in that part of the world, and its vicinity, no one can be surprised that there should be some degree of anxiety felt in this country on the subject.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—Can the Noble Earl say whether the French have erected any building on the island besides depôts and hospitals, and whether any persons are admitted into them who are not strictly invalids?

The EARL of CLARENDON.—I am not aware that the French have erected any other; but I feel perfectly convinced of the fact that the Spanish Government would not allow the erection of any building, whatever, of a military character. The Noble Earl has stated that the Spanish Government refused to lease the island to France.

The EARL of ABERDEEN.—In 1830.

The EARL of CLARENDON.—I believe that about 1830 the American Government handed the island over to France; and very shortly after the taking of Algiers the French turned it into a coal depôt. They have now held it for several years, but only as a coal depôt. I believe that there are none but invalids there; and I know that there has never been more than one sloop of war at any time near the island.

The EARL of ABERDEEN.—The Noble Earl is mistaken. The United States were in possession of the island in 1830, and it was in 1833, I think, that they transferred it to the French.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—If it appear that no new buildings have been erected, and no ulterior objects attempted, by the French, I think their end may be considered as innocent.

The EARL of CLARENDON.—I have not a doubt about it.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—But I am not sure of it. I am not satisfied with the Noble Earl's answer, and I am surprised that the Noble Earl did not, at the time, make proper inquiries upon these points.

The EARL of CLARENDON.—I beg to say that I did make inquiries upon these points, and I was told, distinctly, that since the French have occupied the island no individuals have appeared there, except a few to receive coals: and, as I have said before, there has been but one French sloop of war on the station.

CLAIMS OF THE SPANISH LEGION.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY.—I now rise to address your Lordships on another question, to which I meant to have called your attention on Friday evening, had not the House risen so early. Though it may, therefore, be somewhat irregular, I solicit the indulgence of your Lordships to dispense with the formality of another notice, and to permit me to make a few remarks in reference to the claims which the British Auxiliary Legion have on the Spanish Government—claims which, up to this hour, remain unsettled. I can assure your Lordships that I am not about to make any attack upon Her Majesty's Government.

[Laughter from the Ministerial benches.]

I think they must have had enough of attacks—attacks sufficient to sicken, nay, to kill, half a dozen Governments.

[Renewed laughter.]

The Noble Viscount may laugh; but I will tell the Noble Viscount that when the French Ministers were recently left in a minority of 26, they, acting on a point of honour, declined to carry on the government; but the Noble Viscount and his colleagues, notwithstanding that they have been beaten on one question by a majority of 104, and on another by a majority of 10, still continue in their most ignoble position of stedfastly adhering to place and pay, although they must feel that the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth and his friends ought to fill the situations now held by the Noble Viscount and his colleagues. Having said this, which I was only induced to do by the manner of the Noble Viscount, I shall now return to the subject to which I wished to call your Lordships' attention. I have recently received several letters from parties who have belonged to the Spanish Legion, and who are suffering greatly in consequence of the non-settlement of their claims by the Spanish Government. One of them writes to me thus: —

> As I perceive you are shortly to bring the affairs of Spain before the House of Lords, I trust your Lordship will not allow the opportunity to pass without inquiring of the Government whether there is any chance of the claims of the unfortunate men who served in the British Auxiliary Legion being liquidated. There is above 200*l.* due to me on account of those claims, which would be a great relief to me, as I have been much distressed in consequence of the delay. Your Lordship's exertions towards effecting an arrangement will ever oblige your Lordship's humble servant.

The date of this letter is the 14th of February, 1840, and the address, 54. William Street, Dublin. This shows, at least, that I am no volunteer in the cause. Now, the claims of these men were admitted even by the Noble Lord opposite, when ambassador at Madrid, and a Commission was appointed at St. Sebastian to consider the best steps to be taken for satisfying them. In May, 1837, a communication was received by General Evans from Lord Clarendon, our ambassador at Madrid, stating that his intervention had been recognised by the Spanish Government, and that he hoped his countrymen would consider this an additional guarantee that their arrears would be paid. Their claims were also admitted by Colonel Wylde. In the last Session I charged the Government with being privy to the convention which Colonel Wylde had entered into, relative to the payment of these claims. At that time, the Noble Viscount denied that the Gallant Colonel had any authority to act on behalf of the British Government. Colonel Wylde is now in this country; and I call upon him, from this place, to say whether he did or did not act with the authority of the Government, and whether the Government sanctioned his declaration that all the claims should be fully paid up? If he did not act with the authority of the Government, his conduct was most reprehensible; and if he had that authority for so acting, in what way can the Government of the Noble Viscount opposite get out of the obligation of forcing the Spanish Government to pay to these brave men, who are now wandering about the streets, without the means of subsistence, the full amount of their claims? Colonel Wylde, the British Commissioner, arrived in St. Sebastian previous to June 10. 1837, and signed warrants for the issue of pay, and on the 10th of June issued the following order: —

> The officers of the British Auxiliary Legion, whose term of service expires this day, will be entitled to billets, pay, and rations, until they are settled with, and vessels provided to convey them to England.
> (Signed) W. Wylde, Colonel.

That was upon the breaking up of the first legion. It also appears, that at a public meeting of officers in San Sebastian, Colonel Wylde said that he stood before them in a twofold capacity, — namely, as "a Commissioner from the Queen of England, and as a Commissioner from the Queen of Spain," and that he was authorised by her Britannic Majesty's minister at Madrid to pledge himself that a portion of pay should be issued before they left Spain, and that they should receive good bills for the remainder. Colonel Wylde and Brigadier-General Tena afterwards gave to each paymaster a warrant to estimate for, and pay, their officers to the day when their arrears should be settled in good bills or cash. A similar warrant was also given to Deputy Commissary General Black for the payment of officers of the staff, &c. In consequence of these assurances, a number of officers and men were induced to enter the new legion, the conditions of service for which were also signed by Colonel Wylde.

Here is the positive declaration of Colonel Wylde, and the guarantee, also, of the Noble Earl; but neither pledge has been redeemed. The Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs is reported to have said, in another place, that though the British claims on the Portuguese Government are not so strong as those of the legion officers on Spain, still if the Portuguese Government refuse to satisfy the claims awarded by a British and Portuguese Commissioner, he certainly will enforce satisfaction. Now, what is 280,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* to the Spanish Government? It is true that their finances may be in a state of difficulty; but will any one tell me that this country might not, by some financial arrangement with Spain, render valuable those securities which have been given to the legion, and which are at present worthless? Why cannot those assignats or certificates be given in payment for duties? Why might they not be made available through some commercial channel, if the Government chose to do so? Why might not 300,000*l*. be received by some plan of this nature for those unfortunate men, who are now suffering the deepest distress, and who can plead that they have the guarantee both of the Noble Earl and of Colonel Wylde, that their just claims would be fairly met and settled? What have they got? Nothing but the bad notes or assignats, as they are called, of General Alava, which are now at a discount of 25 per cent. The Jews have been busily engaged in buying them up; and though I will not say that members of the Spanish mission have been engaged in such a traffic, I cannot, and will not, conceal from your Lordships, that a report to that effect is current. I call upon your Lordships to look at the mode in which the Foreign Office has disposed of the superior officers of the legion, in order to get rid of their importunities. I have got a list of the officers who have served in the legion, and subsequently obtained promotion in the British army, and a very curious list it is. Your Lordships will hardly believe that out of the officers who have served in the British Auxilary Legion, 56 have either been promoted in the army by the Horse Guards, over the heads of older officers in India and elsewhere, or have been provided for in the civil service of the country, — no doubt upon there commendation of the Foreign Office. I shall read some of them for your Lordships.

Sir De Lacy Evans, Lieut.-General, made a K.C.B.

Evans, Brigadier-General, appointed Military Secretary to the Governor of Madras.

M'Dougal, Sir Duncan, Brigadier-General, knighted.

Shaw, Sir Charles, Brigadier-General, knighted, and made Commissioner of Police for Manchester.

Le Merchant, Sir J. G., knighted, and appointed to command a British regiment.

Chichester, Brigadier-General, appointed to the command of a British regiment.

Fitzgerald, Brigadier-General, appointed consul at Carthagena.

O'Connell, Brigadier-General, Military Secretary, New South Wales.

Jochmus, Brigadier-General, employed on secret service in Turkey.

Reid, Brigadier-General, Governor of Bermuda.

Colquhoun, Lieut.-Colonel, from Second Captain of Artillery to a Lieutenant-Colonelcy.

Boyd, Lieut.-Colonel, Majority 38th Regiment.

Ibbetson, Assistant Commissary-General, made Assistant Commissary-General British Service.

Hicks, Colonel, made Barrack-Master.

Wetherall, Colonel, appointed Commissioner of Police in Canada.

Wakefield, Colonel, appointed Lieutenant-Governor of New Zealand.

Swan, Colonel, employed on a particular service in Canada.

Rottenberg, Baron de, ditto ditto.

Johnson, Captain, made Queen's Messenger.

Browne, Captain, appointed clerk in the Foreign Office.

Hoseason, Mr. C. C., appointed clerk in the Colonial Office.

Considine, Lieut.-Colonel, appointed Military Secretary, West Indies.

Wylde, Colonel, C.B., made full Colonel, and appointed Equerry to his Royal Highness Prince Albert; his son made clerk in the Foreign Office.

Now, it is a serious question, when one sees so many officers of this service promoted in the British army; and men cannot help asking themselves whether Ministers have not given them promotion to get rid of their importunities. If they have not done so, they have contrived very badly in providing for all the officers, and in abandoning all the men. A Commission, it is true, was appointed to examine into their claims; but the very first measure it took was to close it by fixing a certain time, after which it would receive no claims. Yes, they issued a statement that all claims not sent in by a certain time (I believe the 9th of September), would not be admitted. They did not, however, give any public notice of this their intention, either in Ireland or in Scotland, or in any other more distant parts of the British empire, where these unfortunate men or their relatives may happen to be residing. I am surprised that such public notice was not given by some of the superior officers connected with the legion. The Commission, however, sat for some time; but I am given to understand that not less than 3000 certificates are still wanting by the men. Here I would beg leave to call the attention of your Lordships to the conduct of the Commission. As I have been informed, contracts were agreed, to or broken, as suited the purposes of the Commission; medical certificates were refused and granted without sufficient grounds; pensions were refused to some officers who were entitled to them under the British regulations, and allowed to others who had no right to them; the decision of the War Office was not given on the claims until it had been extracted by dread of public exposure; gratuities were denied to several officers, who had done good service, while they were given to others who had either retired or had been dismissed from the legion. Such are the representations which have been made to me; and I believe the real truth of the circumstances to be, that these unfortunate men are kept out of their money by the base manœuvring of the Spanish Government, through Spanish agents in this country. I hope the Noble Viscount or the Noble Earl opposite will feel it to be his duty to bring this question to a direct issue; and if, in a short time, I do not see a prospect of immediate justice being done to these claimants, I shall, soon after the recess, move an Address to Her Majesty, praying that she will take measures with the Spanish Government to have these claims adjusted. I have now to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for "a copy of any arrangement that has been made by the Spanish Commission, with the sanction of Lord Palmerston, respecting the outstanding claims of officers and men, not presented before the 30th of September, 1839." And, also, for a "Return of the decisions of the War Office respecting pensions and compensations granted to wounded officers, late of the legion." Before I sit down, I wish to ask the Noble Earl opposite whether any arrangement has been made on the subject to which my motion refers with the Spanish Government; and, if not, whether it is the intention of her Majesty's Ministers to propose to that Government any mode of arranging these claims?

The EARL of CLARENDON.—My Lords, I think it must be very satisfactory to these unfortunate men, who have been so long and so unceasingly the objects of the keenest vituperations of the Noble Marquess, and on whose conduct he could not, formerly, bestow a single word of approbation, now to have become the objects of his warmest solicitude. Instead of entering into the wide field of observation into which the Noble Earl has directed his discursive march, I shall confine myself to the statement of a few facts, and more particularly to the refutation of the attack which the Noble Marquess has made upon myself, and upon the guarantee which the Noble Marquess has said I gave, when the men of the first legion were on the point of embarkation for England. As the representative of the British Government at the Court of Spain, I had no official right to interfere to procure the payment of individuals who had voluntarily enlisted themselves in the service of the Queen of Spain; but, as an Englishman having some influence at her court, it was impossible for me to remain passive to the necessities and wants of so many of my fellow countrymen. I therefore used my best exertions to obtain the fulfilment of those engagements into which the Spanish Government had entered with them; and I am happy to inform your Lordships that every claim which I brought forward was listened to, and, as far as was possible at the time, fulfilled; and that, under these circumstances, I wrote to General Evans, stating that, as the Spanish Government had accepted my intervention, I had no doubt that all the engagements which it had made with the men of his force would be performed. What was the consequence of that intervention on my part? That every soldier who went away was paid up to the time of his embarkation. All of them were paid, except 250 Lancers, as fully as if they had belonged to the British army. There were 3000 or 4000 men thus paid up. The noble Marquess laughs at that statement. Does he mean to deny it?

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY.—Push it further.

The EARL of CLARENDON.—Push it further! What does the Noble Earl mean by that? With respect to the fifty-six officers who have been appointed to various situations, and whose promotion the Noble Earl attributes to a desire on the part of Her Majesty's Government to get rid of their importunities, I have only to observe, that I cannot believe the Noble Lord to be serious in making the statement which he has offered upon that point. A great part of the officers whose promotion the Noble Marquess has attacked are personally unknown to me; I know them, however, by character, as some of the most distinguished in Her Majesty's service; and I hardly think your Lordships will sanction the idea, that because they engaged in a service of which the Noble Marquess did not approve, they are therefore to have a bar set against their further employment. I believe there is not one of those officers who has not distinguished himself greatly; and if they are taken individually, there is not one of them whose appointment is not defensible by the Government on its own special grounds. I should be glad to see the list which the Noble Lord has read, and to give him, in each particular case, an account of the reasons which led to each individual's promotion. With respect to one of the officers of the name of Colquhoun, whom the Noble Lord represented to have been appointed to a lieutenant-colonelcy in the British service, I happen to know that that officer only holds that rank, locally, so long as he continues at Lisbon. Then, with respect to the assertion, that the claims of the soldiers have not been paid, I must observe, that they have received the whole of their pay, and that every farthing to which they were entitled, as pay, has been given to them, just as if they had been serving in the British army. The Noble Marquess shakes his head; it is very easy to do that, but can the Noble Marquess disprove my statement? It is true that the soldiers have not yet received their gratuities; and there are more reasons than the inability of the Spanish Government to account for the non-settlement of those gratuities. It took a considerable time to examine and audit the accounts, which are of a very complicated character. I state with confidence that the Spanish Government proceeded in the examination and audit of those accounts with the most complete good faith; and I think that when the Noble Lord calmly reads over his remarks of this evening, he will regret deeply having said that the members of the Spanish mission have been concerned in discounting the certificates granted to the soldiers of the legion, and will also regret having brought against the Spanish Government a charge of insincerity and fraud. With respect to the Commission, and the notice which it has given, I will now proceed to make a very short statement, and inform the House of what that Commission has done. It was appointed in November, 1838, and was engaged for nine or ten months in its labours, during which time the claims of 3000 men were examined into, and nearly as many certificates granted. At the end of that time it was thought that no more claims would be brought forward, and the Commissioners, in order to save the expense of keeping the Commission open, expressed an opinion that the Commission ought to be closed. They therefore published a notice in August, 1839, stating that, after a month from the date thereof, no fresh claims would be received. Was there any secrecy in that? The fact is, that the notice was published in all the newspapers at the time, and was publicly posted up in all the towns where the men of the legion had been first enlisted. It was afterwards stated in another place, by my Noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that, as the notice up to the 15th of September was not considered sufficient, fifteen days more would be granted; and, ultimately, the notice was extended to the 30th of September, 1839. It was furthermore stated, that as there were some claims into which inquiry could not be made in Spain, conveniently to the claimants, inquiry into them should be instituted in London. Now, to that arrangement none of the superior officers of the legion offered, on behalf of their men, the slightest objection. Perhaps it may be convenient, as this discussion will go abroad, to state how that Commission was composed. It was composed of one individual, a gentleman of high character, selected by the legion itself, and possessing its entire confidence, who had been substituted for another gentleman, of whose proceedings the legion did not approve, and to whom, as a substitute for the former gentleman, the Spanish Government, though it might have objected, did not make any opposition. It was composed of another individual, appointed by the Spanish Government, a Spaniard, a gentleman of great respectability, long resident in London, and thoroughly conversant with our language, and with our mode of transacting business. The referees were men of the most unsullied honour and the most unblemished reputation, as I think your Lordships will admit when you hear that they were General Alava and Sir Robert Dundas. Every point on which they decided was submitted to the War Office, and was not made public until it had met the sanction of my Noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I contend that, such being the facts, no Commission was ever appointed that was more calculated to give satisfaction to all parties who had any concern with it. The Noble Marquess has said that he made inquiries into this subject. Will the Noble Marquess permit me to ask who the parties are of whom he has made inquiry? Are they persons worthy of credit? If the Noble Marquess had wished to obtain redress for the grievances of the claimants, would it not have been more natural for him to have gone, in the first place, to General Alava, or to Sir Robert Dundas? Such a course, however, would not have suited the purpose of the Noble Earl; yet such a course would undoubtedly have been much better than that of stigmatising men of character as parties guilty of fraud and insincerity. Had the Noble Earl pursued the course he ought to have pursued, he would have found that since the Commission gave notice that it would close its labours, 1000 certificates have been issued; and he would also have found that the Commission is not even yet closed; but that the most ample provision has been made — I will not merely say in the most just and honourable manner, but — in the most generous spirit, by the Spanish Government, for the liquidation of future claims, as might be naturally expected by all who are acquainted with the high and chivalrous character of General Alava. It may be as well for me to state, once for all, that there are certain individuals, with not much knowledge, but with a large infusion of the spirit of mischief, who, for the sake of their own paltry emoluments, are most anxious that the labours of this Commission should not be cut short. Now, if the Noble Lord's object be, to obtain for these claimants a redress of grievances, and not to make a mere statement of their sufferings, he will in future obtain his information from General Alava, rather than from the individuals to whom I have just alluded.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I beg leave, my Lords, to say a very few words in reply. I disclaim all intention of asserting that the employment of these officers in the service of the Queen of Spain is to be a bar to their promotion in the service of the Queen of England. As a military man, I should be sorry to make any such assertion. I sympathise with the sufferings of the men of the legion, because they have been the victims of the Noble Earl and the Noble Viscount opposite, who, as they seduced, so they ought to protect, them. I do not mean to deny that many of these officers have distinguished themselves in the ranks of the British army; but it is singular that no less than 56 officers should have been promoted for serving in the legion, — a number of promotions out of all proportion to its amount, when compared with the number of promotions granted to our officers in India, and in the other corps of the British army. The Noble Earl has stated that the pay of the legion has been granted; but he has been compelled to admit that the gratuities have not been. I cannot pretend to enter into all the details of this subject; but this I know, that no less a sum than 280,000*l.* is now due, and remains unpaid, to the men of the legion. The Noble Earl takes credit to himself for having obtained the pay of the legion by means of his guarantee; but he seems to have forgotten that his guarantee went not only to the pay, but to everything that was due to them in the service. Does the Noble Earl mean to assert that Colonel Wylde had no right to make the declaration that he would be responsible for the pay and gratuities of the officers? That is a question which the Noble Earl ought to have answered, but which he has not answered. The Noble Earl has also challenged my sources of information; and he has asked, "Why did you not go for information to General Alava, or to Sir Robert Dundas?" It might be very satisfactory to the Noble Earl to have me going to General Alava, whom the Noble Earl has got completely under his thumb; but if I had gone, what should I have got by it? General Alava, no doubt, would have received me very courteously and civilly; he would have been as kind and as pleasant to me in conversation as he was to the Spanish bondholders who went to him the other day for information as to the period when their dividend would be paid; and, like those unfortunate bondholders, I should have returned from the General just as wise as I went.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — My Lords, in the few observations which I mean to address to your Lordships, I shall confine myself to the motion of the Noble Marquess, and to the questions which he has put. And, first, as to the arrangement of the time for receiving these claims. After sitting for a period of eight or nine months, the Commissioners announced, on the 6th of August, that it was their intention, upon the expiration of a month, to receive no more claims. Now, it is impossible that the business of any Commission could be carried on by any different sort of arrangement. Upon a reference being made to my Noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, my Noble Friend said that he conceived the time to be too short, and the period was accordingly enlarged to the 30th of September. I apprehend that this part of the motion will merely state these well-known facts, and throw no new light upon the matter. Then the Noble Marquess asks for the decisions of the War Office. What he exactly means I don't know; but the facts are these: — My Noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Department, at the request of the Commission, put to the Secretary of War what would be the decision in such cases, of wounds or pensions, in the British army? That I believe my Noble Friend has been in the habit of doing, for the information of the Commission. But such papers, I think, cannot be produced, or laid before the House; they are merely communications between the Secretary at War and the Secretary of State, for the purpose of assisting the Commission in its deliberations; they are not binding on the Commission, — they cannot be called decisions; and therefore I apprehend they are not the papers which the Noble Marquess is desirous of seeing. Then the Noble Marquess asks whether any arrangement has been made by the Spanish Government for the liquidation of these claims? No arrangement, I believe, has as yet been made. The Commission sat for some time, and settled a considerable amount of the claims; and, it is for the Spanish Government to find means for liquidating those claims. Then the Noble Marquess asks, what is the intention of the British Government, if the Spanish Government fails to make an arrangement? It is, my Lords, the intention of the British Government to use all fitting, proper, and discreet means, for the purpose of obtaining the settlement of the claims of these persons from the Spanish Goverment. It is impossible not to think that some allowance and indulgence ought to be made for that Government, having still to deal with a formidable civil war in the heart of the country. It is perfectly possible that many claims may be left unsatisfied till the termination of that war; but I must say that I do not doubt, in the least degree, the determination of the Spanish Government to satisfy these claims. Neither do I doubt that the British Government will take all fitting and proper steps to obtain justice for those who have unquestionably given the assistance of their services to Spain. This is the answer I have to give to the motion and questions of the Noble Marquess. With regard to the officers, some of whom have been promoted in the military, and some in the civil, service; I cannot say that I see much in the observations of the Noble Marquess. He mentioned the names of two officers of artillery who are serving in Her Majesty's army. They are two, I believe, as distinguished officers as there are in the service; and whether they had been in Spain, or not, they would naturally have been the first selected for employment in any part of Europe. It is impossible to set forth, at once, the reason of all these promotions; but of the list read by the Noble Marquess, I must be permitted to say, I never heard one which appeared to be more creditable to the Government.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — As the Noble Viscount thinks fit to deny the production of those papers which have passed between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the War Office, I shall not, at present, press the matter further. But I beg to give notice, that, if nothing further be done in this matter, I shall feel it to be my duty, after Easter, to make it the subject of a motion for an humble Address to Her Majesty.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PAPERS.

Copy of Commission appointing T. F. Elliot and Robert Torrens, Esquires, and the Honourable Edward E. Villiers, Land and Emigration Commissioners: Also,

Copy of the instructions addressed by Lord John Russell to the Land and Emigration Commissioners: And, also,

Copy of a Commission revoking the existing Commission of the South Australian Commissioners, and appointing Robert Torrens and T. F. Elliot, Esquires, and the Honourable Edward E. Villiers, Colonisation Commissioners for South Australia.

Delivered (pursuant to Address of Friday last), and to be printed.

Copy of despatch from Sir William Nicolay, of the 4th day of May, 1839, on the subject of free labour in the Mauritius: Also,

Copy of despatch from Sir William Nicolay, of the 21st day of May, 1839, transmitting a memorial from sundry inhabitants of the Mauritius, addressed to the Queen, praying the removal of restrictions upon the introduction of free labourers from India and elsewhere: And, also,

Copy of a letter from Mr. Barclay, of the 20th day of September, 1839, inclosing documents relative to the feeling of the inhabitants of the Mauritius, on the subject of the introduction of Indian labourers.

Delivered (pursuant to Address of Friday last), and to be printed.

Accounts relating to the trade and navigation of the United Kingdom, in the years ending the 5th of January, 1839, and the 5th of January, 1840.—Delivered (by command), and to be printed.

INDIA AND THE MAURITIUS.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY.—Can the Noble Viscount say whether there is, in the correspondence he has just laid on the table, anything relating to the state of the Indians during their passage to the Mauritius?

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON.—I find very little; but any information that can be given on the subject, my Noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Office is most willing to supply.

CHINA.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—Perhaps the Noble Viscount (Viscount Melbourne) is prepared to answer the question I put to him on Friday night,—namely, whether any arrangement has been made between Her Majesty's Government and the Court of Directors of the East India Company, respecting the proportion of the expense to be borne by each in any expedition that may be projected to China?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—No such arrangement has been made.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I wish to know, further, whether any communication has taken place on the subject; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to its production?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—No communication has taken place, except that the President of the Board of Control has informed the East India Company that it is not intended that any portion of the expense shall be borne by the Company.

AFRICAN TRADE.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD.—I beg leave to give notice, that, on Friday next, I shall present a petition from certain merchants engaged in the African trade; and that, on that occasion, I will state to the House the course I mean to pursue in the following week, in the shape of a substantial motion on the general question.

RETURNS, PAPERS, &c.

Return (being a continuation of the Returns presented in 1836) of the number of causes, exceptions, further directions, pleas, and demurrers set down to be heard in and for, and of the number of decrees and orders made on hearing the same, in the years 1836, 1837, 1838, 1839, and to Hilary Term, 1840; distinguishing those set down and heard and disposed of at the Rolls from the others; and, since the establishment of the Vice Chancellor's Court, specifying how many of those set down before the Lord Chancellor have been heard in his court, and how many by the Vice Chancellor: Also,

Return of the number of causes, exceptions, further directions, pleas, and demurrers ready for hearing on the first day of each term, and also at the close of the sittings after each term, in each of the above years, before the Lord Chancellor: And, also,

Like Return as to those before the Master of the Rolls.

SHORT-HAND WRITING MONOPOLY.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I hold in my hand a petition from Messrs. Edward Morton and Francis N. Walsh, short-hand writers, complaining of the present system of short-hand writing carried on by the Messrs. Gurney, showing an enormous increase of expenditure in consequence of the monopoly which those gentlemen enjoy. The petitioners propose that the business of short-hand writing to the Houses of Parliament shall be thrown open to the profession generally. I shall now move that this petition do lie on the table, and be printed with the Votes, it being my intention on Wednesday next to move for a Select Committee, to take the matter of the petition into consideration.

Motion put, and agreed to; petition ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

WAR WITH CHINA.

Mr. BAINES. — I have to present to the House a petition of rather an unusual kind, and I will shortly state its contents. This is the petition of the committee and other members of the Society for the Promotion of Permanent and Universal Peace. The petitioners declare that, in their opinion, all war is inconsistent with the spirit of Christianity; they feel a deep interest in the peace of Great Britain, and of all other nations. They have, from time to time, witnessed with great pleasure the wise and prudent steps which the Government of Great Britain have taken in mediating between nations when these have been in danger of war; and they rejoice in the measures which were adopted to preserve peace between this country and the United States of America, when that peace was endangered by the recent excitement respecting the boundary line; and they express great concern at hearing that circumstances have transpired which threaten to destroy the friendly intercourse of this country with China, and that we are in danger of a war with that nation. They are encouraged, they observe, in presenting this subject before Parliament, by the inspired declaration — "that the time will come when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more;" and they therefore humbly pray the House to take such measures as may lead to an adjustment of the existing differences between this country and the Chinese people, — either through the mediation of some neutral power, or in any other way which may appear most suitable to the wisdom of Parliament, — without drawing the sword.

To lie on the table.

BOTANIC PLANTS.

Mr. HUME.—Seeing the Lord Steward (the Earl of Surrey) in the House, I beg to give notice that I shall, to-morrow, ask that Noble Lord whether it is the intention of Government to remove the collection of botanic plants from the royal gardens at Kew.

LIGHTING THE HOUSE.

SIR F. TRENCH — I beg to give notice that I propose, to-morrow, to move for an account of the expenses incurred by the experiment of lighting the House with the Bude light.

BONDING WAREHOUSES BILL.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I will take this opportunity of giving notice that, upon the second reading of the Inland Bonding Warehouses Bill, I intend to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the system of bonding to inland towns, as proposed by that Bill.

ECCLESIASTICAL DUTIES AND REVENUES BILL.

Mr. H. LAMBTON. — I will now give notice that, in committee on the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill, I shall move, as an instruction to the Committee, that the revenues of the cathedral preferments be applied to the religious ministrations of the Established Church.

TRANSMISSION OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS BY POST.

CAPTAIN POLHILL. — I wish to give notice that I intend, to-morrow, to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer relative to the transmission of the parliamentary Votes and Papers by post.

DUTIES ON MAHOGANY.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I wish to call the attention of the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade to the great anxiety which prevails amongst persons engaged in the timber trade, respecting a report that it is the intention of the Government to make some alterations in the duties upon the importation of mahogany. As those alterations must have a great effect on the market, I hope the Right Honourable Gentleman will have the goodness to state what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I believe that it has never been the practice of persons in the situation which I have the honour to hold to express any intention as to a contemplated alteration of a duty until they were prepared to ask the House to accede to that alteration. That is the rule that has been always acted upon by previous Presidents of the Board of Trade; and I think there are very good reasons why it should still be adhered to. I am sure, therefore, that my Noble Friend will be satisfied with the only reply that I can possibly give him, without deviating from the regular practice, — namely, that the subject has been brought under the consideration of the Board of Trade; but as to what will be the probable determination of that board, I am not, at present, at liberty to speak.

RETURNS, PAPERS, &c.

Lists of Electors. — On the motion of Mr. Cowper, Address agreed to for —

Account of the sums paid by the treasurer of each county, or riding or division thereof, in England, out of any public money, for expenses incurred by the clerks of the peace, and returning officers, in preparing, copying, or publishing the lists of electors for such county, riding, or division, for the years 1837 and 1838; also, the number and price of the copies of such lists or registers sold during each of those years, specifying whether in print or in manuscript.

Sidney, &c. — On the motion of Mr. Denison, Return ordered —

Of the number of vessels and their tonnage cleared out from the ports of London, Liverpool, and Glasgow, in the years 1838 and 1839 respectively; — namely, for Sidney, Port Philip, South Australia, Swan River, King George's Sound, Hobart Town, Launceston, New Zealand, and the South Sea fisheries; as well as for the various ports on the western coast of South America, round Cape Horn.

Barracks (Bahamas &c.).—On the motion of Lord Viscount Howick, Copies ordered —

Of any correspondence in the year 1836, and subsequent years, between the different public offices w th respect to the state of the barracks at Nassau and Turk's Island in the Bahamas, and also respecting the proposed more frequent issue of fresh meat rations to the troops in Jamaica, the West Indies, and Bermuda:

Extract of so much of a Report from the medical officer in the Bahamas in the year 1819, as relates to the effect produced upon the health of the troops by the state of the barracks in that colony; also, similar extracts from the Reports made by Staff Surgeon Watson, in July 1827, by Surgeon Richardson, of the 2d West Indian regiment, in 1828, and by the same officer in 1829, 1830, and 1834.

Soane's Museum. — Annual Account presented (by Act).

East India Company. — Account presented — of particulars of all compensations, superannuations, and allowances granted to reduced officers in 1839 (by Act).

Account presented — of allowances, compensations, remunerations, and superannuations, granted to officers and servants, in 1839 (by Act).

Wheat and Wheat Flour. — Return presented — of foreign and colonial wheat and flour imported and taken for consumption in each month from May to December, 1839; quantity remaining in warehouse, &c. (ordered 16th January).

King of Hanover. — Return presented — of sums received out of the Consolidated Fund by the King of Hanover, since his accession to the crown of Hanover, and of houses, land, &c. held by him (ordered 4th February).

Fleetwood Port. — Return presented — of memorials to the Treasury, on which Fleetwood was made an independent port (ordered 13th February).

Duchy of Lancaster. — Account presented — of the gross and net revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster for the year ending Michaelmas, 1839 (by Act).

Severally ordered to lie on the table.

TITHE COMPOSITION (IRELAND).

LORD STANLEY. — In consequence of the answer I received about three weeks ago from the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, and of some communications I have since received from Ireland in reference to that answer, I shall now move for "Returns, showing, in detail, the steps taken by Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland for the recovery of any sums on account of compositions for tithes vested in Her Majesty, under the provisions of 1 and 2 Vic. c. 109.; setting forth the list of defaulters, the sums for which they were severally liable, the proceedings had against each such defaulter, with the respective dates thereof, and the sums, if any, recovered from each respectively:

"Also, an Account of the sums paid by order of Her Majesty's Government to incumbents entitled to arrears of tithe composition, under the provisions of the Act aforesaid, and the proportion which such payments bear to the whole arrears due to such incumbents."

Agreed to; Returns ordered.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I move, Sir, that the Order of the Day for the Committee of the whole House on the Irish Municipal Corporation Bill be now read.

Upon the question being put, —

Mr. Shaw and Sir R. H. Inglis presented petitions against the Bill, — from the corporation of carpenters, millers, &c. of Dublin; and from the Reverend David Croly.

Mr. P. Somers presented a petition from Sligo, for continuing that borough in Schedule A of the Bill.

Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Litton presented petitions for compensation, — from William Frederick Bentley, deputy marshal or deputy sword bearer of Dublin; pipe-water turncocks of Dublin; sergeants at mace, town sergeants, and bellower of Drogheda; and officers of the corporation of Dublin.

Mr. LYNCH presented a petition from Galway, for transferring that town from. Schedule A to Schedule B of the Bill.

Mr. M. J. BLAKE presented a petition of the chairman of a meeting of inhabitants of Galway, suggesting alterations therein.

The Order of the Day was then read.

On the question, "That the Speaker do leave the chair," being put, —

COLONEL VERNER said: — I rise, Sir, not for the purpose of getting up a preliminary and prolonged discussion before the House goes into committee on this Bill, but to state, in a few words, the grounds upon which I gave my vote the other evening against the second reading of this Bill; and why, should a division take place, I am prepared, now, to vote against the question that you, Sir, do leave the chair. I should be sorry if it could be supposed that I obstinately adhered to an opinion in opposition to those of Honourable Friends near me, with whom I am in the habit of acting, and in whose judgment I repose the most implicit confidence. But I am quite sure that I shall not lower myself in their estimation by giving my vote in support of those principles which I, with them, have at all times, heretofore, advocated. And, with all deference to my Honourable Friends, I must say, that I can see no sufficient reason for departing from those principles, nor am I aware of any advantage that can be gained by the course my Honourable Friends have thought proper to pursue with regard to this Bill. I hold that we have no right to deprive one body of persons of rights and privileges which they have enjoyed for years, for the purpose of transferring the same to the hands of another body; and the more especially, when we consider that those privileges were given, in the first instance, for the express purpose of keeping the municipal and political power from those very individuals in whose hands it is now proposed to invest it. It will be remembered that very much of the time of the House was occupied, both in the last and in the previous Sessions of Parliament, in discussing this Bill, and that every disposition was shown by Honourable Members on this side of the House to render all the assistance in their power towards making it a Bill such as they could conscientiously support. Many amendments were proposed; and several of those which were suggested were thrown out by my Honourable Friends with that view, — all parties being anxious to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of this long-contested question. Some of those amendments were discussed in Committee, but for the most part they were met by the most determined spirit of opposition on the part of the Government and their supporters. I confess that I cannot perceive in what material respect this Bill differs from the one of last year. My Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Bandon said, the other night, that on looking through the present Bill it appeared to him to be even a more mischievous and a more dangerous Bill than its predecessor; and he called upon the Noble Lord near me (Lord Stanley) and the Right Honourable Gentleman to watch it closely, and, in its progress through Committee, endeavour to divest it of its objectionable provisions. My opinion is, that the objections to the measure, as it now appears before us, are so numerous, and so strong, that all our efforts to amend it in Committee will not have the effect of making it a Bill such as will be capable of giving satisfaction to the people of Ireland, or such a Bill as I should feel myself justified in supporting. I have, however, the consolation to know that it will not, immediately on its passing through this House, become the law of the land. It will be fully considered and closely scrutinised in another place; and there, at any rate, our suggestions and our amendments will be received with something like respect and consideration. But I know, also, that if the Bill should be returned to this House so altered and so amended as to meet with the approbation of Honourable Members on this side of the House, the precedent of former years will be followed, and it will be rejected by the party opposite. I know full well, that, although the Noble Lord may be induced to yield to us in some trifling matters of detail, the moment we touch on any of the important and more objectionable points of the measure, we shall be met with the same determined spirit of opposition as on former occasions. I believe that the one principal object which it is hoped to effect by this Bill is, the advancement of popery in Ireland, and the subversion of the Protestant religion. That is my opinion; and therefore it is, that, if called upon to record my vote on the question before the House, I shall certainly oppose the Bill going into Committee. As however, my Honourable Friends around me appear disposed to go into the consideration of the details of the measure, I shall, if the present motion be carried, be willing to render them every assistance in my power in their endeavours to amend the Bill in Committee. But if I were consulted upon the subject, I would say, let the present Bill be withdrawn, and a measure introduced for abolishing, altogether, municipal corporations in Ireland.

The question was then agreed to, and the House resolved itself into a Committee.

Preamble postponed.

Clause 2. "Reservation of all right of property and beneficial exemptions to freemen, their wives and children."

Clause 3. "None to be exempted from tolls except those who were so on the 5th June, 1835."

Clause 4. "Conditions of admission to be fulfilled as heretofore."

Clause 5. "No person to be admitted a freeman by gift or purchase."

Severally put, and agreed to, without amendment.

On the question "That clause 6., providing for the reservation of the parliamentary franchise to freemen, stand part of the Bill," —

Mr. SHAW said: — Mr. Bernal, the first amendment of which I have given notice relates to this clause. The subject now before the Committee has been so often discussed, and the arguments which bear upon it have been so often repeated, that I shall not now find it necessary to trouble the House at any length. As I have given notice of my amendments, every Honourable Member must have had an opportunity of knowing their scope and effect. I propose to take each amendment separately, shortly stating the grounds upon which I have brought them forward, and reserving any further observations that I may wish to offer till I find myself called on to answer objections. The first clause to which I wish to offer an amendment is that which has been introduced into the Bill for the purpose of reserving the parliamentary franchise to freemen. Now, what I propose is, to leave the law untouched as respects the franchise. I have understood that the promoters of the measure have no intention of disturbing the present state of the parliamentary franchise, and therefore it may be presumed that they purpose to leave the law relating to franchise untouched by the present Bill. The Noble Lord opposite, I am sure, will agree with me when I say that the Bill now in committee is intended to relate solely to the regulation of municipal corporations, and that no part of it has been framed with the view of altering the Irish Reform Act. Assuming that the fact is so, I take for granted that Her Majesty's Government can have no intention of effecting, by a side wind, a change which they disclaim any intention of directly accomplishing. I think, also, that they must admit, that the change I allude to is not one consistent with the spirit of the Bill. The amendments which I propose will leave the law as it now stands. I would permit the franchise to remain as it is according to law, and as it has been ever since the passing of the Irish Reform Act. I propose to omit Clauses 7. and 8. altogether, and to provide in Clause 6. that the parliamentary franchise shall remain unaffected. Three or four alterations in the law are contemplated by the two former clauses which I altogether deprecate, and which I shall use my best endeavours to resist. It will be recollected that in the year 1838 the Bill passed from one House to the other, and especially that the clause now under consideration was frequently sent backwards and forwards. However, in substance, my amendment has been agreed to by both Houses,—and agreed to, I may say, in the form in which I now bring it forward. It appears to me, therefore, that I have strong reasons for expecting a favourable consideration for it on the present occasion. I will not detain the House further than by moving as an amendment to Clause 6., to omit from the word "That" to the end of the clause, and insert the following words: — "all persons now entitled to vote at the election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for any city, town, or borough shall continue to enjoy such right as fully as if this Act had not been passed; and that every person who, if this Act had not been passed, would have had a right to be admitted a freeman or burgess, or to be placed on the roll of freemen or burgesses of any such borough as aforesaid, in order to be registered, and to vote in the election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament, or might hereafter have been entitled to acquire in respect of birth, or marriage, or servitude, or of any statute then in force, as a freeman or burgess, the right of voting in the election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for such borough, shall be entitled, if such borough be one of the boroughs named in the said schedule A, or one of the boroughs to which a charter of incorporation shall have been granted, as hereinafter is mentioned, to be admitted a freeman or burgess, and placed on the roll of freemen of such borough, and to acquire and enjoy such right of voting as fully as if this Act had not been passed; and if such borough be one of the boroughs named in the said Schedule B, to which no such charter of incorporation as aforesaid shall have been granted, to acquire and enjoy, without having been admitted a freeman or burgess, such right of voting as fully as if this Act had not been passed, and he had been admitted a freeman or burgess, provided he shall be enrolled on the freemen's roll in any such city, town, or borough, according to the provisions hereinafter contained." I also propose to omit Clauses 7. and 8., page 4., and Clause 11., page 6.

Mr. D. R. PIGOT.—I am prepared to show that the amendment now proposed is wholly unnecessary, even for the purposes which the Right Honourable and Learned Mover and his friends have in view. But more than this, I contend that Clause 6., as it now stands in the Bill, effectually protects every parliamentary right. If the contrary be asserted, I challenge Honourable Members on the other side to point out any individual case where the parliamentary right was, by the Reform Bill, intended to be preserved, and which is not provided for by Clause 6. as it stands. Clauses 7. and 8. stand upon perfectly distinct grounds; but I now affirm — and it will be for Honourable Members on the other side to rebut the assertion if I am in error — that no case can be imagined which has not been provided for by the clause. I think I shall be able to advance the strongest objections to the course of legislation proposed by the Right Honourable Gentleman — a course which was rejected last year. I beg Honourable Members to consider on what it is we are debating, — it is on the best means of preserving the parliamentary rights of freemen. It appears to me that the wise and proper course for that purpose would be, at once to provide for all possible cases, and avoid the loose and ambiguous phraseology of the amendment. The clause, as it now stands in the Bill, has been framed with the purpose of making provision for two classes, — those who are already in possession of the franchise, and those who are not; the former class may be subdivided into those who have registered and those who have been admitted to their freedom, but whose names have not been placed upon the parliamentary register. Now, I beg to call the attention of the Committee to the words of the clause: —

> Be it enacted that nothing herein contained shall prejudice, confirm, affect, or alter, any right of voting of any such person now registered, or any right to be registered of any such person who shall have been admitted a freeman of any such borough at any time before this Act shall come into operation in that borough.

Here the House will see that the rights of all registered freemen are provided for. I call on Honourable Gentlemen opposite to point out what more specific mode of legislating could be adopted for the purpose of, first, protecting the right of every admitted freeman; and, secondly, of preventing the confirmation of any invalid claim. I now invite and challenge Honourable Members on the other side to point out a single case which the words of the clause do not meet. It gives rights to "every person who shall then have, or who, if this Act had not been passed thereafter, would have had a right, by reason of birth, marriage, or service, or of any statute so in force, to be admitted a freeman of any such borough, or after his admission to the freedom of such borough, to be placed on the roll of freemen of such borough, and to acquire as such freeman the right of voting in the election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for such borough," — and who "shall be entitled to be admitted and enrolled, as a freeman of such borough, on the freemen's roll of such borough, according to the provisions hereinafter contained, and to acquire and enjoy, as such freeman of such borough, such right of voting as fully as if this Act had not been passed." I hope that the House will see how much more expedient it is to adopt the clear, plain language of the Bill, than the ambiguous phraseology of the amendment. I am quite aware that propositions of this kind are frequently prepared by parties not members of this House, and it therefore does not surprise me to find that the amendment bears a construction which its advocates, probably, never contemplated. There is another class of cases to be provided for, — the case of those who, when this Act shall come into operation, shall not have registered their freedom. These may be subdivided into two classes,— those who would have a right, should the law remain as at present; and those who would not have a right under any circumstances. With respect to the class mentioned by the Right Honourable Gentleman,— namely, those who have a right, but who have not been placed on the roll, —I do not think there is any necessity for making a distinction; but I have no objection to yield, in this instance, to his suggestion. What is the wording of the Right Honourable Gentleman's amendment? He proposes that "all persons now entitled to vote at the election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for any city, town, or borough, shall continue to enjoy such right as fully as if this Act had not been passed." This is equivocal phraseology, and may lead to a construction which would establish an invalid vote, even against the decision of a parliamentary Committee. I contend, that the passage is capable of a double construction; and I defy any one to show an instance of ambiguity in the clause as it stands. Let me now call the attention of the Committee to the next phrase,— one which I think is very curiously constructed,— "And that every person who, if this Act had not been passed, would have had a right to be admitted a freeman or burgess, or to be placed on the roll of freemen or burgesses of any such borough as aforesaid, in order to be registered, and to vote in the election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament, or might hereafter have been entitled to acquire in respect of birth, or marriage, or servitude." Now, why do you add the words, "or hereafter may be entitled to acquire?" These words may mean that the party has a legal right,— in which case his freedom cannot be withheld; or it may mean a class deriving their franchise through connection with freemen, made by what is called grace especial. I greatly fear that those who framed this amendment had it in their contemplation to admit freemen of that description. I trust, therefore, that the Committee, seeing that the clause, as it stands, is plain and intelligible, and that the amendment, to say the least of it, is full of ambiguous phrases, will agree to the original clause.

Mr. SHAW.— I do not wish to discuss the meaning of words more than is absolutely necessary; but, certainly, the speech of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has satisfied me that he has, as I had before suspected, a particular object in this clause. I am persuaded that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman means to introduce some more stringent construction of the words of the clause than would be ordinarily given to them. If, however, he will give up the seventh and eighth clauses,— and he really thinks that the sixth clause better expresses the meaning than the amendment which I have proposed,— I will not contend any longer against it, as there is very little difference in the words of the two latter.

Mr. PIGOT.— I can assure the Right Honourable Gentleman that I am, at this moment, perfectly unable to comprehend what connection there is between the seventh and eighth, and the sixth clauses. If he will favour me by stating in what lies the connection, I shall be ready to discuss the question with him. With respect to the former two, they are most undoubtedly intended to produce a change; but there is not the slightest intention of making the sixth clause auxiliary to them, or of giving to it any other construction than what the plain, clear language of it will allow. When the Bill was discussed in another place last Session, the Lord Chancellor objected to a clause similar to that now proposed by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman; I must now repeat that objection, seeing that the clauses, as they stand, are absolutely necessary.

Mr. O'CONNELL.— I have remarked that confusion always arises when Honourable Members jumble up two or three clauses in their consideration of one. The Committee are now on the sixth clause; and if there be any objection to the seventh and eighth clauses, let them be discussed when we come to them. My Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Clonmel has challenged the Right Honourable and Learned Member for the University of Dublin to point out any persons who will lose any rights by passing this sixth clause. He not only, however, has pointed out no such persons, but has admitted that the sixth clause does not materially differ from his amendment; and that, by itself, he does not object to it. I hope the House will not enter into a discussion on the seventh and eighth clauses, until we have decided on the sixth; at present they are not in the Bill; they are not sanctioned by the House; and the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman will have a stronger case against them by allowing the sixth to pass.

Mr. SHAW.— I would certainly prefer the phraseology of my amendment to that of the clause in the Bill; but I will not divide the House.

SIR R. PEEL. — I wish to ask the Honourable and Learned Member for Clonmel whether I have understood him to say there is a difference between the meaning of the words "entitled" and "having a right?" I do not see what distinction there is between them; and I would beg to point out, to the attention of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, the words used in the seventh and eighth clauses, which apparently mean the same thing.

Mr. PIGOT. — The difference I referred to was produced by the words immediately after those now quoted by the Right Honourable Baronet. The words in the two clauses are, "entitled to be admitted;" and in the amendment, "having a right to acquire;" — between which there is a clear distinction.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7., containing proviso as to freemen by birth and marriage.

Mr. SHAW. — I move that this clause be omitted from the Bill. It provides, that no person shall have a right to acquire, as a freeman, a right of voting in respect of birth or marriage, unless his right has been originally derived from or through some person who, in the case of birth, was a freeman previously to the 31st of March, 1831; or, in the case of marriage, claims through the daughter of a person who was a freeman previously to that day; or from or through some person who, since that time, shall have become, or shall hereafter become, a freeman in respect of servitude. My reason for objecting to this is, that it is an invasion of the principle of the Irish Reform Bill. With respect to persons claiming through marriage with the daughter of a freeman, the Honourable and Learned Gentleman contends that no such right existed until after the passing of the Irish Reform Bill. I can show him that the right existed a hundred years ago. Mr. West, the late Member for Dublin, who carefully searched the corporation records, found the right to have existed at that distant period. It is true that since that time, and up to the passing of the Reform Bill, the right remained in abeyance; but the reason of that was, that the corporation exacted greater fees by admitting the freemen by grace especial. I must say, that this clause will inflict a monstrous injustice on the corporations of Ireland.

Mr. PIGOT. — I admit that this clause does make a change; and I will now state the grounds on which that change is made. There is a similar provision in the English Reform Bill, and the object of it is to prevent the wholesale manufacture of honorary freemen. These honorary freemen have no right to vote for Members of Parliament; and our object is, to prevent persons claiming the franchise on account of their connection with them. The clause is not without precedent, for I find in a Bill which was introduced into the House on the 23d of May, 1838, by the Honourable and Learned Member for Bandon, a similar clause respecting electors, with the exception of its applying only to cases of birth, and not of marriage; and it is from that clause I have framed the one now under discussion. The Bill to which I have just alluded was stated to be brought in by Sir W. Follett, Mr. E. Tennent, and Mr. Serjeant Jackson; so that I have good authority for adopting its phraseology. The only difference I have made is, in extending it to cases of marriage as well as birth. I am perfectly ready, however, having stated what is the object of the clause, to concur in its modification for the purpose of securing any rights now in existence, provided such modification do not extend to the acquisition of any rights in respect of birth or marriage, through honorary freemen, since the year 1831.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — My Honourable and Learned Friend, in justification of the clause we are now discussing, refers to a clause introduced by me in another Bill, two years since; but that was introduced for a very different object from that of the clause now before the House. My Bill was for amending the law in respect of the registration of electors in Ireland — a most important subject; and I inserted that clause because the Government, for years, had brought in Bills professing the same object, but had not carried them out in a bonâ fide manner. I found clauses in Bills which had been introduced by Attorney Generals on the subject much more objectionable than mine, and those I cut down, because I was anxious to do what was likely to conciliate all parties. But my Honourable and Learned Friend mus borrow no argument from that clause, because it was intended for a totally different purpose. Let him introduce a Bill for that purpose, and I will support it; but let him not force the clause objected to into the present Bill.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—The Learned Serjeant acknowledges that, on another occasion, he was anxious to pass the clause for the sake of conciliation. Why should not the Learned Serjeant practise conciliation on the present occasion? He asserts that the clause has nothing to do with this Bill; I assert that it has. What is intended by the clause is, merely to put the laws of the two countries on the same footing; and, surely, that is a most desirable object. I do not wish to impute motives to the Right Honourable and Learned Recorder in opposing this clause; I think he has acted throughout with great candour; but I put it to him, whether there is anything in the English law like a right without a remedy? But is there any freeman of Dublin who has a legal remedy to enforce his right of franchise? What is now called a right, amounts, in the city of Dublin, merely to a claim, which the aldermen and common council have an absolute power of rejecting at pleasure, and without assigning any reason. It is a right without a remedy, and such a right is unknown to the law.

Mr. SHAW. — The Honourable and Learned Member forgets that Chief Baron Joy decided that the freemen had a right.

Mr. LITTON. — It is quite absurd to say that these two clauses have no influence on the meaning of the sixth clause. The Honourable and Learned Member for Clonmel has disclaimed any intention of interfering with existing rights; but the seventh and eighth clauses would have directly that effect. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has taken pains to prove that this clause is merely declaratory, — that it does not take away a certain right, because that right never existed. If so, of what use is the clause? But we say that the right in question does exist, and the question is yet to be decided. If the Bill is merely intended to regulate municipal corporations, it should not set out by altering the Irish Reform Bill. On the grounds, then, that it is totally unprecedented to legislate on one subject, while another, and a totally different one, is before the House, and that this clause is introduced for the purpose of abrogating a right, I shall feel it my duty to oppose the insertion of this clause.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — It is quite true that we do not intend by the Bill to touch existing rights; it is a distinct and definite abuse, only, which is meant to be dealt with. That abuse is the wholesale manufacture of honorary freemen. The franchise now in question is derived through the corporate body, and therefore forms a proper subject of legislation in a Bill for the regulation of municipal corporations. A clause which existed in the Reform Bill for England was omitted in that which affected Ireland; and the present clause is introduced to place both countries in the same situation.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I think the Noble Lord has said enough to justify us in striking the clause out of the Bill. Either the right to the franchise exists, or it does not: if it do not exist, there is no occasion for legislation; but if it do, the right should be protected. The Noble Lord, by introducing this clause, is interfering with the Irish Reform Bill. I cannot agree with the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, that there is no right to freedom in the Dublin corporation, seeing that that question has been decided in the affirmative by the Chief Baron of Ireland.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—I admit that there may be a right, subject to qualification by a superintending body; but that is not the case in Dublin. The corporation, there, has the fullest power, without assigning any reason, to reject any application for freedom. That application is not made as for a right, but is technically termed a beseech; and, if refused, no mandamus could enforce compliance. In Cork the case is different; and a person entitled may force the corporation to give him his freedom; but in Dublin there is no control over them.

SIR R. PEEL. — I will, on the present occasion, give no opinion on the merits of the enactment proposed to be introduced by this clause; but I should much rather see it made the subject of a separate Bill. If any improvement is more conspicuous than another in modern legislation, it is the practice of confining Acts of Parliament to their proper objects, and of thus dispensing with the necessity of consolidating Acts. It would be very inconvenient to have to look for the alterations in the system of representation, not only in the Reform Act itself, and in Acts for the amendment of the Reform Act, but also in Acts for totally distinct objects, such as the reform of municipal corporations. In my own Acts for the consolidation of the criminal law, I attended to these considerations; and I must say that, without reference to the merits of the present clause taken by itself, I am sorry to see an old and objectionable practice revived on this occasion. I do think that the real object of this Bill should be, to form a complete municipal code for Ireland.

Mr. LYNCH. — In my opinion, this clause, by abolishing the class of honorary freemen, is only carrying out the intention of the Irish Reform Bill.

Mr. SHAW. — My Honourable and Learned Friend forgets that we are sweeping away, altogether, the machinery by which freemen have been made, and that, if we pass this clause, we shall be sweeping away the freemen altogether.

Clause amended, and question put, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee then divided: — Ayes 100, Noes 53; Majority in favour of the clause 47.

Clause 8. "No admission or enrolment unless right of freedom prevailed on 30th March, 1831."

Clause 9. "Lord Lieutenant to appoint a person to make out a freemen's roll in certain cases."

Clause 10. "Town clerk to make a freemen's roll."

Clause 11. "Remedies by mandamus under 33 Geo. III. c. 38., and by quo warranto under 38 Geo. III. c. 2., to be applied with reference to the freemen's roll."

Clause 12. "As to boroughs in which there is no town clerk, and places where there is no churchwarden."

Severally put, and agreed to.

On Clause 13. ("Corporations in Schedule A to be styled mayor, aldermen, and burgesses") being put, —

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON said: — I have, Sir, an amendment to propose on this clause, which is, that it be struck out altogether. My object in this is, to render it optional with the different communities in Ireland to which the Bill has reference to take or refuse corporations as they may think fit. The Bill now before the Committee divides the towns in Ireland affected by it into two classes. The first class (Schedule A) consists of 11 towns, on which the acceptance of corporations is to be imperative; and the second (Schedule B) of 37, with which it is to be optional; and which, in the case of their desiring to have corporations, are to state their wishes through the medium of a petition to Her Majesty, signed by a majority of the ratepayers. Now, my proposition is, to render the acceptance of corporations optional with all. I cannot conceive what objection there can possibly be to this alteration, as, in cases where corporations are wished for, the parties could get them, without difficulty, by petition. An Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lynch) has lately presented a petition from the town of Galway, in which the inhabitants pray that they may not be encumbered with a corporation. This same town presented a petition to the House of Lords, last year, when this Bill was before their Lordships, in which a similar prayer was preferred; and it has again come forward, on the present occasion, with the same request. It was alleged, last year, by those Honourable Members who did not approve of the petition, that the only reason why the inhabitants of Galway objected to a corporation was, that they disapproved of the boundaries proposed by the Bill with reference to that borough; that they thought the intended municipal district too restricted in its extent. But that was not a fair representation of the case, as any one who may read the petition will see. The inhabitants complain that they have no funds for municipal purposes, and that the law, as it stands at present, is quite sufficient for all their wants; and when I say this, I am now fully borne out by the Honourable Member for Galway himself, in the petition he has this night presented. They do not wish to have a corporation forced upon them against their will, and say that its effect will be to burden them with a load of most unnecessary expense. But the people of Galway do not stand alone in this opinion. The people of Clonmel have also petitioned against this compulsory enforcement of a corporation upon them; and the petition which I presented from that town is signed by three fourths of the ratepayers of the borough. The Honourable Members for Waterford and others have admitted this, and said, that they thought that the people of Clonmel objected to have a corporation forced upon them on account of the exaggerated amount of the expense which it had been urged upon them would be the result. But the people of Clonmel are sensible people; and, forming their own judgment upon the matter, say that it is not right to force a corporation upon them, if they do not wish to be saddled with this addition to their present burdens; — calling upon this House, at the same time, not to subject them to the constant recurrence of popular elections, which tend to the excitement of so much ill blood and disturbance. Belfast, also, a town containing 80,000 inhabitants, objects to this Bill, the petitioners stating that they are a commercial community, and not at all anxious to be troubled with municipal affairs. They state that they have, already, a local board, which answers their purpose, and that they are averse to the expense that would be entailed upon them by the establishment of a corporation; and, under these circumstances, I ask the House why we should compel them to submit to a corporation? Let the Committee, then, not forget that these are all towns named in Schedule A; and I think I may, with such proofs before me, deny that there exists any desire in Ireland with respect to this Bill. I believe that this House will find that every town in Schedule A will protest against being saddled with municipal bodies in this compulsory manner. How many petitions, let me ask, have been presented from towns in Ireland praying to have corporations conferred upon them? Let them but fairly understand the bearings of this measure, and the expense and ill-will to which its provisions must inevitably lead, and I will venture to say that you will have petitions against this Bill from every town to be included in it. It has, however, been said, that it is the duty of these towns to have corporations: but why is it so? Parliament has already, by its legislation, denuded them of the administration of justice and of their police, and of the care of their harbours; and why, I should be glad to know, should the townspeople be now expected to desire the establishment of fresh corporations, when they see that the existing bodies have been stripped of all their most desirable functions? It is urged, among the arguments that have been advanced in support of this Bill, that, as England has got reformed corporations, Ireland should have them also; and I cannot but feel that it is this argument which has induced many English Members to vote for the total abolition of corporations in Ireland; for I believe the fact to be that, in a great many cases, the English people would be glad to get rid of their corporations; and that they have proved, as they will in Ireland, a scourge, instead of a benefit, in too many instances. I therefore entreat Honourable Members to consent to that which is just and reasonable, by giving an option to the towns of Ireland with respect to the establishment of corporations. For my own part, although I shall vote for the second reading of this Bill, I am still persuaded that the best thing this House could do would be, to abolish municipal corporations in Ireland, altogether. I repeat that it is a most unjust course to force these corporations upon any of the Irish communities against their expressed will; and, recalling to the minds of Honourable Members the fact that four of the towns in Schedule A have already petitioned against a compulsory inclusion in the provisions of this Bill, I do hope that the House will agree to my amendment, that this clause be struck out, and the boroughs mentioned in Schedule A be transferred to Schedule B, and that all reference to Schedule A be omitted in the subsequent clauses of the Bill.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I agree, altogether, Sir, with the view taken of this subject by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Bandon. I, Sir, have also voted for the second reading of this Bill, and for this reason, — that I am one of a great party in this House which acceded to the course laid down by a Noble Duke elsewhere, and in which course the leader of the party with whom I have the honour to act in this House has coincided. That Right Honourable Gentleman has said, that if a good Bill were passed, which should place the Irish Church on a solid foundation, and if a rating under the Poor Law were established as a test of the franchise, then corporate reform would be conceded. Although I have voted, however, for the second reading of this Bill, I entertain the strongest objection to many of its details, some of which are founded in gross injustice to the Protestants of Ireland. Now, with respect to Sligo, although I am aware that a petition has been presented to the House in favour of the Bill, signed by upwards of 1000 persons, I am yet, nevertheless, aware that four fifths of the population are against the town being placed in schedule A. I am instructed that a petition will shortly be placed in my hands, signed by persons representing four fifths of the property of the town, against making it compulsory on the town to have a charter of incorporation. In fact, all the wants of the population are supplied by an Act passed in the forty-third year of the reign of George III. Commissioners under that Act are appointed, who act gratuitously, which commissioners are elected by the 20*l*. householders, and to their care are intrusted the lighting, and paving, and watching of the town. A Reform Bill for Ireland has passed, however, and the franchise is extended to the 10*l*. householders; and these commissioners have now nothing whatever to do but that which could quite as well be done at quarter sessions before the assistant barrister. Besides; the corporate property of Sligo is under 100*l*. a-year, which, I fear, would go but a very little way towards meeting the great increase of the expenses which the introduction of the provisions of this Bill into that borough would produce. I want to know, then, why that town should have a corporation forced upon it? The only reason I can assign is, that the priests and five or six merchants have petitioned in favour of it. With these exceptions, the petition does not, so far as I can discover, contain the signature of a single person possessing any property in the town. There is no trouble whatever, as to politics, in the election of the commissioners appointed under the Act to which I have referred, as they are composed of persons of all politics and creeds, and do their duty in a manner conducive to the general advantage of the town. Wherefore, then, I would again ask, is Sligo to be encumbered with a corporation? The inhabitants are already highly taxed; but, in addition to this, they will soon have to be taxed under the Poor Law, besides the expense to which they will be put by the Ordnance survey. Under all these circumstances, and seeing that these continually recurring elections must be the source of perpetual heart-burnings, I implore the House to give the inhabitants the option of having, or not having, a corporation, as they may deem fit.

MR. LYNCH. — I hope, Sir, after what has been said with respect to the borough of Galway, I may be allowed to offer a few words on this subject. The year 1835 was the first year in which this Bill was introduced into Parliament, and at that time, I find, Galway did not make any any objection to the measure. In 1838, the boundary question first came on, and still, at that time, the town did not put forth any objections. In 1839 it was, that, for the first time, certain new fiscal regulations were introduced into the Bill, to which, taken together with the restricted boundary within which the corporation of this town was to be included, the inhabitants decidedly objected, in a petition which I, at the time, presented on their behalf to this House. I was subsequently prevented, by severe indisposition, from following up the subject at that period; and the Bill relating to boundaries was passed. The inhabitants of Galway petitioned the House of Lords on that occasion to have the boundaries of the borough extended, and the Noble Lord who presented it, pressed their Lordships to alter the restriction of those boundaries, or that the borough should be erased from this Bill. A petition, similar to that presented to the House of Lords, was presented, also, to this House, the prayer of which was confined to asking the House for a larger boundary. The objection, therefore, of the town of Galway is not against having a corporation, but against having, together with these new fiscal regulations, so restricted a boundary. I shall, then, on the part of the people of Galway, propose that they may first have an extension of boundary, and then there will be ample time, hereafter, to effect the other object, if necessary. With respect, however, to the general question, is it, I would ask, any argument against municipal corporations, to say that two or three towns have objected to have them? Or, again, is it any argument against municipal corporations, to tell us that some few other towns are to be put to the trouble, if they wish to have corporations, of petitioning Her Majesty for charters of incorporation? If, Sir, there are no better grounds than these advanced against the general question of corporations, I can only say that I shall give my opposition to the proposal of the Honourable and Learned Member.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — You have not read to the House the statements in the petition presented from Galway this year.

COLONEL CONOLLY. — I perfectly concur in what has fallen from my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Bandon, as to the propriety of leaving it optional with the towns of Ireland to have a corporation, or not. I think it too hard that corporations should be forced upon some of the towns, and that it should be left as a matter of choice with the rest; and, upon a former occasion, I opposed their being granted to small towns, and for this reason, that they are so poor they cannot afford to avail themselves of the provisions of the 9th of George IV.; and now, notwithstanding their impoverished state, Her Majesty's Ministers are determined to force this Bill upon them, with all its expensive machinery, the provisions of which have a tendency to disturb the peace of society, and to create religious feuds, rather than to promote concord and happiness. The least, I think, the House can do, is, to leave it optional to have a corporation or not, as the inhabitants of the towns may think fit. From what has occurred, with respect to Galway, it is manifest that it is the financial question that pinches there; as they want a larger boundary to enable them to bear the expense of a corporation; and so it will be in all the other towns. It is monstrous, then, to force corporations on the more considerable towns, and to make it optional in the case of the smaller ones. Now, with regard to Sligo, all the functions of a corporation are provided for by an Act passed so long since as the reign of George III., and yet the House is called upon to give a corporation to a town that does not want it. The measure, as it stands, can produce no good; on the contrary, it is fraught with evil: and I still think the greatest boon that could be conferred on Ireland, would be to abolish corporations altogether. If this course were adopted, and the revenues of the corporations given in support of the poor, I am confident there is not a town in Ireland that would prefer a corporation to the relief of the poor. For these reasons, and finding it hopeless to abolish corporations altogether, I shall vote for leaving it optional with all the towns to apply for charters incorporative.

Mr. D. R. PIGOT. — With respect to the petition from Clonmel against this Bill, it was got up through the means of a placard, a copy of which I hold in my hand, which declares that a new corporation would entail on the town expenses, first, of 1350*l.*, next 750*l.* for watching and lighting, 500*l.* for county cess, 500*l.* for the repairs of the town, and 4000*l.* for poor rates.

[Laughter.]

Pending the efforts to get signatures to this placard, however, there was a large meeting in favour of corporations, from which emanated a petition, signed by 1450 persons, and which petition I have presented to this House. The Honourable and Learned Serjeant (Jackson) has called the attention of the House to a petition from Clonmel, which he has characterised as a petition respectably and numerously signed. Now, what are the facts? Out of a population of 19,000 souls, this numerously and respectably signed petition, and which the Honourable and Learned Serjeant says is signed by persons representing four fifths of the rated property of the town, contains just 172 signatures, — the whole of which do not represent one sixth of the rated property; — and out of these 172 persons who signed the petition, several are non-resident and some others are minors. One of them is the turnkey of the gaol; another is the assistant turnkey; another is a driver to a gentleman of some property near the town; another is a tailor; another is a porter to the hospital; and two others are minors, the sons of a highly respectable clergyman who keeps a school. I think, therefore, the Honourable and Learned Serjeant has laid too much stress on this petition.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I cannot take upon myself to set up my knowledge of Clonmel against that of my Honourable and Learned Friend; but I can tell him that I derived my information from a most respectable gentleman, whose name I am ready to state, and whose letter I can show, if he chooses. The gentleman to whom I allude is Mr. Peddard. That gentleman authorised me to appeal to the Honourable Member for Waterford, and also to the Honourable Member for Dungarvan for a character of the petitioners. I did make that appeal, and both one and the other of these Gentlemen amply verified the statement I have made. The Honourable Member for Waterford said the petition contained the names of some of the most respectable proprietors of the town, although he thought it was got up on account of the placard to which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has just referred, and though some persons in the humble walks of life have signed it, and amongst them some Roman Catholics, I will again assert that it contains signatures representing, at least, 10,000*l.* worth of rated property. I hope, therefore, the House will consider that this petition is most respectably signed.

Mr. PIGOT. — I deny that the signatures to this petition represent more than 800*l.* of the rated property of the town.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — Under what rating?

Mr. PIGOT. — Under the 9th of George IV.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — Is there no other rating? I call on the Honourable and Learned Member to answer that question.

Mr. SHAW. — I must state that I have received the same information respecting the petition from Clonmel as my Honourable and Learned Friend, but from a different authority. Mr. Prittie, a son of the late Member for the county of Tipperary, has informed me that the petition speaks the sentiments of the great majority of the inhabitants, both Protestant and Catholic, and well represents the wealth and intelligence of the town. I am bound to express my dissent from the particular plan proposed, of having a governing body of half Protestants and half Roman Catholics; but the spirit of the petition I think, is excellent, while I must say, that that presented by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. Pigot) is of a very opposite character, — the first name upon it being that of the parish priest, and its language calculated to produce irritation and ill-will. I concur with the petitioners in thinking it reasonable that a corporation should not be forced upon them; and though I do not think that my Honourable and Learned Friend can succeed in giving an option in all cases, yet, if he persists in dividing the House, I shall, as I approve of the principle of his proposal, certainly vote in its favour.

Mr. PIGOT. — I merely rise to say, Sir, that I never intended to imply that the persons who signed this petition were not respectable; all that I intended to infer was, that the statement of my Honourable and Learned Friend upon that subject was exaggerated.

LORD STANLEY. — I rise, Sir, to explain the grounds of the course I intend to take upon this question. I confess that I still remain of opinion that it would be more for the general advantage of Ireland, would tend more to good government and peace, and to the promotion of all the objects of harmony, if corporations were to be wholly abolished in Ireland; and that opinion has, since I first expressed it, been materially strengthened by what I have observed of the subsequent diminished feeling in favour of corporations among the people of Ireland. However, I have consented to withdraw that opinion, after successive defeats in this House, and I have acquiesced in the opinion of the great majority of the House, that we ought to establish corporations as organs of municipal government in Ireland. I am very unwilling that any charge should be substantiated against the Conservative side of the House, that we seek, now, to withdraw from the principles which have been, in former Sessions, acquiesced in by the Conservative party in both Houses of Parliament. One of those principles is, that there should be a Schedule A, which should consist of towns to which the principle of option should not apply. On this point, I feel concluded by what has passed; and as the proposition of my Honourable and Learned Friend goes to say that there should be no Schedule A, I feel bound, though very reluctantly,—for I always differ reluctantly from my Honourable and Learned Friend, but especially on this occasion, when I am not sure that my Honourable and Learned Friend has not much reason and justice on his side,—to vote against the amendment.

Mr. BLAKE.—Will the Honourable and Learned Member divide the Committee on his amendment?

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I certainly shall.

Mr. BLAKE.—I can only assure the Honourable and Learned Gentleman that Galway has petitioned in favour of a municipal corporation; but I have received a letter from Ireland telling me that but few of the ratepayers wish to have that town in Schedule A. I hope, under those circumstances, that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman will not divide the Committee now, but wait till the schedules are before it, as he can then move that Galway be placed in Schedule B.

Mr. SOMERS.—With respect to the petition which I have presented from Sligo, I beg to tell the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman opposite that there are five names among the signatures attached to that petition which are of greater weight and importance than those of all the Conservatives in that town put together. The petition is signed by upwards of 2000 persons, and it states that the present commissioners, there, have shamefully neglected the improvement of the harbour; and that Sligo is the worst paved and worst lighted town in all Ireland. The inhabitants, on the contrary, are as intelligent and enterprising a body of persons as any in the British dominions.

COLONEL PERCEVAL.—I am well aware that Sligo is an enterprising and rising town; and I am not aware that I cast any aspersion on any name attached to the petition from that town. The Act, which is known as the 9th of Geo. IV., has been adopted in the town, and the inhabitants, at present, are enabled to light and watch it. Many pipes have been already laid down, and the town is about to be lighted with gas. With respect to the cleansing of the town, I am quite willing to admit that much neglect prevails in that respect, and that the town is very badly cleansed. But still, I do not see how the condition of the town is to be improved by laying an additional tax upon the inhabitants. I think that all the public business of the town of Sligo might be arranged without placing any additional tax upon the inhabitants; and this, too, at a time when they are on the point of being subjected to the burden of the new poor rate. I should regret to have said anything offensive with respect to those who have signed the petition from Sligo, for it was signed by many who, though not my political, are my personal, friends.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—The number of petitions presented from Ireland in favour of corporation reform prove, conclusively, the state of public feeling on that subject in Ireland. Though the petitions from England, in favour of church extension, have been more numerous, still they do not contain half the number of signatures which were affixed to the petitions from Ireland. I am glad to hear corporations undervalued by Honourable Gentlemen opposite. At one time it was said that any change in the corporations would destroy the Protestant religion of Ireland. These pillars, I am afraid, are now rotten; at all events, they are thrown aside, as of no value whatever. If the old corporations were of no value, I hope the new corporations will be of a very different description.

The House divided: — Ayes 109, Noes 30; Majority 79.

AYES.

The clause was then agreed to.

On Clause 15. being proposed, —

Mr. SHAW said: — A principle running through many of my amendments is applicable to the present clause, — namely, that the whole machinery of the Bill should be based on a 10*l.* franchise, ascertained by rating; I will therefore propose that in the cases of applications of the inhabitants of the boroughs named in Schedule B, for a charter of incorporation, instead of a majority of the rated inhabitants, the petition shall be signed by a majority of those rated to 10*l.* and upwards. The amendment I propose is as follows: — Omit the word "shall" in line 9., and insert the following words, "would be qualified (so far as such qualification can be ascertained from the assessment of the poor rate, made under the Act, for the more effectual relief of the destitute poor in Ireland), to have been enrolled on the burgess roll of such town, if the same had been named in the said Schedule A, and such burgess roll had been made according to the provisions hereinafter contained."

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I cannot accede to the proposition. As the Bill gives the option to the inhabitants of these boroughs, whether they should have a corporation or not, I think it only fair that the option should be allowed to rest with the majority of the ratepayers, without the limitation which the Right Honourable Gentleman proposes.

The amendment was negatived, and the clause was agreed to; as were also clauses up to Clause 22. inclusive.

On Clause 23.

Mr. SHAW. — I move the omission of the words "for any purpose of grand jury presentment." The object of the words in the clause, is to keep a certain portion of the rural population in the suburbs and liberties of the boroughs liable to taxation, though cut off by the new boundaries, and therefore not deriving any possible benefit from the new corporation. I think that unreasonable; and that upon the principle on which the Government profess to act, of conferring an advantage by the grant of corporations, they should not withhold that advantage, and at the same time impose the burdens incident to it.

On the question, "That the clause stand part of the Bill," —

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON said: — I think that there is an amendment of mine on the paper, which has precedence of that of my Right Honourable Friend. I beg to move the omission of the 23d clause, and the substitution of the clause following, in place thereof: — "And be it enacted, that for the purposes of this Act, all places locally situate or included within the boundaries of any borough, or of any ward thereof, as defined under this Act, shall be deemed and taken to be a part or parts of such borough, or of such ward thereof, respectively; and in those boroughs which are counties of themselves shall be part of such county, and of none other; and in every case in which the metes and bounds of any borough or county, under the provisions of this Act, shall not include any place or precinct which before the passing of this Act was part of such borough or county, such place or precinct shall thenceforward be taken to be part of the county wherein such place or precinct is situated, or with which it has the longest common boundary: provided nevertherless, that if any such place or precinct shall have been liable, before the passing of this Act, to contribute to any rate made for the purpose of satisfying any lawful debt to which the ratepayers of such borough or county were liable to contribute before the passing of this Act, and in case any difference shall arise concerning the proportion of such debt, which ought, therefore, to be paid and contributed in respect of such place or precinct, it shall be lawful for the Chief Justice of Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, in Dublin, in the case of the county of Dublin, and the county of the city of Dublin; and in the case of any other county, for the senior justice of assize for the county of which such place or precinct shall thenceforward be taken to be part on his circuit, on the application of the council of such borough, or of the chairman of a public meeting of the ratepayers of such place or precinct, to appoint, by writing under his hand, a barrister not having any interest in the question, to arbitrate between the parties, and by his award, under his hand and seal, to assess the proportion, if any, of such debt which ought therefore to be paid and contributed in respect of such place or precinct; and such arbitrator shall also assess the costs of the arbitration, and shall direct by whom, and in what proportion, and out of what fund, the same shall be paid; and such rate as aforesaid shall continue to be levied by warrant of the council of such borough, and paid by such place or precinct, as if this Act had not passed, until such proportion shall have been fully paid and satisfied to the treasurer of the borough, and no longer: provided nevertheless, that every county gaol, house of correction, or lunatic asylum, or court of justice, which at the time of the passing of this Act is taken to be for any purpose within any county, shall still, for all such purposes, be taken to be within such county, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding." I contend that this clause, as it stands, differs materially from the Bill of last year; and I maintain that great mischief will arise if this clause be retained in its present form. I maintain that the rural districts — separated from the boroughs — ought to be thrown into the adjoining county, otherwise those districts will be deprived of any quarter sessions, or the superintendence of any magistrates. In England, the boundary Commissioners recommended that those parts cut off from the boroughs should be thrown into the counties at large; and the proposition was adopted. Now, in Cork, for instance, there are only four square miles built upon, and to that district only, according to the Bill, would the boundaries extend; whereas, seventy square miles are included in the county of the city, and will be deprived of quarter sessions and the superintendence of magistrates; and, in addition to this, it would be deprived of a coroner. I hope, therefore, that my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland will consent to adopt my amendment.

Mr. PIGOT. — I think the amendment deserves consideration, and I have no objection to allow the clause to stand over for the present.

The clause was then postponed.

Clauses down to 31., inclusive, were then agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 32., as to the qualification of burgesses.

Mr. SHAW. — This clause has long been the principal subject of contention between the two sides of the House; they have now more nearly approached the settlement of it; but still there is a considerable difference between my views and the present provisions of the Bill. The Bill admits a 10*l.* franchise in the case of the boroughs in Schedule A, but provides an 8*l.* franchise in the smaller boroughs, which may be incorporated; and, after three years, the mere rating, as it was in England. Now I propose to make the franchise 10*l.* in all boroughs, and I entirely object to the mere rating at any sum, as in the English boroughs, —first, as a system which would at all times be inapplicable to the peculiar condition of Ireland; and next, as legislating for a period which is, as yet, three years off. I propose to omit Clauses 33. and 34., and to substitute for Clause 32. the following:—

"Every man of full age, who, on the last day of August in any year, shall be an inhabitant householder, and shall, for six calendar months previous thereto, have been resident as such within such borough, or within seven statute miles of such borough, and who shall occupy within such borough any house, warehouse, counting-house, or shop, which, either separately or jointly with any land within such borough occupied therewith by him as tenant, or occupied therewith by him as owner, shall be of the yearly value of not less than ten pounds, to be ascertained and determined in manner following, and not otherwise (that is to say), such value shall be a sum composed of the net annual value at which the premises so occupied by such man shall be rated (as they are hereby required to be) to the relief of the poor under the said Act for the more effectual relief of the destitute poor in Ireland, and of the amount of the sums at which the landlord's repairs and the landlord's insurance shall be estimated and stated in any rate to be made in pursuance of the said Act: Provided always, that no such occupier shall be admitted to be enrolled as a burgess, or to vote at any election of municipal commissioners under this Act, unless he shall have been rated in respect of such premises to the relief of the poor, and shall also have occupied such premises within the said borough, or other premises of the like nature within the said borough, and rated as aforesaid, for the space of twelve calendar months, at the least, next preceding such last day of August; nor unless such occupier shall, on or before the last day of August in such year, have paid or discharged all rates for the relief of the poor, and all municipal or other local cesses, and all rates and taxes which shall have become payable by him in respect of such premises, except such as shall have been imposed or become payable within three calendar months next before such last day of August. After line 38., omit to the end of the clause."

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH.—I certainly cannot consent to this amendment. The Government have already made great concessions to the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, but this alteration, if agreed to, would go to damage a very important portion of the Bill.

Mr. SHAW.—I contend that the qualification which I propose is called for by the circumstances of the case. A similar qualification is prescribed by the Scotch and English Reform Bills.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH.—I differ with the Right Honourable Member. The amendment doubles the term of previous occupation, and cuts down the term of exemption to one half. Now, this would be unjust towards Ireland, because it makes the terms of qualification more stringent, there, than in England or Scotland. Ireland is the poorer country, and therefore the qualification ought not to be placed on a less favourable footing than that of its richer neighbour. Considering the very large concessions which have already been made, in order to conciliate all parties, I do not think such a proposition ought to have been urged, and I certainly shall not consent to any suggestion that would have the effect of laying an additional restriction on the qualification.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—I object to any suggestion that would have the effect of making the Irish Bill different from the English Bill. My object is to make the law for both countries equal. I beg it to be distinctly understood that I refuse to be a party to the 10*l.* qualification, or indeed to any other mode of rating than that which assimilates the Irish Municipal Reform Bill to the English Municipal Reform Bill.

Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN.—I can see no rational ground for dealing with Ireland in a different spirit from the other parts of the empire. I understood that this measure was to be agreed to in a spirit of conciliation, and I do not think that this can take place if we are to consent to make such a distinction as this.

LORD STANLEY.—I think it would be more advisable that we should wait till the end of the three years, and not now legislate for institutions which will, perhaps, at the end of that period, be called into existence. Whatever may be said to the contrary, I would not wish to deal with injustice towards Ireland, or to act towards that country in a different spirit from the other parts of the empire. But I contend that to settle a 10*l.* franchise is not dealing with Ireland in a spirit different from the other parts of the empire. Now, with respect to the period of occupation; as the law stands at present, a man cannot register until after six months' occupation, nor can he exercise the franchise until he has been registered for six months; so that, in point of fact, he cannot now vote until after twelve months' occupation.

Mr. SERJEANT CURRY.—Sir, I certainly object to the amendment proposed by the Right Honourable and Learned Member for the University of Dublin. I contend that it is not fair to treat this as the value to the landlord, but it is the value to the tenant; and that, therefore, we ought not to allow for the landlord's repairs and insurance, but for the tenant's rates and taxes.

Mr. SHAW.—I think my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Armagh is quite incorrect in the test which he has contended for. The real value of the premises is what they will bring in the market; as between the landlord and tenant, and not what the tenant pays by way of rates. The sums for repairs and insurance are allowed to keep the premises in the same condition as when they are let. If you allow tenants' rates and taxes, this absurdity will follow, that the better the taxation of a borough is managed, and the lower taxes fall upon any given house, the less will be the value of that house.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—Sir, we are going into a variety of details as to value which were not introduced into the English Municipal Bill. It is unfair that all these calculations should fall upon the Irish voter, which will open a wide field of litigation, simply because you will not give the same franchise as in England. What is the objection to giving us the English franchise? Why, that we have not paid three years' poor rates. I admit that that makes a difference. But the Noble Lord will not give us the same franchise when we have paid three years' rates.

LORD STANLEY.—I expressed no opinion as to what might be necessary to be done three years hence.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—But you propose to strike the clause out of the Bill, and leave us to the chance of what may be done in some other Bill. If you leave the clause in the Bill, you give us the franchise in three years; but by striking it out, you render it doubtful whether we shall get the franchise at all. Your principle is, to exclude as many as you can from the franchise. Although poor rates have not been paid for three years, other rates have been paid during that time, and that payment, coupled with three years' residence, ought to give the franchise. I see no reason for postponing, to an indefinite period the prospect of our obtaining the English franchise.

Jackson, Mr. Serjeant

Clause, with some verbal amendments, agreed to.

Clause 33. "Qualification of burgesses after three years."

Clause 34. "Rates to be paid up last day of August by all persons previous to enrolment."

Clause 35. "Premises giving the municipal franchise to be separately valued, and rated for the relief of the poor."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Clauses 36. "Public notices to be given of taxes payable in advance."

On the clause being put,—

Mr. SHAW said:—Sir, in this clause I find the following proviso: "And such cess, rate, or tax shall not, for the purposes aforesaid of this Act, be deemed to have become payable until after the completion of such notice." It is provided, that notice shall be given "for three successive days, on some convenient place at or near every court house and town hall within such borough, and by causing the same to be published in three successive impressions or editions of some public newspaper." Now, suppose any one of these three things be omitted, is it intended that the tax shall not be payable? Although it may be quite right to require proper notice, it would be most unreasonable, with regard to the interests of the public, to render the omission of any one of these minute particulars fatal to the validity of the rate.

Mr. PIGOT.—The omission will not exempt the party from liability to the rate. The only effect of the clause is, to prevent persons from being disfranchised who may not have paid in consequence of insufficient notice.

Mr. SHAW.—Sir, the policy of the Act is, that the rates shall be paid; and we ought not to facilitate their non-payment by a provision of this kind.

Mr. PIGOT.—I remember an instance, in 1837, of a rate having been made on a Saturday, payable on that day, an election having been fixed for the Monday following; by which means a vast number of persons were disfranchised who would have paid if they had had sufficient notice.

Mr. GOULBURN.—Sir, I consider this a most extraordinary mode of legislation. A public functionary is here called upon to give notice in a particular form. In England, the omission of such notice would render the party liable to a penalty. Instead of following the same course in Ireland, you provide that the performance or neglect of duty, on the part of a public functionary, shall have the effect of disfranchising one half the constituency. The better course would be, to state what notice you require, and make it compulsory.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, you cannot make the notice compulsory. You may punish the party who omits to give it, but you will punish the honest elector at the same time. All that the present clause provides is, that a man shall not be disfranchised if he have not had notice of the existence of the rate which may have been made. It does not take away the remedy for enforcing the rate. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. Pigot) has alluded to the circumstance of a rate having been made on a Saturday for a year in advance, when an election was to take place two days afterwards. I consider such a mode of proceeding quite unreasonable, and that the clause now under consideration will prevent its recurrence.

Mr. LITTON. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin must be aware, from the mode in which rates are made, that the parties assessed have abundant opportunities of knowing the fact, without the possibility of being taken by surprise. The notice now required appears to me to be totally useless, inasmuch as by the law of rating, the books are open to the inspection of the ratepayers. I do not believe that the notice is introduced in the clause for that purpose. I believe its effect will be, to prevent the enforcement of the rates. Now, what is the notice required? "The trustees or other persons by whom the same shall be imposed, or by whom any rate, assessment, or order shall be made for imposing or levying the same, shall cause public notice thereof to be given, by posting such notice for three successive days;" that is clear enough, but the clause goes on to say, — "on some convenient place at or near every court house and town hall within such borough." If any one of these places should be omitted, it is evident the rate cannot be enforced: and a second question arises, as to the meaning of the word "near," for some may consider a mile near, while others may not consider one hundred yards near. The notice is also required to be given in "three successive impressions or editions of some public newspaper." Why insert the word "public"? In Dublin, there are many papers which may, perhaps, not be considered public newspapers, and an objection would again arise in that case. I consider that the notice required is only a means of letting in a host of minor objections, and that its effects will be most injurious. With respect to the case alluded to by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General for Ireland), I can only say, that I never heard of a rate being laid on for the purpose of disfranchisement.

Mr. PIGOT. — There is no doubt whatever that the fact is as I have stated it.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Perhaps, Sir, it was laid on by accident, and perhaps the election on the following Monday took place by accident! Now, as to the spirit in which these objections are made, I introduced a clause, in a former Bill, compelling the Bank of Ireland to open an account for all taxes payable in Dublin, to which any one might pay his arrears. That clause went elsewhere, and was stigmatised as diabolical; but I do not think it deserved that epithet any more than the clause which provides that one man shall not be disfranchised by the fault of another.

Mr. SHAW. — Sir, I believe an investigation took place into the circumstance alluded to; when it was denied that the tax was laid on for any such purpose, and proved that it was laid on in the regular way.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 37. "Exceptions as to aliens and paupers."

Clause 38. "Occupiers may claim to be rated."

Clause 39. "In cases where persons occupy premises jointly, each person to be entitled to be enrolled as a burgess."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Clause 40. "How distances are to be reckoned."

On the clause being put, —

CAPTAIN JONES said: — I would suggest the propriety of omitting this clause altogether. It provides that distance shall be computed by the nearest public road. Now, I contend that it would be better to calculate it as the crow flies, otherwise the distance may be continually varying.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — Sir, I would recommend the fixing of some central point, from which the measurement shall take place.

Mr. PIGOT.—The words are exactly the same as in the English Bill, and I believe no difficulty has been experienced in this respect.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 41. "In cases of titles by descent, &c., how the occupation is to be reckoned."

Clause 42. "No burgess to be elected who is not qualified under this Act."

Clauses agreed to.

Clause 43. "Occupiers, notwithstanding paying rates, may recover or set off the assessment against the party chargeable with the same."

Clause 44. "Persons claiming bonâ fide exemption from taxes entitled to be enrolled as burgesses, on payment or tender of one year's tax, but to remain liable to arrears if the claim to exemption be not well founded."

Clause 45. "Declaring what taxes shall be payable in any borough."

On the three clauses being put, —

Mr. SHAW said: — I have a very great objection to these clauses, which were first introduced by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. O'Connell). The first allows occupiers voluntarily paying rates to recover them from the person liable; the second entitles the claimant to be placed on the burgess roll, without paying his rates, provided the mayor thinks he has made a bonâ fide claim to exemption; and the third declares what taxes are to be payable, — the pipe-water tax of Dublin having been struck out of the list. I object to these clauses for the reasons so well stated by the Lords for disagreeing with this House, when we proposed to restore them; namely, that they contain provisions which are at variance with the general rules of law.

Clauses agreed to.

Clause 46. "Office for receiving taxes to be kept open for one month before the 31st of August in each year."

Clause 47. "Churchwardens of each parish to make out lists, in the first year, of persons qualified as burgesses in each borough."

Clause 48. "Town clerks to make out lists in boroughs in following years."

Clause 49. "Collectors to make lists of persons subject to payment of poor rate, &c. according to Schedule D, No. 6., in this Act."

Clause 50. "Town clerk to print the lists."

Clause 51. "Persons omitted from the lists to give notice to the town clerk. Notices as to person not entitled to be retained in the lists. Lists of claimants, and of persons objected to, to be published, &c."

Clause 52. "Lord Lieutenant may appoint revising barristers for the present year."

Clause 53. "Mayor to revise lists, and, upon due proof, to insert and expunge names. Power to rectify mistakes in the lists."

Clause 54. "Mayor, on revising the lists, to have power of adjourning, of administering oaths, &c., and shall settle and sign the lists in open court."

Clause 55. "Borough list to be kept by the town clerk, and copied into books, with the names numbered. Such book to be the register of voters from which election shall be made."

Clause 56. "No stamp duty payable on enrolment."

Clause 57. "Application may be made to the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland for a mandamus to put a burgess on the roll."

Clause 58. "Applications for quo warranto to be made within the term next but one after election."

Clause 59. "Corporations not to become extinct by reason of election not being held on appointed days."

Clause 60. "Provisions of Act of Irish Parliament, 19 Geo. II. extended to elections under this Act."

Clause 61. "Penalty for wilfully and corruptly expunging, or not inserting, any name. Mayor, town clerk, or churchwarden, neglecting duty, guilty of misdemeanour."

Clause 62. "Copies of burgess roll to be made for sale."

Clause 63. "Expenses of lists how to be defrayed."

Clause 64. "Mayor, aldermen, and councillors to be chosen in every borough."

Clause 65. "Who not qualified to be chosen mayor, alderman, or councillor, or commissioner."

Clauses severally agreed to, with verbal amendments.

Clause 66. "Burgesses to vote for the councillors of the ward in which their property is situate."

On the clause being put, —

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON said:— At the end of this clause, which provides that burgesses shall vote for the councillors of the ward in which their property is situate, I propose to add the following proviso: "Provided always, that every person entitled to vote in the election of alderman and town councillor in any borough or ward, shall not vote for more than one half the number of the aldermen and town councillors to be elected for the borough or ward in respect of which such person shall be entitled to vote." On the second reading of the Bill, I intimated my intention of moving this proviso, and, in so doing, I hope for the concurrence of the Noble Lord opposite, as well as that of his colleagues. After the speeches which have been delivered in the course of the debates on this subject, I can scarcely believe that the object of the promoters of this Bill is to transfer the power which the Protestants have hitherto enjoyed, to the Roman Catholic party; and yet, if the Bill remains in its present form, such must necessarily be its effect. I stated my fear on this subject when Sir Michael O'Loghlen was Attorney General for Ireland; and that Right Honourable Gentleman then said,—

> I know it has been said, that the inevitable effect of this measure would be, to take the power out of the hands of one party, and to give it to another. I am aware this has been repeatedly said; but, whatever credit may be attached to my assertion, I have no hesitation in saying, that, if I thought this measure would take power from one exclusive and violent party and give it to another equally so (if such a party could be found), it would not have a more determined opponent than myself; but I deny this will be the effect of the measure, though such will be the objection of some Honourable Gentlemen.

Now, I am in a condition to prove that this Bill will transfer the power from the Protestant party to the Roman Catholics; and if I succeed in demonstrating this position, I trust the House will prevent the perpetration of such a mischief. The great fault found with the existing corporations was their exclusive character, and the House is bound, in reconstructing them, to guard against a similar evil. I hold in my hand Returns, from which it is quite manifest that there will be an immense preponderance in favour of the Roman Catholics in all the corporate towns, except Belfast and Londonderry. The following statement will show the Committee the relative proportions of the number of houses occupied by Protestants and Roman Catholics, in various towns, together with the number of inhabitants:

	Inhabitants.	Houses occupied by Protestants.	Houses occupied by Roman Catholics
Cork,	107,000	1634	2766
Dublin,	240,000	4852	9250
Galway,	33,000	153	327
Kilkenny,	23,000	187	420
Limerick,	66,000	683	1517
Waterford,	28,000	617	1183
Clonmel,	12,000	217	535
Drogheda,	15,000	321	559

In Londonderry, which contains 19,000 inhabitants, the number of houses occupied by members of the Protestant Established Church is 473, and by Presbyterians 892, whilst the number occupied by the Roman Catholics is 1471: so that it is only by adding the Presbyterians to the members of the Established Church that the numbers are about equal to the Roman Catholics. The same is the case in Belfast. Now, is it just that you should transfer the power entirely from one party to the other, and thus continue the very vice of which so much complaint has been made? I contend that it is neither right nor politic, for it is an ascertained fact that the bulk of the property is in the hands of the Protestants, and that the smaller houses are occupied by the Roman Catholics. I propose, as an effectual check, that every person voting for town councillors or aldermen shall vote only for one half of the number to be elected. That was the suggestion of a Noble Lord (Earl Grey) in another place, on the English Corporation Bill, and it is the principle adopted in the 77th clause of the present Bill with respect to the election of auditors and assessors. I cannot conceive why the same principle should not be applied to the election of town councillors and aldermen. The object of that provision is, that both parties may be fairly represented, and all I ask of the Committee is, that the principle may be carried out. Another reason why I should urge the adoption of the proviso which I have submitted to the Committee, is the conduct of the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland. It is well known that they have taken a prominent part in every species of election, denouncing those who are opposed to them. I have received letters from Newry, Limerick, and a variety of other places, conveying loud complaints with respect to the kind of interference in the election of guardians of the poor, by means of which, Protestants have almost everywhere been excluded. One of these letters is from Mr. Vesey, of Queen's County, complaining that a middleman was elected chairman of the board of guardians on the recommendation of the priests, in opposition to Lord de Vesci. In Clonmel, where no Roman Catholic is possessed of large property, only two Protestant gentlemen have been appointed, and I am informed by my correspondent, that in all probability there will not be one. Under these circumstances, I consider it only just that some protection should be given to Protestants under the present Bill. My object is, to have both parties fairly represented; and I trust the Committee will agree to the amendment which I have proposed, on which I certainly intend to divide.

An Honourable Member. — I rise, Sir, to second the amendment.

Question put, "That the proposed proviso be added."

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — Sir, the amendment appears to be so ludicrous that it has driven away nearly one half of the opponents of the Bill. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth shakes his head in a manner which cannot be mistaken, and even the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire will not march through Coventry on this occasion with the Learned Serjeant. The Learned Serjeant proposes that no person shall vote for more than one half of the individuals to be elected. I beg to ask how this principle is to be carried out, when only one person is to be elected, or where there are three persons, which will be the case on the first election in Dublin. I think that you will take away the whole value of the Bill by depriving voters of the right of choosing the whole of the individuals who are to be elected.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — Sir, my Honourable and Learned Friend wishes to prevent the complete transfer of power from the Protestants to the Roman Catholics, which will take place in nine cases out of ten under the present Bill. What has been the case with respect to the Poor Law Bill? A printed list was sent to me from Limerick, signed by the priest, recommending that certain persons should be elected, and every one of the persons named was elected, to the exclusion of the Protestants. There certainly were one or two nominal Protestants on the list ——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

But they were only placed there for the sake of appearances; and I consider them even more objectionable than the honest straightforward Roman Catholics. The list was in reality that of the priest. Unless the present suggestion be adopted, a complete transfer of the corporate power will take place from one party to the other.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — Sir, the Honourable Member for Kerry has inquired how I propose to get over the difficulty where there are odd numbers to be elected. I beg to say there are no such odd numbers in the schedules to the Bill. I will give the number for four places:

	Wards.	Aldermen.	Councillors.
Belfast,	5	10	30
Clonmel,	2	6	18
Cork,	8	16	48
Drogheda,	3	6	18

And in all the other places enumerated the numbers of aldermen and councillors are even.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — At the second election there will be three aldermen for each ward.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — It is very easy to vary the phraseology, by saying that each person shall not vote for more than one half the number to be elected.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I certainly do not agree with the Honourable and Learned Gentleman on this occasion. This Bill gives the power to the majority to elect; and to whatever party the majority may belong, that party of course will be successful. That is the case in England, with regard both to elections for Members of Parliament and municipal elections; and I do not think we ought to act on a different principle in Ireland. I was glad to hear the Gallant Member for Sligo talk of honest and straightforward Roman Catholics. If there be honest and straightforward Catholics, I do not see why they ought not to be elected.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I thank the Noble Lord for having noticed that expression. There are many honest and straightforward Roman Catholics; but the great majority are not free agents, for they are under the influence of the priests, who make use of them for the purpose of frustrating the intentions of those who are honest and straightforward.

Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN. — I do not think the Honourable and Learned Serjeant has overcome the difficulty suggested by the Honourable Member for Kerry, as to cases where there are an odd number of councillors to be elected. If the principle of the Honourable and Learned Serjeant be carried out, each voter may have to vote for four and a half candidates, if it should so happen that nine vacancies exist in any borough.

SIR R. FERGUSON. — Sir, I hope the Honourable and Learned Serjeant will not divide.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 35, Noes 102; Majority 67.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 67. Directing the election of aldermen and councillors.

Clause 68. "One third part of the council to go out of office annually."

Clause 69. "One half of the number of the aldermen to go out of office every three years."

Clause 70. "When day of election falls on a Sunday."

Clause 71. "Elections, how to be held. Mode of voting."

Clause 72. "Polling booths to be provided."

Clause 73. "No inquiry of the voter except as to his identity, and whether he has voted before at the same election. Forms of questions as to these points."

Clause 74. "Poll may be closed if an hour has elapsed without a vote being tendered."

Clause 75. "Result of election, how to be declared."

Clause 76. "Manner of proceeding if any person is elected an alderman or councillor in more than one ward."

Clause 77. "Election of auditors and assessors."

Clause 78. "Council to appoint an alderman in default of the mayor."

Clause 79. "In case of illness of alderman."

Clause 80. "Assessor may appoint a deputy."

Clause 81. "Where the borough is not divided into wards, the elections for the whole borough to be similar to elections in wards."

Clause 82. "Existing mayors and councils of boroughs in Schedule A to go out of office on election of councils under this Act."

Clause 83. "Certain elections not to be had."

Clause 84. "After the commencement of the Act, existing mayors, &c., and officers of boroughs in Schedule B to continue until new election or dissolution."

Clause 85. "The power of mayors and common councilmen to cease on the dissolution of the corporation."

Clause 86. "Justices of the peace to cease on dissolution, except in Carrickfergus, where they are to continue in office until a separate commission shall have been granted to that town."

Clause 87. "The powers of salaried magistrates under Acts of Parliament continued until determined by the Lord Lieutenant."

Clause 88. "Occasional vacancies of councillors to be filled up by fresh elections."

Clause 89. "Occasional vacancies in the office of alderman to be supplied."

Clause 90. "Election of mayor by council."

Clause 91. "The mayor to be a justice of the peace for the borough and for the county, and returning officer at elections of Members to serve in Parliament."

Clause 92. "Mayor, aldermen, councillors, &c. not to act until they have made a declaration of acceptance of office."

Clause 93. "Every burgess elected to the office of councillor, and every councillor elected to the office of mayor or alderman, shall accept the office, or pay a fine to the borough fund."

Clause 94. "Provision for resigning office."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Clause 95. "Any mayor, alderman, or councillor, &c., if declared bankrupt, or insolvent, or absenting himself from the borough, shall lose his office."

On the clause being proposed, —

MR. SHAW said: — Sir, this clause provides that the lord mayor shall not be absent for more than two calendar months, "unless in case of illness or other reasonable cause to be allowed by the council or board of commissioners." I consider that the clause leaves the matter too open. Suppose the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin were to be elected lord mayor, his attendance in Parliament might be considered a reasonable cause of absence. I think the lord mayor ought to be resident; and that, at all events, two months' absence is quite sufficient. I propose to substitute the word "unavoidable" for "reasonable."

MR. O'CONNELL. — Sir, the case put by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman does not apply. If I were elected lord mayor of Dublin, I could go over once a month with my Recorder.

LORD MORPETH. — I think the word "unavoidable" would be far too stringent, and that the clause had better remain in its present condition.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 96. "Penalty on person not qualified, &c. acting as mayor, alderman, or councillor, &c."

Clause 97. "Persons convicted of bribery disqualified from voting at any elections. Persons offending in any of the cases aforesaid discovering others so offending, within twelve months, discharged from all penalties."

Clause 98. "No person to be made liable to incapacity or penalty, unless prosecution commenced within one year."

Clause 99. "Questions to be decided by a majority of councillors present; one third part of the whole number to be a quorum."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — Sir, I object to proceeding any further with the Bill at this late hour.

LORD MORPETH. — We only propose to take the unopposed clauses.

Clause 100. "Power to appoint town clerk, treasurer, and other officers, and to take security for due discharge of their official duties."

On the clause being proposed, —

Mr. SHAW said: —It is a matter which requires serious consideration, whether the town council should have the power of giving salaries. I think too great a power ought not to be left in the hands of the council to do that which is most objectionable. If the Noble Lord will allow salaries granted in this manner to come under the revision of the Lord Lieutenant, or the Lords of the Treasury, that will, perhaps, be a sufficient check.

LORD MORPETH. — I believe the town councils will not be extravagant in this respect. They are responsible to the ratepayers, and I think the granting of salaries may safely be left in their hands. Besides, it would be unfair to make a distinction between the power of the town councillors in Ireland and in this country, with respect to the fixing of salaries.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 101. Proviso restricting the creation of officers in boroughs.

Clause 102. "Officers to account, &c., according to the orders of the council or board. Summary remedy against officers not accounting, &c."

Clause 103. "Duties of sheriffs performed by other officers to cease on dissolution of corporations in Schedule B."

Clause 104. "Coroners to be discontinued on dissolution of corporations in Schedule B."

Clause 105. "Clerks of market or weighmaster appointed by corporations to continue in their offices as if this Act had not been passed."

Clause 106. "Officers to continue until removed."

Clause 107. "Reservation of certain pensions and allowances."

Clause 108. "Power of council to appoint committees."

Clause 109. "Property of the corporations vested in the commissioners."

Clause 110. "Debts and contracts of corporations may be enforced by the commissioners."

Clause 111. "Property vested in the commissioners to be subject to the claims of creditors, &c. of the corporations."

Clause 112. "Commissioners empowered to bring and defend actions, and compromise and settle accounts."

Clause 113. "Commissioners to keep an account of the property of the corporation, which shall be called the town fund of the town."

Clause 114. "Commissioners to pay debts due from corporations."

Clause 115. "Commissioners may insure buildings and manage revenues."

Clause 116. "Commissioners may appropriate public buildings to public purposes, for the benefit of the towns."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Clause 117. "Charitable trustees."

On the clause being put, —

Mr. SHAW said: — I would suggest to the Noble Lord the propriety of continuing the power of charitable trustees until the 1st of November, 1841, instead of the 1st of November, 1840, before the right to appoint shall vest in the Lord Chancellor.

LORD MORPETH. — I have no objection to extend the time until the 1st of March, 1841.

Mr. SHAW. — Sir, I would suggest, on the precedent of the South Grammar School, the insertion of the following proviso at the end of the clause: — "Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any corporation of a house of industry, fever hospital, or county infirmary in Ireland, or to the president and assistants of the charitable society of Belfast, or to the hospital and free school of King Charles the Second, Dublin, commonly called the Blue Coat Hospital, or any real or personal estate belonging thereto."

LORD MORPETH. — I do not see that any useful object would be gained by the insertion of such a proviso.

Mr. SHAW. — I also think there ought to be a proviso respecting the shareholders in the city of Cork.

Mr. PIGOT. — It is my intention to prepare a clause, carefully guarded, on the subject of the Cork shareholders.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 118. "Corporation to execute trusts."

Clause 119. "As to election of a limited number of councillors to be joint trustees for certain purposes. Saving provisions of local Acts in towns in Schedule B. Other corporations, of which any body corporate named in the schedule, or any of its members, form part, to be continued."

Clause 120. "Provision for the election of future trustees."

Clause 121. "Present trustees of certain Acts continued for a definite time."

Clause 122. "Powers vested in trustees may be transferred to councillors."

Clause 123. "Provision for additional constabulary force."

Clause 124. "Payment of the additional constabulary force."

Clause 125. "Power for council to order parts of borough, not within local Acts as to lighting, to be included in such Act. Proviso as to amount of rate for lighting."

Clause 126. "Council may assume the power of commissioners under 9 Geo. IV. c. 82., for lighting streets of any borough."

Clause 127. "Council to have power to make bye-laws."

Clause 128. "Bye-laws to be printed."

Clause 129. "As to breaches of bye-laws."

Clause 130. "All corporate property and all fines to be received on account of the borough fund."

Clause 131. "Treasurer to pay no money but by order of council."

Clause 132. "Orders for payment of money may be removed into the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland by certiorari."

Clause 133. "Salaries of recorder, town clerk, treasurer, and other officers, and election expenses, to be paid out of such fund."

Clause 134. "Tolls or dues payable before the passing of this Act not to be altered or reduced until payment of the debt chargeable thereon. Commissioners may abolish tolls."

Clause 135. "Council authorised to raise funds for payment of expenses incurred in carrying this Act into execution."

Clause 136. "Appeal to the recorder or assistant barrister of the county."

Clause 137. "Act not to render corporate property liable for debts not chargeable thereon, nor to authorise the levy of new rates for payment of debts."

Clause 138. "Accounts of receipts and disbursements to be kept, audited, and published."

Clause 139. "Councils to transmit yearly accounts of income and expenditure to Lord Lieutenant, and an abstract thereof to be laid before Parliament and published."

Clause 140. "Provision for auditing accounts of the Cork Wide Street Commissioners."

Clause 141. "Remedy for misapplication of property. Proceedings not liable to stamp duty."

Clause 142. "Power of sale and leasing restrained. Provision in certain cases of leasing."

Clause 143. "Commissioners of Treasury may authorise other dispositions."

Clause 144. "Leases of certain buildings, and of ground for building on, or for making gardens &c., may be made for 75 years."

Clause 145. "Collusive purchases, sales and demises of corporate property, since the 5th of June, 1835, for undue consideration, may be set aside."

Clause 146. "Proceedings before the jury."

Clause 147. "Lord Lieutenant may direct special cases not to be questioned."

Clause 148. "This Act not to give validity to any disposition of lands."

Clause 149. "Sale of advowsons, &c."

Clause 150. "Certain provisions of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 39. extended to Ireland."

Clause 151. "Provision respecting the warden and vicars choral of Galway."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Clause 152. "In cities and towns which are counties, sheriffs to be appointed."

On this clause being put, —

Mr. SHAW said: — Sir, I hope the Noble Lord will consent that sheriffs shall be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, as in counties at large, instead of being chosen by the town council.

LORD MORPETH. — I cannot consent to an alteration which will take away the right of choosing the sheriffs.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 153. "Provision for the continuance in office of existing sheriffs."

Clause 154. "City and county of Londonderry to be a county, the sheriff of which to be nominated by the Crown."

Clause 155. "In certain boroughs council to appoint a coroner."

Clause 156. "Coroners to make returns to Lord Lieutenant."

Clause 157. "County coroners to act in other boroughs."

Clause 158. "Coroners of boroughs, in certain cases, may appoint deputies."

Clause 159. "For the visiting of gaols."

Clause 160. "For authorising contracts for the maintenance of prisoners."

Clause 161. "Commission of justices of peace to be issued for certain boroughs."

Clause 162. "Council may make byelaws, on which the Crown may appoint salaried justices."

Clause 163. "Council to provide a police office."

Clause 164. "Justices need not be qualified by estate."

Clause 165. "How far summonses and warrants may be enforced."

Clause 166. "Justices to appoint a clerk, who shall not be the town clerk or of the council, nor be concerned in the prosecution of offenders committed by the borough justices."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Clause 167. "Recorder to be appointed by Her Majesty in certain boroughs."

On the clause being put, —

Mr. SHAW said: — As the present clause has no reference to my office, I have been requested by some recorders in other boroughs, where the duties are to be increased and the salaries are inadequate, to move the following amendment: "Provided also, that if in any case the Lord Lieutenant shall consider that the salary of any recorder or deputy recorder of any such borough is an inadequate remuneration for the several duties to be performed by him under the provisions of this Act, it shall be lawful for Lord Lieutenant to direct an increased salary to be paid to such recorder or deputy recorder by the treasurer of such borough out of the borough fund, who shall pay the same accordingly."

Mr. PIGOT. — I will postpone the clause, and consider it.

Mr. SHAW. — At the end of the clause I wish to add the following proviso: — "Provided always, and be it enacted, that in every case in which any court of quarter sessions of the peace for a county shall be holden in any borough named in the said Schedule B, or within seven miles thereof, at the time of the incorporation of such borough, in pursuance of such petition as aforesaid, no grant of a separate court of quarter sessions for such borough shall be made, notwithstanding any petition for such grant, so long as such court of quarter sessions for the county shall continue to be so holden as aforesaid."

Proviso negatived; Clause postponed.

Clause 168. "Recorder of the city of Dublin."

Clause 169. "Existing courts of record in boroughs in Schedule B to be continued until determined by the Lord Lieutenant."

Clause 170. "Recorder to be a justice of peace for the borough."

Clause 171. "Justices to make declaration before acting."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Clause 172. "Sessions of the peace to be held for the borough, of which the recorder is to be the sole judge. Justices to exercise jurisdiction as to licences."

On the clause being put, —

Mr. SHAW said: — I propose, as an amendment, to omit the proviso giving jurisdiction to borough justices, because I think they cannot discharge those duties with satisfaction either to themselves or the public.

Mr. PIGOT. — There must be some jurisdiction on this point, and I think there cannot be a better authority than the justices acting in open court.

Mr. LITTON. — I think the most proper person is the recorder, who is not accessible to private applications, and who is not so likely to favour the parties as the justices may be. I hope Honourable Gentlemen will not insist on this clause being passed in its present shape, for it will only lead to the necessity of having it set right elsewhere.

LORD MORPETH. — I do not think the House is to be intimidated by the threat of being set right elsewhere. I shall certainly object to the amendment, because the recorder cannot have such an opportunity of judging of the character of the parties as the justices have.

Amendment negatived; clause agreed to.

Clause 173. "Mayor, in the absence of the recorder, may open and adjourn the court."

Clause 174. "Capital jurisdictions, and all other criminal jurisdictions in boroughs other than are specified in this Act, abolished."

Clause 175. "Offenders committed to borough sessions whose jurisdiction is taken away, to be tried in the adjoining county."

Clause 176. "County justices to have jurisdiction in all boroughs which have not a separate court of sessions of the peace."

Clauses severally agreed to.

Clause 208. "Officers to receive compensation on removal."

The clause having been put, —

MR. SHAW said: — I wish to put it to the Committee whether those persons who, since August, 1836, have been elected officers bonâ fide for discharging the functions of the corporation ought not to receive compensation? A hope was held out that something would be done for them; and it will be a great hardship if their case is not taken into consideration.

MR. PIGOT. — If any particular case of hardship can be made out, undoubtedly it will receive consideration.

MR. LITTON. — I think it would be unjust to deprive the four or five persons who will be affected by this clause, of their offices, without compensation. I trust that every one who holds office, place, or employment will have such compensation as the tribunal, to whom the general compensation under this Act shall be referred, shall decide.

MR. PIGOT. — I am of opinion that a general sweeping enactment, letting in those persons with regard to whom there has been distinct legislation, would not be a proper proceeding. It would be far better to make a distinct enactment for the particular cases under this Bill. I have not heard any distinct proposition on this subject. One gentleman, it is admitted, has been the law agent of the corporation since the year 1836.

MR. SHAW. — If anything of this kind be done, it must be done by those connected with the Government. Will the Honourable and Learned Gentleman bring forward any clause to meet this particular case? If so, these gentlemen may be enabled to bring before him the particulars of their own cases.

LORD MORPETH. — Sir, I agree with the Honourable and Learned Gentleman near me, that there ought not to be any general dispensation with the law on this subject. Certainly, if any particular cases are brought under our consideration, we shall have no objection, before the Bill is reported, to consider whether we ought to make a special proposition to the House on the subject.

MR. SHAW. — I propose to insert in this clause the Treasury minute, which gives an appeal to the Treasury in cases of compensation. It is impossible to insert that minute in the English Act; but as it is acted on, I cannot see any objection to introducing it into the present clause, which corresponds with the clause in the English Act. It will make the law more simple if this minute be set out.

LORD MORPETH. — I must consult the Chancellor of the Exchequer before giving an answer.

Mr. LITTON. — Sir, I wish to propose, with a view of carrying out still further the views of my Right Honourable Friend, that if any officer holding a place of profit under a corporation, shall resign his office within three months after the passing of the Bill, in such case he shall be entitled to compensation as if he had been removed. I do not deny that this provision is introduced at the instance of those gentlemen who believe that their situations will be made uncomfortable under the proposed Act.

LORD MORPETH. — Perhaps the Honourable and Learned Member would include all those who would rather retire on a compensation than perform the duties of their office. If so, he must make his clause a great deal more comprehensive. But I do not think that he has the least idea such a clause will be acceded to.

Mr. SHAW. — The appointments to some of the offices have been made within these four years, and I think it would be unjust to deprive the present occupants of them without compensation.

Mr. PIGOT. — The persons who have taken office within that time had sufficient notice that they would not be entitled to compensation upon the abolition of their offices.

LORD MORPETH. — Although I cannot consent to any general measure giving compensation to all the parties affected, I have no objection, as I said before, to consider any case of peculiar hardship.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 209. " Compensation to junior aldermen of Dublin."

Clause put.

Mr. SHAW. — I would suggest that some consideration ought to be given to the junior aldermen of Dublin, who, in the course of three or four years, would have succeeded to the office of lord mayor. I feel particularly for Alderman Drummond, who, after having gained the general respect of his fellow citizens, was just within the reach of the utmost object of his ambition, by becoming lord mayor, when he is interfered with by the present Bill. The persons to whom I have alluded will also be deprived of the emoluments attached to the office of president of the court of conscience, to which they would have been entitled after filling the office of lord mayor. I think they are fully entitled to compensation in this respect.

LORD MORPETH.—I can only reply, as in the other cases, that their claim may be considered hereafter. Perhaps the clause had better be struck out.

Clause struck out accordingly.

Clause 210. " Compensation to be secured by bond or certificate under common seal."

Clause 211. " When the Act shall come into operation."

Clause 212. " Periods connected with the first registration and election may be deferred by Orders in Council."

Clause 213. " Interpretation clause."

AFFAIRS OF SPAIN—CONVENTION OF BERGARA.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I can assure your Lordships that it is with great diffidence and much embarrassment I rise to address you on a subject which, I am free to confess, does not now possess the same degree of interest that formerly belonged to it. I also feel that I rise under considerable disadvantage, in consequence of the absence of my Noble Friend the Illustrious Duke, who, I will say, understands the foreign policy of this country and the affairs of all Europe better than any other man in this kingdom, — not excepting the Noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government, or the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. But, before I proceed to address your Lordships, I am ready to state, in justice to those Noble Lords, that I believe they and their friends unanimously feel, in common with me, the deepest regret at the absence of the Noble and Illustrious Duke, and that we have not, on this occasion, the assistance of that wisdom and discretion of which your Lordships have so many times experienced the value, when the foreign affairs of England have been brought under consideration. I am sure that among your Lordships there is, and can be, only one prayer on this point, and that prayer is, that the Illustrious Duke may soon be again amongst us, in perfect health, and ready to enlighten us by his wisdom and his counsel. I confess that, after the various discussions which have taken place in this House, and elsewhere, on this subject, especially since the commencement of the present Session, it requires some degree of nerve on my part to return, at all, to Spanish affairs, or to the foreign policy of this country. I own that I feel the greater embarrassment, because, from what is going on in another place, it appears that the chief interest of the public is now confined to the question of the privileges of the House of Commons, and to the propriety or impropriety of sending a Mr. Howard, the attorney, to gaol. Your Lordships have also been entertained with several interludes on the progress of what is called "Socialism." Now, all this proves that the attention of the country is directed solely to its own immediate concerns; and the consequence necessarily is, that the mode in which our foreign affairs are conducted is hardly ever mentioned, except in a desultory manner. I, however, cannot but remember that the Noble Earl (Earl Grey), the father of the Reform Bill, stated that he considered that this House could never be better employed than in discussing the foreign policy of the country. I likewise remember that a Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham) — whom I regret not to see now in his place, because he always adorns the debates by his eloquence, and elucidates them by his powerful reasoning, — I remember hearing that Noble and Learned Lord say that the foreign policy of the Government ought always to be before the country. The Lord Privy Seal (the Earl of Clarendon) likewise, on a former occasion, stated his anxiety to have the foreign policy of the country discussed. More particularly did he express himself anxious "to have a field day" on the affairs of Spain, in order that we might have an opportunity of justifying the policy which has been pursued in that country. I am not unwilling to give that Noble Lord the opportunity of advantageously displaying those abilities which I shall be the first to admit and to honour.

Having stated the embarrassments under which I labour, as incidental to the subject which I am about to bring forward, I beg to be permitted to say one word as regards myself. Your Lordships may ask why I should take upon myself to be constantly bringing this subject forward? To that I will reply, that, in early life, I was intimately connected with that country; — I, perhaps, was the first British officer who landed in Spain. I accompanied Sir John Moore through the whole of his campaign; and, during the years 1813 and 1814, I served in that country under my Noble and Illustrious Friend the Duke of Wellington. I have taken a very great interest in everything connected with Spain since that time. I have recently made a tour through that country, and I will say, that the kindness and attention which I received, both from the Carlists and Christinos, has further increased my interest in that interesting kingdom. I deplore the course which Her Majesty's Ministers have pursued in their foreign policy towards that country, and I attribute, in a great measure, the misery which Spain has endured for the last six years to that policy. I am free to confess, that, during the last six months, a great change has taken place in the character of the war in Spain. I am free to confess, that there has intervened a temporary suspension of the war, which has been carried on for the last six years; but how has that suspension been accomplished? The army which, during that period, sustained the attacks of the Noble Viscount's Auxiliary Legion, — assisted, too, by the fleets of this country, blockading part of the Spanish coast on one side, and aided by the effective blockade of the Pyrenees on the other, — that army, I admit, no longer exists. But how has that gallant army been annihilated? Was it broken up and destroyed in action? Did the Duke of Vittoria annihilate it by planting his victorious standard on the lines of the Carlists? However great the Duke of Vittoria may be, I must say that he is not great on the field of battle, — he loves not turmoil, — he loves a life of repose and quiet, and seems to be one of those officers described by the Noble Viscount the other night, who have earned their distinctions in other places than the field, and by other means than arduous service. He cannot boast that, by any great battle, he drove the defeated Carlist legions into the sea by the force of his arms or the skill of his combinations; neither can he boast that, by fair and just negotiation, the measure of their destruction was accomplished. Your Lordships have now before you the transaction by which this event was brought about, — a transaction the most treasonable and treacherous that has ever been recorded.

I confess that, in moving for these papers, my great desire is, to show that the character of British officers and of the British Government has had no share whatever in this transaction, because all Europe, from one end to the other, resounds with the astounding treachery of this proceeding. It will therefore be very satisfactory if the Noble Viscount can, by documents laid before the House, prove that the British Government have had nothing to do with this treacherous negotiation. I know that it has been said in another place that Government have had no share in these transactions. That statement may be satisfactory to the Government; and, unfortunately, they have an idea that what is satisfactory to them is also satisfactory to the country at large. Such, however, is not the case. It is a singular circumstance, that when, on a former evening, I mentioned the treasons of Maroto, the Noble Viscount and the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs both evinced a wish, in their tender sympathy, to commute these abominable treasons into a "return to allegiance." If I believed that the Noble Viscount could entertain such principles, badly as I already think of his politics, I should think still worse of their dangerous consequences. I shall take the liberty, with respect to this man's conduct, to refer to a publication which has been sent to me, as an individual supposed to take an interest in the affairs of Spain; and to which I beg to call the attention of your Lordships. I admit that I have formed, and I conceive it is just that I should form, my opinions on statements thus made to me; and, until I have better evidence, I shall continue to do so, especially as I know that the statements to which I refer are generally credited in those portions of Spain which I have recently visited. I repeat that I have good reason for coming to the conclusion which I have arrived at with reference to these documents; and, unless the Noble Viscount and his colleagues produce counter-documents to meet those statements, I shall rely on their accuracy. The gentleman who supplied me with this publication says, —

> I pledge my honour and veracity for the correctness of these statements. Your Lordship is perfectly at liberty to use this information as > you please, and you will find, on inquiry, that the facts will fully bear out the accusation made against the Government.

This communication is signed "M. G. Mitchell." In the course of the work, I find reference made, in two places, to Lord John Hay and Lord Palmerston, with regard to the communication which they had with Maroto, at Bilboa, and to a second communication at Nuovabera. After the second communication had taken place, Maroto, on the 28th of June, issued a most loyal proclamation, to the words of which I wish to draw your Lordships' attention, as they clearly prove the treachery of the man. The proclamation was issued by Maroto at the very time when he was in correspondence with Espartero, and with our commodore on the station, through the medium of a flag of truce. In that proclamation, he expressed himself thus: —

> The king and our holy religion are the sacred objects confided to our defence. If our enemies attempt to disseminate disunion and discord amongst us, let us prove by the loyalty of our conduct that their intrigues can never succeed. Base and vile factions find no response in the hearts of Royalists, armed for the most sacred cause.

In another proclamation, dated August 29. 1838, he adopted similar language. It was this: —

> The God of armies will protect the cause of the best of kings. A sacred obligation imposes upon us the duty to conquer or die.

And again in July, 1839, he published the following sentiment in a proclamation: —

> In vain do inhuman intriguants spread reports of negotiations. There never can exist any between two parties whose principles are so entirely opposed. Let our constant device be, "The King, and our religion!" We must triumph or die; — les armes à la main!

These were the observations of a man who, at that moment, according to the best information which I can obtain, was in actual correspondence with Lord John Hay, and also with the military authorities on the spot, — I mean Colonel Wylde and the other officers who were there. His conduct is distinctly alluded to in the work to which I have adverted, and in a manner which powerfully exhibits the treacherous nature of his proceedings. Speaking of this last proclamation, the writer observes, —

> Au moment même où il publiait cette proclamation, il écrivait à Lord John Hay, lui promettant de lui livrer, D. Carlos et les provinces dans un delai de 15 jours.

In another place it is stated, —

> A son arrivée en Biscaye, Maroto marcha résolument vers le but qu'il s'était proposé depuis long-temps, de livrer D. Carlos et son armée aux Christinos. Sa correspondence avec Espartero reçut un surcroît d'activité, et ses démandes furent exorbitantes: les réponses d'Espartero, d'abord évasives, devinrent moins satisfaisantes dès que par la prise de Ramales et autres points il se fut avancé en Biscaye. Marato effrayé, s'adressa à Lord John Hay, pour le prier de lui obtenir des promesses positives d'Espartero, et s'il était possible la garantie de l'Angleterre. Lord John Hay y consentit, et s'étant entendu avec Espartero, il expédia un officier porteur de dépèches à Lord Palmerston. Ce Ministre fut si enchanté des propositions faites par Maroto pour trahir son maitre, que dans sa joie il oublia sa circonspection accoutumée, et fit part de ses espérances: son confident fut probablement indiscret, puisqu'un ami de D. Carlos reçut la lettre suivante.

After all this, what can be said in favour of such a man, and what can prevent Maroto's name from passing to posterity as a landmark of baseness and infamy? Like a Tartuffe for hypocrisy, and Don Quixote for chivalric folly, he will be followed by the hatred of his victims and the scorn of honest men of every country. Incapable of remorse for having betrayed his king, he may yet regret his having done it at such a price; for the loyal Castilians will turn blushingly away from him. While I feel it necessary to make these statements, I must say that it will be most satisfactory to me if Her Majesty's Ministers can prove that the British Government have been no parties to this scandalous treason. I think we ought to be informed distinctly whether such an individual as Maroto can, for a single moment, be countenanced by the Noble Viscount. He has, it appears, proceeded to Madrid, and left the scene of his treachery. But how can any confidence be placed in such a man? Having shamefully betrayed Don Carlos, may he not also prove a traitor to the cause of the Queen? This individual has, nevertheless, been decorated with the Grand Cross of Isabella, as the reward of his treachery. Is it possible that the Spanish Government could have thus encouraged him, if the country were regulated by the common principles which govern other nations? I suppose, from the honours already bestowed on Maroto, that, were he to come over to this country, the Noble Viscount opposite would invite him to dinner; or, possibly, introduce him to court in company with Mr. Owen. I confess, however, that I hope better things. I hope that this country will, at least, show that treachery is not the road to eminent glory, or the means by which honours and wealth are to be procured,—here. I hope that the fair fame and spotless reputation of England will not be stained by any connection with such transactions as I have described, or by any sympathy with, or support of, one whom every honest heart must detest. I hope — and I express that hope with the strongest assurance and belief in its fulfilment — that the Noble Viscount will never uphold such a man as the traitor Maroto. I shall now allude to that portion of Her Majesty's Speech which expressed the satisfaction of Her Majesty with the present state of affairs in Spain. The words of the speech were these: —

> I rejoice that the civil war which had so long disturbed and desolated the northern provinces of Spain has been brought to an end by an arrangement satisfactory to the Spanish Government, and to the people of those provinces; and I trust that, ere long, peace and tranquillity will be re-established throughout the rest of Spain.

Now, I do not see how an arrangement concluded as the one in question has been can be called satisfactory. As for the Basque provinces being satisfied with it, we all know that those provinces will not be content unless they obtain their privileges; while the object of the Queen's Government has been, throughout, to do away with those privileges. Espartero merely held out a promise that he would do his utmost to obtain their ratification; but he has sent forth nothing in the shape of a guarantee on which the people of those provinces can rely. In fact, all the acts of the Government are entirely opposed to the wishes of those people. The great object which Maroto had in view was to get possession of the post of Bergara; but, notwithstanding the promises that have been made, the people are still so dissatisfied that they unite, even in those provinces which are said to be most contented, for the purpose of asserting their rights. Will the Noble Viscount seriously assert that the people are satisfied with the manner in which this temporary pacification has been effected, when he finds them still demanding their privileges? For my own part, I look upon the existing pacification as a deceitful lull, the forerunner of a dreadful hurricane; because I feel certain that, before these provisions are really settled, the rights which they demand must be conceded to them. The King of the French, in his speech to the Chambers on the 23d of December, treated the subject in a different manner. He did not admit that Spain was pacified. He said —

> A great change has been produced in the situation of Spain; and if I have to regret that it is not in my power yet to announce to you that the civil war, which has for so long a time desolated that kingdom, is entirely extinguished, I have to observe, that it has lost that character of gravity which might have occasioned fears for the stability of the throne of Isabella II. The great portion of the provinces of the north is pacified, — > and everything justifies the hope that it will not be long until those of the east are equally so. This important result is the produce of the wise policy of the Government of the Queen Regent and of the persevering valour of the Spanish armies, sustained by the support given to them by my Government and by that of Her Britannic Majesty, in faithful execution of the treaties of 1834.

(Not as stated in Her Majesty's Speech, "the war has been brought to an end") —

Then, for the first time, was it stated by the King of France that the Basques were momentarily pacified, and that that had been accomplished by the united exertions of France and England. But that, even, was not the fact. The army of Don Carlos successfully resisted the united armies of the two countries; and it was at last annihilated, not by their united exertions, but by treason. Her Majesty's Government have not stated that the success of the Christinos arose from their intervention, and from that of France. They did not like to do that. They did not dare to adopt the course which has been pursued by the French King, and boldly state the success of British arms in Spain. They know full well that it would be condemnatory of their own policy to do so. They know that the system of attacks which was adopted by their own men — their own pet legion — failed, with disgrace. They know that, almost for the first time on that ground, English troops were beaten and driven back; and they durst not, therefore, recur to the military efforts of these men, because they know that at the same time they would only be giving increased publicity to their own disgrace. I say, then, that the annihilation of the Carlist army was accomplished by treason, and by treason alone. But for that treachery which I have this evening narrated, the same civil war would be still raging with its wonted fury and destruction. Why, my Lords, despite the treachery which has been used against them, despite the foul means which have been adopted to gain an undeserved and ignoble victory, General Garcia has himself stated that the Carlist army is, even now, more strong in numbers, better disciplined, better provided with all the great necessaries of warfare, better able to resist their enemies, than at any previous time. On the whole affairs of Spain, I state with regret, that the policy of Her Majesty's Administration has been most unfortunate. What, I ask, has been gained by this war; and what loss has it occasioned?

It has, on the whole, occasioned a loss of 50,000,000*l.* sterling, and 150,000 lives. Such has been the horrible expense of this contest. But what has been the cost to Great Britain? I will show what that cost has been, according to Returns which I moved for last year, over which I have looked very accurately.

And now for the loss of life. I hold in my hand an account of the number of men sent out; the number of those who never returned, and the cause of their deaths: — British loss — Of 15,000 or 16,000 men sent out to Spain, 8000 died by casualties, 1000 by typhus fever; of the officers 50 died; and 1700 were buried in one churchyard. What, then, according to these accounts, has been the effect produced on Great Britain by the policy of the present Government with respect to Spain? Why, an expenditure amounting to 616,638*l.*; to which, if I add, as I have a right to do, the sum of 280,000*l.* due to the unfortunate British Legion, then I contend that there is nearly 1,000,000*l.* of money (let the people of England know this) charged to them for the intervention which the Government has thought fit to sanction with respect to the affairs of Spain. Yes, that sum has been expended; and I defy Her Majesty's Government to prove that Spain is now in any better condition than she was at the period when that most mistaken policy of the British Cabinet was adopted. But where, I would ask, is that policy to end? If the Noble Viscount says the war is subsiding in the north, and that it is also subsiding in the east, why is this country still at the expense of keeping up the blockade? Why not recall those ships which are employed on the Spanish coast? If these vessels were sent to support their interests who are engaged in the China trade, our relations in that quarter would not now be in such a deplorable state. But if all is peace and tranquillity, why are those vessels kept on the coast of Spain? They are there, as I well know, exposed to the greatest hardships and dangers. I have myself seen one of the finest brigs in our service driven on shore at Tarragona, while engaged in the blockade of that dangerous coast. Thus I have shown that a million of money has been entirely thrown away, without assisting the people of Spain, or adding to the glory of this country. But a hope has been expressed, in the Speech from the throne, that, as the northern provinces of Spain have been pacified, so the other portions of that country may be speedily placed in a state of tranquillity. I will tell your Lordships that such is not likely to be the case in the east of Spain. The fortress of Morella, which is held by Cabrera, is so strong in itself, and is so supplied with all the adjuncts of defence, that it may be deemed impregnable. It is situated on a high rock, like Gibraltar; at its base is a stream or river, which winds round it, and the rock is so fortified that on no side is it accessible to an assailing enemy. Cabrera has in that fortress and its vicinity 40,000 men, at least, armed and unarmed; and from its heights he can sweep down on any part of the Espartero line he pleases. Moreover, from that position he can carry on the war against the Queen's forces as long as he pleases; for the men of the country in Valencia, in Arragon, and in Catalonia, are, at least, as favourable to his cause as they are to that of his opponents. I know that Espartero cannot put an end to the war by his own resources; and one of the reasons why he cannot do so is, that in all the great towns and cities of Spain the inhabitants are more favourable to the cause of legitimacy than they are to what some persons call "the cause of liberal institutions." Those "liberal institutions" have as yet done nothing for them; for so impotent is the Government which patronises those institutions, that in the south of Spain it cannot raise even the ordinary taxes. It is true that at Madrid it has carried on the administration of affairs for six years, and that it may carry it on for as many years more. But, supposing that it should be successful in putting down the Carlists, what will be the consequence? Why, that then they will have the Exaltados and Moderados — those two great parties into which liberal Spain is divided — engaged in open war with each other. These two parties are not satisfied with making speeches against each other: on the contrary, they make forcible attacks on each other, as has recently been seen in one of the Chambers at Madrid, where, after rising to embrace each other one day, the members rose to struggle with each other, personally, the next. In point of fact, the old social edifice in Spain is overturned, and those who attempt to erect a new one in its place have not power to accomplish their object. The Noble Earl was very severe upon me, last night, for saying that the members of the Spanish mission bought up the attestats of its own Government. Now, the fact is, that I said no such thing. I brought no such accusation against them. I said that those attestats or assignats had been disseminated among the Jews, and that the report was current that some members of the Spanish mission had bought up a considerable number of them. All the journals of Europe have spoken of the dishonesty of the Spanish Government in the management of the finances of that country; and, in repeating the charge of dishonesty against them, I only repeated that which was already notorious to all the world. Even the Spaniards themselves admit it. Whilst I was at Granada, I met, by accident, a very gentlemanly and enlightened individual, whom I asked what he thought was likely to be the end of the fatal dissensions which distracted his country? His answer was very short — "If," said he, "we could only get six honest men to govern Spain, we should soon set all matters right." That answer is a sufficient proof that the Spaniards themselves do not acquit their governors of dishonest proceedings.

At the close of the last Session of Parliament your Lordships had the satisfaction of hearing, from the Noble Earl opposite, a very eloquent speech, which, at the time, produced a great effect. We have long had Clarendon's History of the Rebellion in England; we are now favoured with Clarendon's History of the Rebellion in Spain. That is a work on which it is intended that the House shall henceforward form all its views of Spain and of Spanish affairs. I need not say that my views are very different from those taken in that fragment of modern history. In that speech the Noble Earl stated that the pacification of Spain would be best effected by the policy pursued by the present Government; and that to think that it could be effected by any arrangement of the European powers in congress was entirely out of the question. He said further, that Royalists and Carlists would both reject such an arrangement with indignation; that neither party would submit to it, and that he was certain that all Spain would subscribe to his opinion. The Noble Earl likewise alluded to the strong desire which prevailed among the Queen's generals to carry the Eliot convention into effect in the Basque provinces, and he threw blame upon the generals on the other side for not being actuated by a similar desire to stop the unnecessary effusion of human blood. Now, I know that in Catalonia and Arragon the juntas of the Carlists were most anxious to carry that convention into effect; but that the Queen's generals always refused to extend its operations to those provinces, until Cabrera was in a situation to make reprisals upon them. Even now Zurbano is committing massacres upon his prisoners, and Espartero, with all his influence, cannot prevent him. The Noble Earl, in the progress of his speech, spoke of the internal condition and resources of Spain, as if he were another Mendizabel, and were putting out a prospectus for a new loan. The consequences of the liberal institutions recently granted to Spain are, according to the Noble Earl, "that life and property (except in those parts afflicted by the civil war) are more secure; that the revenues of Spain are more than one half greater than they were ever known to be before; that an enormous class of proprietors has been created by the sale of national property; that capital flows into more wholesome and useful channels; that education is making rapid advances, and that agriculture is advancing; and that, notwithstanding all the horrors of war, Spain is, at this moment, laying a foundation for her future prosperity." Now, I protest against the accuracy of that description of Spain. I deny that life and property are secure. I assert that the revenues of Spain are one half less than they were before, and what is perhaps more important, that even these are forestalled. Moreover, the sale of the church lands has impoverished, and not improved, the country. Formerly they were in the hands of the monks and friars, under whose fostering care agriculture advanced and flourished. The lands, too, are gone, and no further national revenue can be derived from them. Besides, it is melancholy to see the unfortunate condition to which the monks and friars are reduced. The Spanish Government, when it first seized upon the church property of Spain, pledged itself to give the means of subsistence to the monks and friars, whom it dispossessed. It has taken from them their property, — it has sold their convents, — it has turned out the people, but it has not given them a single farthing to support life. In a nunnery I entered at Seville, several unfortunate women, there, told me that since the establishment of the constitution they had been supported entirely by charitable individuals. Last year I said to your Lordships that I saw no prospect of any cessation of these horrors. I tell you so now. Will the Noble Viscount in return tell me what principle he intends to adopt for the future with respect to Spain? Is he prepared to carry on his intervention to any degree which the Christinos may feel disposed to demand? Don Carlos is, at present, in France, almost a close prisoner. Why, then, does the Noble Viscount retain possession of Passages, and keep our fleet on the coast of Spain? Surely the Noble Viscount cannot now be afraid of Don Carlos, especially after having told your Lordships, in the Speech from the throne, that the pacification of Spain is established. The Noble Viscount must admit one of two things, — either that the peace of Spain is not established, and that we must therefore go on with our warlike preparation; or that the peace of Spain is established, and that we ought to stop our expenditure in its behalf, which I have already shown to have amounted to 1,000,000*l.* sterling in the last six years, lest we should be embarked ultimately in the contest about to commence between the Exaltados and the Moderados. What a spectacle will it present to Europe, if the Noble Viscount should be found supporting the Moderados against the Exaltados in Spain, when in England his own Government would stand a bad chance indeed, except for the support he receives from the ultra Radicals! The Noble Earl also spoke of the gratitude which the Queen's Government entertains towards this country for our intervention in its behalf. Where is the proof of that gratitude? Has the Noble Earl been able to procure a commercial treaty from Spain? The great body of the Catalonians are "liberal" manufacturers. They have hitherto prevented, and they always will prevent, the formation of a commercial treaty with England favourable to our interests. They will get French goods if they can, and Catalonia, as I am informed, is now inundated with French goods. It is true that English goods do find their way into Catalonia, but they are carried thither by a hundred thousand smugglers. Has the Noble Earl, with all his exertions, been able to effect the abolition of the slave trade in Cuba? No; it is still carried on to a great extent in that island under the protection of the Spanish Government. I have authority for that statement in my hand, but I will not weary your Lordships by reading it. I have, however, seen the report of the case in an American Court of Admiralty, in which the Spanish Minister claimed certain slaves as his property, in defiance of all the promises of his Government to put an end to the detestable traffic in human beings. What, then, I would ask the Noble Earl, has Spain done for England in return for all the expenditure of men and money which England has incurred in her behalf during the last six years? The Noble Earl's answer must be, "Nothing." In the concluding part of the speech of the Noble Earl, to which I have already adverted, the Noble Earl said that all our sympathies and good wishes ought to be, and were, enlisted on the side of the liberal feeling of Spain, a country struggling to raise itself from degradation and oppression, and to recover its lost place among the nations of Europe. Now, the Noble Earl has lived long in Spain, and it would, perhaps, be deemed presumptuous in me if I were to place the results of my own residence in that country against those of the Noble Earl. The Noble Earl's residence, however, has principally been at Madrid, and in the very centre of a Government to which he is avowedly partial. Now, if the Noble Earl had travelled through the great towns and cities of Spain, as I have done, I have no doubt that the Noble Earl would have discovered, as I did, that the prevalent feeling of the inhabitants is in favour of the old institutions of their country; and that he must live a long time if he expects to see that feeling annihilated. Such are my views of Spanish affairs. I know that they differ from those of Her Majesty's Government; but they are honestly and sincerely entertained; and if I stood alone, I would not hesitate to express them. A friend, to whom I communicated them, told me that I was right, and applied to me the remark which has been applied to another honest defender of an unfortunate cause —

> Victrix causa Deis placuit, sed victa, Catoni.

I now, my Lords, move, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to direct that there be laid before this House copies or extracts of all communications between the Foreign Office, the Admiralty, and the British authorities employed on the coast of Spain, that have taken place between the 28th of July last and the present period, relating to the convention of Bergara, together with a copy of the said convention."

The EARL of CLARENDON. — My Lords, I confess I am very desirous to make a few observations on the speech which has just been addressed to your Lordships by the Noble Marquess. It is, however, totally impossible that I can fully reply to that speech,—so many, so various, and so discordant are the topics which the Noble Marquess has jumbled together "in most admired disorder." It is a budget which the Noble Marquess has brought from the Peninsula, and which he had better have opened in the Cortes of Spain, than in the House of Lords in England. I am very anxious to give your Lordships a different version of the recent transactions in Spain, from that which has just been furnished by the Noble Lord opposite. I attach great importance to the matter now under the consideration of your Lordships, not merely on account of its reference to Spain, — not merely on account of the speech of the Noble Lord opposite,—but also on account of all that has been said and written upon it in England, for the space of some months past; and when I consider the manner in which the characters of several of our most distinguished officers have been maligned for their supposed participation in these arrangements, and also, how the supposed course of Her Majesty's Government has been censured and abused by those who know nothing of it, I cannot but rejoice exceedingly, that the opportunity has at length arrived for placing those transactions in their true light before the country, and the world at large. The Noble Marquess, in the course of his observations, alluded to a speech which I addressed to your Lordships last year, and commented upon it in terms of great severity. Now, I will tell the Noble Marquess, that I shrink from nothing which I then asserted: on the contrary, I consider that events —which have transpired more quickly than I expected, and as satisfactorily as I could have hoped—have proved, most unequivocally, the correctness of my assertions. I should have felt myself under the necessity of bringing this matter under the consideration of your Lordships much before this time, if the Noble Marquess had not given notice of his intention to make it the subject of a specific motion. I did not expect that the Noble Marquess would have deferred the execution of his intention so long; for that delay is utterly inconsistent with the prodigious ardour which the Noble Marquess displayed on the first night of the Session to secure a discussion upon these transactions. I expected that when the Noble Marquess found that the convention of Bergara was not laid upon your Lordships' table, he would not have postponed for a day his threatened motion for the production of all the correspondence which he supposes to have passed between certain of our officers on the coast of Spain; but the Noble Marquess thought proper to defer his motion from day to day, and has given reasons, which he deems satisfactory, for so doing. It is not my intention to trespass long on the attention of your Lordships on the present occasion. I shall not follow the Noble Marquess through those parts of his speech in which he read an extract from a French book, — in which he talked of my Noble Friend inviting Maroto to dinner — in which he compared me to Mendizabel — in which he depicted the wreck at Tarragona, — and in which he gave so natural and picturesque a description of the situation of Morella; nor shall I enter into any criticism upon all or anything that the Noble Marquess either said — or did — in the nunnery at Seville, into which he got admission.

[Laughter.]

As far as I can collect — or, I should rather say, condense — the rambling statements of the Noble Marquess, it seems to be his opinion that the settlement recently accomplished in Spain is neither honourable nor satisfactory to the Spanish Government, and that Her Majesty's Government is to blame for having permitted it to take place.

Now, I rely on a few facts which are in my possession, for calming the apprehensions entertained by the Noble Marquess, both with respect to that arrangement, its effects upon Spain, and our supposed participation in it. It may not be irrelevant here to mention, that the Spanish Government, influenced by a strong determination to bring the war to a close, early in the summer of the last year, placed at the disposal of General Espartero resources which he never before had under his command, and thus enabled him to act with increased vigour. General Espartero advanced into the enemy's country, took possession of some very important places, and fortified his positions in every quarter, so that he was enabled to make himself master of nearly the whole of Spain. The Carlists saw that of military successes they had no hope whatever; and the most influential men amongst them were convinced that no calamity would be more disastrous to the country than the triumph of a prince, whose principles of government were abundantly attested by exiles, confiscations, and bloodshed. Into the principles which actuated that prince's personal conduct I will not now enter: it is sufficient to say, that all those most worthy of esteem amongst his adherents were convinced that his character as a prince was best calculated to secure misery to the country. With this conviction, long shared by the Carlists generally, it is plain that no proposition having for its object the termination of so disastrous a war could be very disagreeable to them; and in this conviction the convention of Bergara originated. It was commenced, I believe, by the officers charged with the superintendence of the exchange of prisoners, who agreed unanimously that nothing could be a greater blessing to the country than the termination of the war. Into the progress of these negotiations, and the unavoidable delays which arose, it is unnecessary that I should enter. But this I will observe, that the Carlist general, Maroto, was encouraged to commence these negotiations by the whole, I believe, without exception, of the chiefs serving under his orders; and that he further received a very significant warning not to delay their progress, from the mutiny of the Biscayan troops, whose anxiety for peace upon any terms was so great, that they were quite intolerant of delay. No sooner was the fact of the convention known—(it is only from details of this kind that the real character of the transaction can be gathered)—no sooner was the information generally diffused that the convention had been entered into, than twenty-one Carlist battalions laid down their arms on the ground. The Queen's troops received them in a spirit of the most cordial amity; their arms were piled, and they entered, unarmed, into Bergara, receiving each a month's pay. They were afterwards ordered to resume their arms, and march to different quarters to await the ratification of the Cortes. There were not above forty Biscayans who could be induced to comply with this order; the rest went home, indifferent as to whether the convention was ratified or not. Of the Castilians, the greater part took service under the Queen; the rest went home with the Guipuscoans, carrying their arms with them; and those arms were afterwards brought back by the old men, women, and children, to prevent the possibility of the public peace being disturbed for the future. There was another remarkable circumstance connected with this transaction. General Espartero, on passing through this district, was received by the people with loud acclamations; they came out from the towns and villages to meet him; upon these occasions the General always harangued them, and at the end of his discourse the people always joined unanimously in "three cheers"—one for "the establishment of peace;" another for "the Queen and the Cortes;" and a third for "the Constitution." All were responded to with equal enthusiasm; in short, so satisfactory was the intelligence of peace being established, that the gratitude which it called forth on the part of the people and soldiers was so enthusiastic as to need no comment to prove how completely they were satisfied with the terms of that peace. The Noble Lord cannot suppose that all this was produced by the magic of Maroto's name, or by any undue influence exercised by him. His troops were not led into any ambuscade; there was no stratagem; nothing to prevent them from resisting Maroto's project, and supporting Don Carlos by force of arms; and over the peasantry Maroto had no power whatever, and did not attempt to exercise any. I say, then, that it is manifest that, in what Maroto did, he was only giving effect to the opinions and feelings which he had long known the soldiers and people to be possessed of. There is the most ample evidence to prove that this was the case, and that the partisans of Don Carlos were convinced that the sacrifices necessary to carry on the war were not at all counterbalanced by any prospective advantages to be obtained from it. I am glad that the Noble Lord has not attributed this arrangement on the part of Maroto to any bribe;—that he has not adopted any such preposterous notion as that Maroto received a bribe from this country; although, upon looking over the public papers in the course of this morning, I find that, in some of them, Her Majesty's Government is accused of paying, in the shape of a bribe upon this occasion, no less a sum than 150,000*l.* out of the secret service money. I am glad that the Noble Marquess has not adopted any such supposition; for it is my firm belief that no transaction of the kind was ever more free from sordid or mercenary motives;—not, however, that I would blame General Espartero, if he had had money, and had paid it to purchase the inestimable blessings of peace, or to save the life of one single individual. But, setting altogether aside the question of sordid motives, as having had operation in this particular case, I think we can find in history very exalted characters availing themselves of this means to conciliate their enemies, or to obtain what they conceived to be political benefits. The Noble Lord shakes his head. But surely he must have heard of Marshal Marmont surrendering the capital of his country to a foreign army, and thus giving the finishing stroke to the fortunes of his master and benefactor. Surely he has heard of Marshal Bourmont, upon the eve of the battle of Waterloo, obtaining a command, against Napoleon's consent, in order that he might desert Napoleon on the following day. If the Noble Lord have read the despatches of a Noble Duke who is absent from his place — and no one regrets more sincerely than I do the absence of that Noble Duke, or its cause—I ask the Noble Lord whether he can doubt the Noble Duke's readiness to avail himself of the disposition to revolt, which existed, at that time, in a large portion of the French army, although, with the prudence and foresight which so pre-eminently shone forth among the many illustrious qualities of the Noble Duke, he hesitated to commit himself to the propositions which were made to him at that period? But can any one doubt that he was desirous of doing so? The question is very different in the case of a civil war, when individuals belonging to a common country, to a common family, are arrayed in arms one against the other. In such a case, the most brilliant successes upon either side are disastrous. Neither secessions nor desertions can, here, carry with them any degree of moral turpitude; nor can anything base or dishonourable be imputed to such desertions. The man who would consider himself degraded by treating with a foreign enemy, might do so, without the slightest imputation, with his own countryman. From the tone of the Noble Lord, I should be inclined to infer that, in the Noble Lord's opinion, the Government of England ought to have interfered to prevent the belligerents from ceasing their hostilities, and to have goaded them on to the fight. Upon what principles, either of policy or philanthropy, the Noble Lord advocates such an opinion, I really think the Noble Lord has failed to explain.

I am glad to have this opportunity of rectifying the false notions which have gone abroad with reference to Lord John Hay and Colonel Wylde. The Noble Lord can scarcely be serious in throwing any blame upon them. How culpable Her Majesty's Government would have been —deeply culpable — first, with respect to the Queen of Spain, Her Majesty's ally; and, next, towards all those who may have thought it more conducive to the interests of England that the disputes of intestine faction, by which her ally was torn asunder, should have been put an end to — to all those who have so long declaimed against the cruelties sanctioned by the Queen of Spain's Government; — and, lastly, to all those (the great majority of the people of this country) who were sincerely desirous to alleviate the sufferings of that ill-fated country:—to all such, I say, that Her Majesty's Government would have been deeply responsible, if they had not used every legitimate exertion in their power to put an end to the civil war in Spain, and to its lamentable consequences. The instructions which were given to Lord John Hay and to Colonel Wylde were, to aid, by every means in their power, in bringing about an arrangement which would be satisfactory to all parties; and, speaking as an Englishman, I devoutly wish that this great good had been the exclusive work of Her Majesty's subjects in Spain. But, although the intervention of these two distinguished individuals was diligently pursued, and freely given to both parties, it was rendered comparatively unnecessary by the determined resolution of the belligerents to bring their own affairs to a satisfactory termination. And most satisfactory that termination has been. It will form a period in the national history of which Spain may justly feel proud. The evidence of history goes to demonstrate that no civil war ever ended without some compromise being entered into between the parties; and, indeed, no civil war can be brought to a close without a due regard being had to the interests arrayed on both sides, — to the personal feelings, and even the passions, of the parties engaged,—if the object sought to be attained is the establishment of permanent tranquillity. I know of no instance upon record, where a victorious general — for a victorious general Espartero was—occupying so vast an extent of country, and knowing the mutinous state of the Carlist army, when, indeed, he might have declined coming to any terms—I know of no instance of similar prudence and patriotism to that by which Espartero, in the name of his sovereign and the Cortes, guaranteed the possession of his rank, honours, and emoluments to every individual who chose to enter the Queen of Spain's service, with full indemnity to them if they should prefer returning home; and secured to the people the full enjoyment of all those ancient privileges of which, for ages past, every succeeding sovereign of Spain had endeavoured to deprive them. The Queen and the Cortes were not slow to prove to the world that, in their estimation, the General-in-chief had well and nobly acted in that conciliatory spirit which the Liberal party in Spain has uniformly manifested whenever there was a fitting field for its display. The act of Espartero immediately received the most cordial support of the Queen of Spain's Government and of the Legislature. The Cortes, without waiting for the Royal invitation, at once, and unanimously, recorded their determination to redeem the pledge which Espartero had given; and the rest of the Spanish nation received with the most enthusiastic acclamations the intelligence of an event which they had so long and ardently desired. It was only among a certain class of individuals, and with a certain portion of the daily press, that expressions of dissatisfaction were heard, or among, and by whom, this great measure of conciliation was denounced in terms of unmeasured condemnation: and when your Lordships consider that, even in this Christian country, so pre-eminently distinguished above all others for its true spirit of religion and philanthropy, such denunciations were in equally strong terms uttered against the cessation of the shedding of blood, and the horrors of intestine discord and civil war, all feeling of surprise must cease, and the fact itself be only regarded as a fresh proof of the power which party spirit possesses, to obscure the judgment and pervert the feelings of men. For to party spirit, alone, can be attributed the vituperation which has been poured forth against one of the noblest acts that has marked the career of a victorious general;—to disappointment, and to the failure of a cause which seems to have been adopted in this country, without any reference whatsoever to British objects, and in extreme ignorance of the true interests of Spain, can such a feeling of hostility alone be ascribed. To the same ignorance may be attributed the fallacy of attempting to maintain monopolies and exclusive privileges in co-existence with free and liberal institutions. Those, indeed, who think that they may find in Spain, as elsewhere, a tyrannic power which will aid in preserving and maintaining abuses, may be justified in offering resistance to the exertions of a Government that is based on a constitutional foundation; but such resistance, in reality, serves only the cause of revolution, while popular institutions tend not only to secure, but to render safe, the possession of liberty. No man, who reflects on the case, can deny that this country has a great interest in the independence and prosperity of Spain;—no man, who reflects, can fail to admit that that independence and prosperity would be greatly promoted, if not secured, by the abolition of the Salic law, and the establishment of liberal institutions, in that country. It is, then, most anti-national and most un-English, that any party of men in this country should afford aid to the pretender to the throne of one of Her Majesty's allies, and to seek to make triumphant a cause, the success of which would not only be mischievous to us, but fatal to the welfare of Spain. And yet this is done at a time when there exists in this country a lamentable degree of religious conflict, and when the cry of "No Popery!" is heard throughout the land. It is at this period that it is sought to establish, in Spain, Catholicism in its impurest form, and when cries of lamentation are heard over the fall of the cause of civil despotism and religions enthralment.

I know not that I ought further to trouble your Lordships; but as I have alluded to the two systems which prevail in Spain,—the liberal and the despotic,—I will just observe, that an opportunity has recently been afforded of comparing the system of 1823 with that of 1839. The contrast between the two systems has been most strikingly exhibited within the last two months. I would ask the Noble Marquess, with all the knowledge that he has formerly and lately acquired in Spain, and of all that is within his cognisance, what, in his opinion, would have been the conduct of Don Carlos if events had been reversed—if the people had sworn allegiance to him, and that he had ascended the throne? Does the Noble Marquess think that Don Carlos would have acted as the Queen of Spain has done—that he would have redeemed the pledges given in his name by his generals, and have considered the reign of war over and passed? Or does the Noble Marquess think that he would have imitated the example of his brother Ferdinand, who, in 1823, broke through every promise he had recorded, violated every pledge that had been given in his name by the Commander-in-chief of 100,000 foreigners who had come to subdue his enemies,—proscribed, persecuted, and gibbeted some of the most leading men in the country, in defiance of the remonstrances, and to the indignant shame, of the Duc d'Angoulême,—and established a system of religious persecution such as modern ages present no instance of, and which must have required an ingenuity to devise, that might be well called infernal? But Don Carlos is even more despotic and bigoted than his brother. He was better acquainted with the disposition of his country, and for that reason he sometimes temporised with his brother's party, and refused occasionally to be the instrument of their system. For that reason he was denounced by them, and was engaged in all the conspiracies that were set on foot to oppose them; so that he could only look for support to the bigotry of the Inquisition, who gave him their adhesion under the supposition that he would have been elevated to the throne. Thus was Spain exasperated for the space of six years, and all the lamentations of Don Carlos's adherents have since been, that they have not shed blood enough! They declare that all their misfortunes are owing to their not having shed blood enough during the ten years preceding the French intervention. The state of desolation into which Spain would have been plunged, had Don Carlos and his party been successful, would have brought the Noble Marquess himself to a feeling of shame; and he would have learned, when it was too late, the length to which despotism, united with bigotry, would have carried its destructive influence. On the other hand, I would ask the Noble Marquess, what has been the result of the establishment of the constitution and the Cortes? Can he deny that the conduct of the Cortes has been marked with good faith? Has any person connected with or espousing the cause of Don Carlos been persecuted for his conduct or opinions? The Noble Marquess has been in Spain during the last few months; he must therefore know that nothing of that description has taken place; but that, on the contrary, the fidelity with which every engagement of the Government has been fulfilled, and the rapidity with which all rancour has subsided, reflect infinite credit upon the Spanish character. Although I must admit a portion of the Noble Marquess's statement to be correct, and that it is true that the war in Spain is not yet at an end, and that much time may elapse before that country, which has been so long agitated by questions of life and death, shall subside into perfect peace,—yet, notwithstanding this, I see nothing in all those representations and opinions which the Noble Marquess has made and expressed, and which I can only ascribe to most gross misrepresentations from others, arising either from ignorance, or from a state of feeling not to be envied —I see nothing, I say, in all those representations to cause regret or disappointment at the measures taken towards a settlement of the internal dissensions that have so long afflicted that nation. I have nothing more to say than that I am ready to produce the papers which the Noble Marquess has moved for; and I will trust to the candour of the Noble Marquess to state at some future time how very little they bear out his own statement of affairs.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — My Lords, it is never without some degree of reluctance that I take part in any discussion with respect to the affairs in Spain. Not that I consider those affairs may not be well deserving of your Lordships' serious deliberation; but that, in my opinion, the conduct of both parties in the wretched contest that has been going on in that country has been so atrocious, so abhorrent to every feeling of humanity and civilisation, and so utterly disgraceful to the age in which we live, that it is very difficult to feel anything of interest in the success of either party, or to look at the result of the contest, except with feelings allied to loathing and disgust. I will not stop to inquire on which side we ought to charge the greater share of disgust, or on whom to pour out the greater measure of indignation; — it, at least, must be admitted, that if there exist in that country any Government that is organised, and that possesses the tribunals and institutions of a Government, we are entitled to look to that quarter for conduct very different from that which must necessarily attach to a court held in a camp, and composed of fugitives. But, without entering into that branch of the question, it appears to me that the Noble Marquess has, to-night, exhibited a new feature belonging to it, and one not calculated to diminish its deformity. He has disclosed to your Lordships a signal act of treachery, in addition to the picture of ferocity your Lordships have already had before you. The Noble Earl (Lord Clarendon) has described this act, on the part of Maroto, as a great measure of pacification, and as being the cause of the restoration of peace; but that which strikes me, nevertheless, is this, — that however your Lordships may love peace, though even obtained by treason, — still, you must execrate the traitor; and the circumstance to be deplored is, that this act of treason, if not actually effected, has been aided, abetted, and perfected by British councils. I admit, considering what we have recently learned with regard to these affairs, your Lordships might possibly be wrong in looking upon this as an immoral and a disgraceful act on the part of the individual concerned; but I confess I cannot view the conduct of that general, who was intrusted by his prince with the management of his affairs, with any other than feelings of the utmost condemnation and disgust. In saying this, I am by no means expressing an approval of the conduct of Don Carlos. I have never, in this House, maintained the character of that prince to be meritorious or otherwise; but this I must say, that the treachery of his general is quite independent of the character of the prince by whom he was trusted. It is very easy to call Don Carlos a rebel, and to say that his officer, in deserting him, only returned to the allegiance he owed to his lawful sovereign; but that is not a fair statement of the case, nor is there any parallel between it and the instances to which the Noble Earl has alluded. The contest in Spain involves a question of disputed succession; and not only that, but I will venture to say that it is the most doubtful question of succession that has ever arisen in Europe. The Noble Earl must admit that, till within the last few years, the established law in Spain was such as established, indisputably, the right of Don Carlos to the throne of that country. This, in fact, is the opinion of a great part of Europe even at the present moment. Three out of the five great powers of Europe have hitherto refused to acknowledge the legitimate succession of Queen Isabella. I am justified, then, in saying, that the question of succession is one of the utmost doubt; and although the present war may be called a rebellion of the people against their lawful sovereign, yet if Don Carlos had, as he might have, succeeded, the case would have been very different. Had Don Carlos been successful, all that has been alleged by the Noble Earl against the followers of Don Carlos would, with equal justice, have been charged against those who are now acting with the Queen. But this is a question not for us: it is not within our jurisdiction. We have nothing to do with the legitimacy of the Queen or of Don Carlos. It is a question exclusively Spanish, which monarch they will have. I am not one of those who blame Her Majesty's Government for having acknowledged the Queen of Spain: — far from it. A great portion of the nobility, and of the army, with the great mass of the people of Spain, having acknowledged the right of the Queen to the throne, I think the British Government were perfectly justified in acknowledging the succession of the Queen of Spain, and of establishing relations with her Government. But a very different case is this of acknowledging her right, and of establishing relations with the Queen of Spain, from that of mixing ourselves up in the civil contest in that country, and taking part in the unhappy disputes which prevail there. The Noble Earl has observed that this country was compelled, or rather authorised, to take part in the convention of Bergara — disgraceful or otherwise; and that England is bound by treaty to act in support of the Queen of Spain.

The EARL of CLARENDON. — I beg to remind your Lordships, that no such observation was made by me as the Noble Earl has imputed to me. What I said was, that Her Majesty's Government were bound, by every means in their power, to endeavour to promote the pacification of Spain by any arrangement that would be agreeable to the parties concerned; but I did not say that Her Majesty's Government were parties to the convention of Bergara.

The EARL of ABERDEEN. — I am not alluding to the convention, now; I allude to the treaty; and the Noble Earl says, that the British Government were bound to Spain by treaty, — that is to say, the quadruple treaty. That is the topic to which I wish to draw the attention of the Noble Viscount (Viscount Melbourne). I have endeavoured to do so on former occasions, but have never had the good fortune to elicit an answer. I should like precisely to understand what it is that this country is bound to, by the quadruple treaty, and how we are situated at this moment with respect to it? The nature of that treaty is really most extraordinary; and I must say that a more impolitic treaty, or one more opposed to the established policy of this country, was never entered into. But what I want to know is, how do we stand, at this time, with regard to its obligations? I know that the Noble Viscount has very odd notions as to the manner in which treaties should be regarded by this country. I remember, some years ago, when the Noble Viscount sat on this (the Opposition) side of the House, his entering upon an enumeration of the treaties England had broken, and cited cases which had occurred during the last 150 years; and he held us up as having the most faithless character, and the least regard for treaties, of any nation in Europe. I differed from the Noble Viscount then, as I differ from him now. I think this country has always been famous for its strict regard for treaties; and I remember saying, that her fidelity was perhaps the more remarkable, inasmuch as it was thought that popular Governments were in general less observant of treaties than other Governments. But, however that may be, surely it is desirable that we should know precisely what our obligations are. All treaties are either permanent or temporary. Is this quadruple treaty permanent? I presume not. The treaty was entered into for a specific purpose, and its object and purpose were temporary. As far as I can understand the case, at the present moment, the treaty has for its object the restoration of the internal peace of Spain. That is its only intelligible object, and the only object that is avowed. But it is necessary that we should see how we have arrived at our present position. Your Lordships will recollect that this treaty was originally entered into early in 1834, when Don Carlos was in Portugal, and when an invasion of Portugal was expected from Spain. It was entered into by the contracting parties, with the view of restoring peace to the Peninsula; and for the attainment of that object it was considered desirable to procure the absence from the Peninsula of the two princes, Don Carlos and Don Miguel. That was the motive and object of the treaty. Well, the two princes were expelled; and I perfectly well recollect both the Noble Viscount and the Noble Marquess the President of the Council congratulating themselves on the perfect success of that treaty, and that it had been efficient for the purpose for which it was negotiated. A few months afterwards Don Carlos escaped from this country, and arrived in Spain; and no doubt his presence occasioned a renewed excitement in that country. Well, in August, 1834, additional articles were entered into; and what did those articles declare? There was no new object proposed, no new preamble to the treaty. It merely recited, "that whereas, in consequence of occurrences that had taken place in Spain, it was necessary to enter into new provisions, and the contracting powers engaged — so and so." Therefore the object that still remained to be accomplished by the treaty, was the restoration of internal peace in Spain. That was not to be effected by the expulsion of the two princes from the Peninsula, as before. What, then, remained to be done? The only stipulated measures we entered into for that purpose was, to furnish military stores and a naval force, if necessary; while the King of the French was to prevent supplies being furnished to the opposing party. Still we are bound to restore internal peace in Spain; if not strictly by the execution of these additional articles, by such other means as the spirit of the treaty justifies; — for instance, by means (inter alia) of the Order in Council for raising the British Legion, and of this very Bergara convention. Neither of those proceedings were stipulated for; but, in the spirit of the treaty, they have been adopted with the view of restoring peace to Spain. But this fact opens a very alarming prospect; because, although this treaty is in its nature temporary, yet, if the obligations it imposes are to end only with the restoration of internal peace in Spain, there immediately arises the prospect of a continual intervention on the part of England with the internal affairs of that country. How are we ever to expect to separate ourselves from interfering with the internal condition of Spain, so long as anything in the shape of disturbance or misgovernment continues to exist there? For your Lordships will remember that this treaty has nothing, necessarily, to do with a state of war. The additional articles do not contemplate the expulsion of Don Carlos from Spain, nor do they even contemplate the cessation of the war. It is the internal peace of Spain that is proposed to be established. Now I much fear that there will long prevail great disturbance, great confusion, and great anarchy in that country, although open war may not be carried on in any part of it. This is an object, then, far beyond anything which this country ever contemplated in entering into this or any previous treaty. I apprehend that the internal peace of any country must very much depend upon its internal government; and if we were, under this treaty, to interfere with its internal government, we should probably do that which, more than anything else, would prevent the success of every act calculated to insure good government in the country; and we should be pursuing that course which would be the most likely to re-produce the wretched condition which has so long continued in Spain. This is a view which this country has never taken with regard to any former treaty, and it is one that, if acted upon, would be, I think, likely to occasion the most mischievous consequences.

What has England gained by adopting this course? The Noble Lord has said that we have protected a liberal Government, and have aided in the establishment of liberal institutions in Spain; and that we ought to congratulate ourselves at the result which, so far, has attended our policy. It is, no doubt, gratifying to see any country improve in its institutions and prosperity, especially a country so intimately connected with and so closely allied to us as Spain; but that we should interfere, actively, to produce such a consequence, is, I take it, directly at variance with all sound policy, and with the policy which has hitherto been invariably adopted by this nation. The Noble Earl must see that England maintains the closest relations with countries in which no such liberal institutions exist; and I was glad to hear the Noble Viscount, some two or three weeks ago, when his attention was called to the question of preserving the integrity of Turkey, say, that as to the institutions, character, and opinions that prevailed in any country, he did not think those points ought to influence our conduct at all; —that what England had to look to was, that only which was essential to her own interests,—not the internal character or institutions of any other state. I entirely agree with the Noble Viscount; and I believe, generally speaking, that the opinions of the Noble Viscount are correct upon these subjects, when he follows his own judgment, and not that of others. As to the idea of nations entering into treaties for establishing liberal institutions in other states, it is absurd. Does the Noble Earl think that we could, by treaty, arrest the despotic views of the Emperor of the North? Such topics are all very well, as matters of declamation, in this House, and as subjects for paragraphs in newspapers; but not as a course of policy for a wise Government to adopt. But the doctrine of the Noble Earl is not true, nor does history show that the establishment of free institutions in the nations with which we are allied have necessarily led to the promotion of the interests and prosperity of the parties concerned. Look at our own connection with Portugal. Portugal has been for one hundred and fifty years so closely connected with England, that it is always called by the other powers of Europe an English colony, —and yet Portugal is one of the most arbitrary and one of the most bigoted Governments in Europe: and I should like to know whether that country is more friendly towards us, now that it has become more liberal? Look, again, at all the great powers of the continent. Which of them has been the most permanently connected with this country? The great Austrian empire; and yet that is a despotic power. But, then, it is a power with which no English interests ever came in collision; and, for many years, its policy has been essentially pacific. This, indeed, is the great object to be regarded. The aim of this country ought always to be, to enter into those relations which are the most likely to continue the preservation of the general peace. It is in this respect, therefore, that I say—though I never talk of natural enemies—that I look upon Austria as the natural friend of this country. It would be preposterous to suppose that any such alliances as those to which the Noble Earl has alluded, — namely, alliances having for their object the spread of liberal institutions in other countries, —could ever enter wisely into the policy of this country. But with respect to the treaty now under discussion, one of my great objections to it is, that I think it has contributed to that state of estrangement and alienation from us which at present exists on the part of the French Government. That treaty, which was to bind England to act in concert with France, has, I most sincerely believe, been in a great degree the cause of the estrangement and alienation I speak of. Why, from the very first, the two Governments have never acted cordially together: there have been nothing but mutual complaints as to the manner of carrying the treaty into execution. The Noble Earl, who has lately returned from Spain, knows full well that such is the fact. I will say nothing on the subject of the French alliance with this country. I am quite ready to admit the importance of maintaining that alliance. No person is more desirous of cultivating the closest friendship with France than myself; but such a friendship may exist for every salutary purpose, without the formation of an alliance for carrying out a common object. The quadruple treaty, in my opinion, has been attended with injurious effects to this country; and therefore I wish to know what is the interpretation which the Noble Viscount puts upon it at this moment, and what are the obligations it now imposes upon us? Your Lordships will observe that all the engagements are on one side. It is all unilateral. The Queen of Spain engages nothing. I suppose it will be taken for granted that she has engaged to govern well, because good government tends to establish internal peace: she also, I presume, engages to govern wisely, because that is the way to secure peace. But we are to judge of that. It seems to me, according to any possible analogy I can form in a case which is so unlike any that has ever before occurred, that the quadruple treaty is, at this moment, at an end.

Whenever the Noble Viscount shall choose to say that, according to his judgment, internal peace is restored in Spain, at that instant the obligations of the treaty will cease. For the Spanish Government is bound by no reciprocal conditions; of course, therefore, the Government of this country is perfectly at liberty to put an end to its own obligations whenever it shall think proper. I believe that not only the interpretation of the Bergara convention, but the future progress of the contest,—which is far from being concluded in Spain, — must be regulated by the manner in which the quadruple treaty shall be interpreted.

There is one point to which I wish to refer before I sit down,— I mean the case of the claims which the Noble Marquess brought forward, yesterday, on the part of the officers and men of the British Legion, and for whom your Lordships must feel that sympathy which their condition so greatly deserves. I must say that the Noble Earl appears, during his mission in Spain, to have exerted himself laudably on their behalf, though his exertions have not been attended with complete success. It appears, however, that the Noble Earl has not neglected to call the attention of the Spanish Government to the subject. These are, no doubt, claims of equitable consideration on Her Majesty's Government, because of the encouragement given by them to the cause in which the claimants suffered. Still there was no absolute obligation — there was no absolute treaty — to bind the Government. I will now call the attention of your Lordships to a certain treaty which I, myself, had the honour to conclude in 1829, for the indemnity of certain claims which certain British subjects established, in consequence of having suffered from the violence of certain Spanish authorities. A large sum was paid by the Spanish Government in money, and the remainder was paid by the issue of bonds. Those bonds were guaranteed by the British Government, — that Government being a party to the treaty which had been effected; and the bonds, when all other Spanish securities were worth almost nothing, obtained their full value in the market, inasmuch as the respected name of Great Britain was security for their payment. If ever there was a case in which a Government was under a deep obligation, — if ever there was a case in which a Government was bound to fulfil a contract, — this was one. The annual amount of the interest upon these bonds would only be about 30,000*l.*; but five or six years' dividends are now due on them, and remain unpaid. I think it says but little for Her Majesty's Ministers, that they have not sufficient influence with the Government of Spain to procure the payment of this small sum annually, — a sum upon the payment of which they are bound to insist, not only as supporting the just claims of their countrymen, but to secure their own honour and to fulfil their own plighted faith. It is no answer to me to say that representations and remonstrances have been made to the Spanish Government upon the subject. I have no doubt that they have been made; for when I brought this subject forward, on a former occasion, the Noble Viscount admitted the whole truth of what I stated, but said that the Government had remonstrated. But I beg to bring the matter under the Noble Viscount's notice in this shape; — the claims of the legion are binding only upon the Queen of Spain; but these bonds were contracted under a treaty which is binding, not only upon the Queen, but upon the whole nation of Spain. If Don Carlos had succeeded in his attempt upon the throne of Spain, the British Government would have exacted the fulfilment of the conditions of the treaty from him, exactly as they are now bound to exact it from the Government of the Queen. And if Don Carlos had refused, let me ask, would he have been eight-and-forty hours in possession of the throne before the British Government would have threatened reprisals, unless he had liquidated these claims? However reduced the Spanish finances may be at the present moment, it is preposterous and absurd to say that they are not capable of paying 30,000*l.* a-year in fulfilment of a solemn pledge. It is preposterous and absurd to say that the British Government cannot extort 30,000*l.* a-year from Spain, in fulfilment of their own arrangement; for I am not very certain whether the persons claiming under this treaty would not have a claim against the Treasury of this country for the amount of the sums due to them. I brought this subject before the House two years ago. I trust the Noble Viscount will not think me unreasonable if I express a hope that I shall not have to bring it forward, again, two years hence.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Considering the various matters which the Noble Marquess has mixed up with the treaty of Bergara, — namely, the part which the Spanish Government have borne, the part which the British Government have taken, and the share which British officers have had, in bringing that treaty to a termination, — it is perfectly obvious that your Lordships can discuss those matters with much greater advantage, with much greater facility, and, withal, much more satisfactorily, when you are in possession of the information for which the Noble Marquess has moved, than you can do at the present moment. At the same time, considering the very long speech that has been made by the Noble Marquess who brought forward the motion, — considering the observations which have often been made upon the treaty in this House, and the animadversions which are continually made upon it by some portions of the public press, I think that my Noble Friend (Lord Clarendon) was perfectly justified in going into some explanation of the circumstances under which that treaty was concluded, and of the share which British officers and men have had in producing it. My Noble Friend on the opposite side of the House has gone back to the origin of the whole affair, and has produced many of the selfsame arguments which have, over and over again, been put forward upon the same subject by the Noble Duke (the Duke of Wellington). The Noble Lord has told us that we were wrong at the outset, — that we ought never to have interposed in the affairs of Spain; — that we were wrong politically, because, by interposing, we deprived ourselves of the opportunity of acting as mediators; and that we were wrong in a military point of view, because we were attaching the fame and fate of a small body of British troops to the uncertain fortunes of the soldiery of Spain. That was the often-repeated argument of the Noble Duke; but I doubt the accuracy of it; I differ from those opinions; — but, even if the argument were good, and the opinions sound, it is obvious that they come too late; for, whatever the original policy or wisdom of the course pursued may have been, at any rate we have engaged in the Spanish struggle, — at any rate we have concluded the treaty,—at any rate we have acted upon the treaty,—at any rate we have engaged, and engaged actively, in the military affairs of Spain; and, being engaged in that manner, when it appeared that the army of the Pretender had relaxed its vigour and energy, and evinced a disposition to come over to the Queen when we found that Maroto, — whether right or wrong — (for it was not for us to inquire into the feelings or opinions which governed his conduct, and we knew nothing of the relations which existed between him and Don Carlos); — when, being engaged in active operations, we found that the enemy's general was desirous of giving up the contest,—should we not have been idiots, — should we not have acted in a way wholly unworthy of ourselves and of the country, — if we had not taken advantage of that contingency? Why, I might reply to my Noble Friend, opposite, in the language of the Swedish general in the great German play, who, when another important change is announced to have been negotiated, observed, "What may have induced your Highness so to act towards your sovereign liege and emperor, it beseems not me to inquire; but this advantage is in our favour, and all advantages in war are just." In the same way, was it not perfectly the duty of the British Government to take advantage of the defection of the enemy's general, the sooner to bring the contest to a termination? Any other conduct would have been perfectly childish and puerile; and I am satisfied that neither the good sense of the country, nor the wisdom of Parliament, could ever form any other judgment or opinion upon the subject. Whatever may have been the nature of the transactions between Maroto and Don Carlos, — whether the former acted with treachery towards the latter or not, — whether the conduct of the first was right or wrong, — does not appear to me to be, in any respect, a matter for your Lordships' inquiry. The whole affair resolves itself simply into this: Great Britain was engaged in the pacification of Spain, and this was an opportunity which presented itself for carrying her policy into effect.

My Noble Friend (the Earl of Aberdeen) has asked me what is the interpretation which I put on the quadruple treaty under existing circumstances, and what is the position in which England now stands with respect to Spain? I do not know that it is quite fair to call upon me immediately, not having the treaty before me, to state precisely what is my view of its present obligations; but I have no hesitation about the matter. My Noble Friend (the Earl of Aberdeen) has given, as far as I recollect, a very correct history of the treaty. The first treaty was framed in the beginning of 1834, with the view of procuring the expulsion of Don Miguel and Don Carlos from the Peninsula; and I apprehend that the obligations of that treaty were completely fulfilled when the expulsion of those princes was accomplished. Subsequently, however, Don Carlos, after passing through England, presented himself in the north of Spain, and commenced a course of hostilities against the Government of the Queen. The parties to the treaty then entered into fresh articles, and adopted fresh obligations for effecting the pacification of Spain. Those fresh articles were not confined to the expulsion of any prince, or any person whatever, from the dominions of the Spanish Queen. I apprehend, therefore, that the conditions of the treaty are not satisfied by the expulsion of Don Carlos from Spain. Speaking from my recollection upon the subject, I should say that this country is unquestionably bound to give her assistance to Spain as long as any of the hostilities arising out of the attempt of Don Carlos to dethrone the Queen continue to exist. All the hostilities that are now going on in Spain have arisen out of the appearance of Don Carlos in the northern provinces immediately after he had passed through this country; and I should say that England is bound to give her assistance to the Queen's Government until those hostilities shall be terminated. Beyond that, the treaty does not bind the Government of England to any further interference in the affairs of Spain. It does not bind us to interfere in any other difficulties that may arise; it does not bind us to interfere in any such case as is anticipated by the Noble Marquess by whom the present motion has been brought forward; it does not bind us to interfere in any questions between parties in Spain, nor in any of the internal affairs of that kingdom. But, until the hostilities arising out of the attempt of Don Carlos upon the throne are completely subdued, I think the treaty will remain in force, and be binding upon this country. That is the opinion which I should give, if called upon to give an opinion, now; but before I can state positively and decidedly my opinion, it would be necessary that I should consider the actual terms of the treaty. Acting, however, upon its spirit, that is, unquestionably, the interpretation I should put upon it.

My Noble Friend (the Earl of Aberdeen) has entered into many other points of consideration — of a general nature, but all turning upon the Spanish policy of the Government. Into those points of consideration I will not, upon this occasion, follow him. In the latter part of his speech my Noble Friend has called upon me to make some declaration with respect to a matter which he has often pressed upon my attention,—namely, the claim of the Spanish bondholders under the treaty of 1829. I regret that those claims are not yet satisfied. I can say no more than that strong representations have been made upon the subject. And, perhaps, I may be allowed to add, that I think something more of allowance and indulgence ought to be shown towards the Spanish Government, in consideration of the great and pressing difficulties by which it has been surrounded, than my Noble Friend seems disposed to allow it. I have no objection to the production of the papers for which the Noble Marquess has moved.

LORD ASHBURTON. — I must say, that I do not think the Noble Viscount has spoken of the conduct of the assassin, Maroto, with that feeling of condemnation and abhorrence which must be entertained by, I believe, every person in this country. I doubt whether it is possible that any body of men, with the feelings of humanity in their breasts, can contemplate the transactions in which this individual has been engaged without feelings of loathing and disgust. The fact was, that all the principal chiefs of Don Carlos were entrapped and assassinated by this miscreant; whereupon the people, finding themselves without leaders and guides, were obliged to submit to the enemy that was let in on them: and that such conduct should be spoken of lightly in a British House of Parliament, is, to me, a matter of astonishment! With respect to the quadruple treaty, at no period was that treaty more strictly observed than during the short period that my Noble Friend was in office; therefore the Noble Lord is mistaken in saying that there is a feeling on the side of the party to which I have the honour to belong to throw over the obligations of that treaty. I must say, that I think the Government of this country is too much disposed to interference; but, in saying so, I wish it to be understood that my opinion, with regard to treaties, is, that, when once entered into, they should be carried out to the letter. I wish, however, that the Government would turn their attention to matters essentially British, and that they would endeavour to obtain a settlement of that long-disputed boundary question with the United States, with respect to which nothing whatever has been done during the last ten years; while the least imprudent act on the part of the Government of Maine or the Government of our own North American colony, New Brunswick, might bring on a war between this country and the United States. It is the duty of the Government of this country to protect the interests of British subjects, and to keep open the channels of British commerce, by preventing France, or any other power, from establishing illegal blockades, and thereby shutting out our commerce for months together. These are the matters to which the attention of the Government should be directed, and which are far more important than the question of whether Syria shall be subject to Mehemet Ali or the Porte. For my own part, I cannot see that it will, in any way, affect British interests whether the Eastern question, as it is called, be decided one way or the other.

Another instance of neglect on the part of the Government of this country is their treatment of the Chinese question. It really appears to me very astonishing that the Government should not have thought it necessary, before this, to take some steps to renew our relations with China, and to re-establish our trade in that quarter. I was anxious that this discussion should not pass without the attention of the Government being called to these matters; and therefore I have thought it my duty to make these few observations.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY.—I shall not trouble your Lordships with many words in reply. With regard to the enthusiastic reception which it has been said Espartero met with in the Basques, that arose out of the hope that he would assist them in obtaining the confirmation of the privileges which had been promised them. But what was the case at Seville? There, a large assembly was got up for the purpose of making a declaration in favour of the Queen; and when vivas were called for, not a single voice was raised. Before I sit down, I wish to understand from the Noble Viscount, whether he considers that this country is bound to go on with its intervention so long as any hostilities continue in the north of Spain? It is important to know whether this intervention is to continue, so long as Cabrera, for example, shall hold the northern part of Spain in his possession.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — That must be determined according to the judgment that Her Majesty's Government may form upon the facts.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY.—As the motion has been agreed to, I do not think it neceesary to trouble your Lordships with any further observations.

LONDON AND GREENWICH RAILWAY ENLARGEMENT AND STATION.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — I have, Sir, to present a petition from the London and Croydon Railway Company. The petitioners state that, early in the present Session, they presented a petition to the House, praying for permission to bring in a Bill for enlarging the line of the London and Greenwich Railway, with a view of carrying out a recommendation to that effect, contained in the Second Report of the Select Committee of this House, appointed to inquire into the communication by railway in the United Kingdom: that the said Second Report was only presented to the House in the summer of last year, and, consequently, it was impossible for the petitioners to give such notices, and make such deposits of plans and sections, as are required by the Standing Orders to be made, in the spring of the year preceding any application to Parliament in respect of a Railway Bill; but they add, that they did give such notices, and made such deposits, in the months of November and December last, in the manner required by the Standing Orders in reference to Canal and Road Bills, and other Bills of the second class. They have also deposited in the Private Bill Office a declaration of their readiness to execute the proposed works by means of capital to be raised by additional shares, or by money to be raised on mortgage, or otherwise, to carry out the proposed works by means of public commissioners, to be appointed for the purpose, without profit or pecuniary advantage; and an estimate of revenue on the works proposed by them has also been lodged, amply sufficient to afford security for the capital requisite for such purpose. It appears, however, that the Select Standing Order Committee have reported that the Standing Orders ought not to be dispensed with, so as to allow the petitioners to bring in a Bill in the present Session. The petitioners humbly submit that, in their case, such special circumstances do exist as justify them in asking for a relaxation of the Standing Orders, inasmuch as, should this application be delayed until another Session, all the dangers and inconveniences may arise which the Railway Committee of your Honourable House have pointed out in their several Reports as likely to occur on the London and Greenwich Railway, if not enlarged; and which dangers and inconveniences it is the object of the petitioners, by their present application, to provide against. They also beg to add that the London and Brighton and the South Eastern Railway Companies are equally interested, and fully concur, with themselves, in their object. The petitioners, therefore, humbly pray your Honourable House, that they may be allowed to proceed, in the present Session, with the Bill already prayed to be introduced by them, under their petition before referred to.

As it is my intention to make a motion upon the subject of this petition to-morrow, I will now move that the petition be printed with the Votes.

Motion put, and agreed to; petition ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

On the motion of Mr. GREENE, Resolved, "That no postponement of the first meeting of any Committee on a petition for a Private Bill shall take place, unless notice be given in the Private Bill Office one clear day before the time fixed for such meeting." — Ordered, That the said Resolution be a Standing Order of this House.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented, and severally ordered to lie on the table; namely,—

Elective Franchise and Municipal Corporations (Ireland), — By COLONEL BUTLER and Mr. BELLEW, for extension and reform, — from Killany; Kilsaran; Forkhill; Stabannan; Clouterbrid; and Errigal Kieran. — To lie on the table.

Designs Copyright Bill, — By Mr. GREGG, Mr. BROTHERTON, and Mr. MARK PHILIPS, against, — from Manchester (two petitions); and Manchester and Salford. — Referred to the Select Committee on the Bill.

By Mr. G. W. WOOD, in favour, — from merchants, agents for foreign houses, and purchasers of printed goods in the English markets for exportation. — To lie on the table.

Corn Laws, — By Mr. GREG, Mr. HINDLEY, Mr. M. PHILIPS, Mr. ELLIOT, and SIR DE LACY EVANS, for repeal, — from Lillyhill; Hawick; Blackley; Kelso; Lees; Newton (Lancaster); Westminster Reform Society (chairman); and Manchester (chairman of a meeting). — To lie on the table.

By SIR T. D. ACLAND, against alteration, — from Sandford. — To lie on the table.

Church Rates, — By SIR C. STYLE and Mr. STRUTT, for abolition, and for the release of John Thorogood, — from Rastrick, and Derby. — To lie on the table.

Juvenile Offenders Bill, — By Mr. STRUTT, in favour, — of the corporation of Derby. — To lie on the table.

Church Patronage (Scotland), — By Mr. F. DUNDAS, Mr. GRANT, LORD J. STUART, Mr. J. J. H. JOHNSTONE, SIR J. GRAHAM, Mr. E. TENNENT, and other Honourable Members, for alteration, — from Ardnamurchan; Dores; Kilmalie; Gairloch; Poolewe; Moy and Dalarrosie; Jedburgh; Cromdale; Sanday; Campbeltown; Urray; Killchrenan and Dalavich; Connor; Cumnock; and Kilpatrick juxta.

From Dunscore, against alteration.

Court of Chancery, — Complaining of delay in the proceedings in the Court of Chancery, — from Southampton, and Tavistock.

Church of England, — By Mr. PLUMPTRE, LORD VISCOUNT COLE, Mr. BARNEBY, Mr. GALLY KNIGHT, SIR C. B. VERE, SIR R. H. INGLIS, and LORD HENNIKER, for extension, — from Otterton; Iwerne Courtney; Frome Vauchurch; Beaminster; Llangwstenin and Eglwys Rhôs; Portisham; Toller Porcorum; Milton Abbas; Broadwinsor (two petitions); Muchelney; Funtington; Sigglesthorne; West Stafford; Gomersal; New Sarum (two petitions); Longbridge Deverill; Ravenstone; Leiston and Aldringham; Charmouth; Trentham; Cundall; Marton cum Grafton; Norton-le-Clay; Roecliffe; Kidsgrove; Bentley; Wrenbury; North Bierley; Orford; Tyldesley; Hasketon; Ilketshall; Bramfield; Cropthorne; Barham; Needham Market; Creeting; Gunton; Milton (Suffolk); Bromeswell; Corton; Barfryston; Saxmundham; Holton; Cransford; Ipswich; and Bulwell.

Merchant Seamen's Fund, — By Mr. BROTHERTON, for investigation, — from Whitby.

Sailors, — By Mr. BROTHERTON, for inquiry into the moral state of sailors, — from George Charles Smith.

Turnpike Roads, — By SIR T. D. ACLAND, — of Joseph Pratt, complaining of the exemption from toll granted to stage coaches carrying mail bags.

Copyright Bill, — By Mr. J. JERVIS and Mr. T. DUNCOMBE, against, — from bookbinders of Exmouth Street, Clerkenwell; and master printers of the metropolis.

Maynooth College, — By Mr. PLUMPTRE and SIR R. INGLIS, against further grant, — from Derby; Barnoldswick; North Bierley; Boulge; Louth, and Latham and Burscough.

Workhouses, — By COLONEL T. WOOD, — from the Uxbridge union, for exempting workhouses from taxation.

Railways, — By LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET, for a free competition in the conveyance of goods and cattle, — from Leadenhall Market, and Newgate Market. — Referred to the Select Committee on Railway Communication.

Metropolis Improvement, — By Mr. CLAY, — from St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, to be included in the contemplated improvement. — Referred to the Select Committee on Metropolis Improvement.

NEWPORT RIOTS — CASE OF FROST, WILLIAMS, AND JONES.

Mr. LEADER. — Sir, I have to present to the House petitions from the Glasgow Operative Masons' Universal Suffrage Association; from Eastbourne, in the county of Sussex; from 1500 householders of Marylebone; from several hundred inhabitants of the borough of Tewkesbury: from 3000 electors and ratepayers of Brighton; from Jevington; from Cirencester; and from 5000 householders of the borough of Portsmouth; all praying that a free pardon may be extended to Frost, Williams, and Jones, and all of them praying for it, not on the grounds of mercy due to the prisoners, — not because they sympathise at all in the attempt made by them, — not because the petitioners support rebellion and violence, — but (as these petitioners every one of them state) because, on a point of law, which had been reserved in their favour, nine out of the fifteen judges decided that it was good, and because six out of the fifteen decided that the objection was taken at a proper time. The petitioners state that, in all cases of doubt, the prisoner is entitled to the benefit thereof; and they pray that that principle may not be departed from in this case. I need not state that I most heartily concur in the prayer of the petitions, and for the same reasons.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE also presented petitions to the same effect from Cheddington; St. Luke's (Middlesex); Shoreditch; and Finsbury.

PRINTED PAPERS—IMPRISONMENT OF THE SHERIFFS.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — I hold in my hand a petition from the inhabitants of the ward of Walbrook, praying for the release of the sheriff. The petitioners say that the Report of the Inspectors of Prisons has no printer's name attached to it, and therefore the Messrs. Hansard are liable only as publishers; and, consequently, if the copies were sold, in any office of the House, Messrs. Hansard would not be subject to any action at law. The petitioners add that, as the sheriffs were compelled, in the performance of the duties of their office, to act as they did, they hope the House will at once order the liberation of the officer who still remains in confinement.

SIR T. D. ACLAND. — I also have a petition to present to the same effect, from the mayor and other inhabitants of Great Torrington, in the county of Devon.

Both petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

To GENERAL O'NEILL, one month, — illness.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Ninth Report brought up, and read. — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

RETURNS, &c.

Navy. — On the motion of SIR T. COCHRANE, Return ordered —

Of the average number of seamen, marines, and boys employed during the year 1839.

Trinidad. — On the motion of Mr. VERNON SMITH, Address for

Copy of a circular despatch addressed by Lord John Russell to the governors of the West India colonies, transmitting an Order of Her Majesty in Council relative to immigration into Trinidad.

FRENCH SILKS.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — Seeing the President of the Board of Trade in his place, I wish to ask him a question. I have seen a statement that a negotiation is now pending with France relative to our commercial relations with that country. My constituents, who are deeply connected with the silk trade, feel a very great anxiety to know whether it is intended to alter the present duties on the importation of silk goods. They are the more anxious to know this as they consider the present duty barely sufficient to afford them the necessary protection.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I am sure the House will feel that the circumstance to which the Honourable Gentleman has adverted, — namely, that the negotiation is now pending, — is a sufficient excuse for my not entering into any detailed answer to this question. I am, however, enabled to say that, from the representations which have been made to me, I believe that very exaggerated reports have gone abroad upon this subject, and that a great deal of unnecessary alarm exists. It is not, nor has it ever been, in the contemplation of Her Majesty's Government to abandon the principle of an efficient protection to the silk manufactures of this country.

EAST INDIA PRODUCE.

SIR R. JENKINS. — I rise, Sir, to call the attention of the House to the petition of the East India Company, presented on the 11th instant, praying for further alteration of the duties on articles of East India produce. It behoves me, in the performance of the duty I have thus undertaken, in the first instance, to call upon the House to remember that the East India Company is not now a commercial body petitioning this House as to any interests of their own, but that they come forward on behalf of the people of British India. In the next place, I would beg to remind the House that our East India possessions are not maintained without a very considerable expenditure — that the territories which have been committed to the government of the petitioners, by an act of the British Legislature, form a very large and important portion of the British empire. And then, it must be remembered, that not only is the expense of the East India Company's civil and military establishments defrayed out of their own revenues, but they contribute mainly to the support of Her Majesty's troops in India, as well as the recruiting expenses for the Indian service in this country. I do not say that it ought not to be so, or that India ought not herself to defray all the expenses necessary to good government; but I think our East Indian possessions are entitled to the fair and equitable consideration of the Legislature. It is the duty of the British Parliament to promote their interests in trade and commerce. If those dominions were dependent on this country for maintenance, the interests of the mother country might very properly be preferred to their's; but that is not the case, on the contrary, they are a source of great wealth and power, and, I may add, of glory, to the British empire. Annually remittances are made to England from India amounting to upwards of 3,000,000*l.* sterling, for which no return is made; and therefore it might be considered as tribute; not to mention the large fortunes which individuals are constantly acquiring there, and returning to their native land to spend. The House, then, will surely agree with me, that in return for all these benefits, arising from our connection with India, the trade and commerce of those living under our authority, there, ought to be encouraged by every means consistent with justice, and a due regard to the interests of the mother country. Surely the products of British India ought to be admitted into the ports of Great Britain on the same terms of advantage as are granted to our other dependencies. The first article to which the petition of the East India Company alludes is sugar. By the 6th and 7th of William IV. cap. 26., the duties on East and West India sugar were equalised; but the conditions which were appended to that law confined its operation to Bengal. By the 1st and 2d of Victoria, cap. 33., means were prescribed for extending to other parts of the British territories in India the same advantages which had been conceded to Bengal; but those means were found to be unsatisfactory and inefficient, and calculated rather to interrupt than to promote trade. The importation of sugar grown in the British possessions in India was to be admitted at the low rate of duty, but at the same time the importation of foreign sugar into the East Indies was prohibited, and the further provision was imposed that Her Majesty in Council should be satisfied that the importation of foreign sugar was prohibited duly in the presidencies. Now, it is of the necessity for that reference to the Council that the Company complain. They see not the need, and they do feel the hardship, of interposing such delay in the course of their trade. In order to encourage the people of India to embark their capital in commerce, it is necessary to hold out to their expectations something like a certainty of success. It is difficult to deal with conflicting interests, at all times and under all circumstances; but this is more acutely felt with regard to India, she not being able to contend with conflicting interests, which are more powerfully advocated at home. The Company wish to have the provisions of the 6th and 7th William IV., granting certain exemptions from this troublesome proceeding to the presidency of Bengal, extended to the whole of India. All that the petitioners desire is, that that confidence which has been placed in some of the dependencies of British India should be given to them generally. Two of the subjects to which the petition alludes are, the duties on tobacco and spirits. The tobacco which comes from America to this country pays only a duty of 2*s.* 9*d.* per lb., while that which is imported from British India pays 3*s.* The petitioners therefore pray that tobacco coming from India may be placed on the same footing as that which comes from America. Then, with respect to spirits,— I allude principally to rum, — whilst the imports from the West India colonies pay 9*s.* a gallon, those from India pay 15*s.* a gallon. Now, I do not see why rum should not be admitted from India on the same terms as it is from the West India colonies. The petition also states, that whilst the cotton goods of this country are imported into India at from 3½ to 7 per cent. duty, as they may happen to be imported in English or foreign bottoms, similar goods manufactured in India are only admitted to this country on the payment of a duty of from 10 to 20 per cent. The effect of these arrangements is, that a great decrease has taken place in the importation of Indian goods into England. In 1813 and 1814 the importations of white calico, muslin, &c. amounted to nearly a million pieces in each year. In 1833 and 1834 that amount had been reduced to 50,000 and 75,000 pieces. But, meantime, in the importation of British goods into India a considerable increase had taken place. In 1814 the imports of British goods into India amounted in value to 109,487*l.* In 1837 they had increased to 2,160,936*l.*, and in 1838 to 2,445,000*l.* Then, with regard to silk goods — silk goods of Great Britain pay in India the same duty as cotton goods — namely, from 3½ to 7 per cent.; whereas silk goods from India pay 20 per cent. in this country This is, surely, unjust towards India; and I am quite satisfied that this injury might be done away with, without prejudice to either the manufacturers or the revenue of England.

There is another article alluded to in the petition, which, at the present moment, is a subject of peculiar interest in this country, — I mean the lately established cultivation of tea in Assam. I think that it would be good policy, and most advantageous to this country, if protection and encouragement were given to that produce. In time, no doubt, the tea grown in Assam will be as good as that imported from China; and I trust yet to see that a very considerable proportion of the tea consumed in this country will be the growth of India. There is another point also of very great interest, not so much affecting, however, our immediate territories as those which are dependent upon the British Government, — I allude, now, more particularly, to the state of Mysore. A difficulty arose, some two or three years ago, respecting the importation of coffee from the territory of Mysore; to which article the principle of equalisation was extended, as well as to that of sugar, by the 5th and 6th of William IV. Upon the occasion to which I allude, a question arose whether Mysore was a British possession? An inquiry having been made, it was ascertained that Mysore was nominally the dominion of an Indian prince, and, consequently, the coffee from that district was admitted as foreign coffee only. But Mysore is, in point of fact, under British authority; its revenues and territories are under British control, and as much British influence is exercised there as in Bengal. The principle for which I am contending, however, has been recognised, to the fullest extent, in a case which came under the notice of the Government during the last Session. A question having arisen as to whether coffee imported from a country contiguous to the British settlement at Sierra Leone was admissible at the low rate, the Lords of the Treasury and the Board of Trade called upon the importers to establish their claim by proving that the coffee was grown in the neighbourhood of a dependency of Sierra Leone, and that the people were in habitual and friendly communication with the British residents of that settlement. That was the condition upon which it was proposed to give the advantage to those people which the petitioners now ask for the people of India, who are not merely friendly to the British residents, but are actually under the same government with them, in states that form part and parcel of the British empire. Many of the Indian states are in the possession of this country, and others of them, though not in our possession, nevertheless aid our resources by subsidies and tributes; and they are, besides, restricted from intercourse with all foreign states, except Great Britain. I contend that the East Indies should be considered and treated in all respects as British possessions, and that the natives should enjoy all the privileges of British subjects; yet, under the Navigation Act, the natives of British India are excluded from the privileges of British seamen; which is a great hardship on them, while the same privilege is extended to the natives of the West Indies and other places, who have no greater claims than the natives of India. A ship from India, for example, cannot, except under peculiar circumstances, come to this country without a certain complement of British seamen, and cannot leave this country on her return, without British seamen; so that, in consequence of this arrangement, the supernumerary number of her Lascars have to be carried back to India as passengers. I have thus gone into the general statements of the petition, I trust, without having much tired the House. The empire of England in India has been acquired by this country under circumstances that have made it the wonder of the world. The natives of that country look to England for encouragement, protection, and assistance; and, when it is considered what benefits we derive from them, surely it cannot be too much to ask that they should have full scope afforded them for their industry, and every assistance for their encouragement. I feel convinced that the desirable result prayed for by the petitioners cannot be effected until every enactment that interferes oppressively with India, or checks in any way the industry of that country, is obliterated from the statute book. I beg to conclude by moving the following resolutions: —

1. That, with a view to carry out the intention of the Legislature, that sugar from the East Indian possessions should be admitted on equal terms with sugar from other settlements, it is the opinion of this House that, on the prohibition of the importation of sugar into ports in India by the local Government, the importation of sugar into this country from the ports of India, at an equal rate of duty, ought to be permitted.

2. That spirits, being the produce of British possessions, are in no case, except that of India, subject to a higher rate of duty than 9*s.* per gallon, the duty on spirits from India being 15*s.* per gallon; that it is the opinion of this House that the duties on spirits from all British possessions should be equalised.

3. That tobacco, the produce of British possessions in America, being subject to a duty of only 2*s.* 9*d.* per pound, while that of India pays 3s., it is the opinion of this House that the duty should be equalised.

4. That, while cotton and silk piece-goods from the United Kingdom are admitted at the principal ports of India at an ad valorem duty of 3½ to 7 per cent., similar goods from India are subjected to duties of 10 and 20 per cent.; it is therefore the opinion of this House that the duties on cotton and silk goods imported from India should be subject only to such duties as are payable on the same description of goods shipped from this country to India.

5. That, with a view to the encouragement of the cultivation of the tea plant in British India, it is the opinion of this House that the duty levied on tea, the produce of British India, should be lower than that on tea imported from China.

6. That it is the opinion of this House that all inequalities existing in any of the colonial possessions of Her Majesty, in the amount of duty levied on goods the produce of the United Kingdom, and those the produce of India, ought to be removed.

7. That, under the construction of the term "British possessions," the produce of many parts of India, subject to the authority of the British Government, is charged with rates of duty applicable to the produce of foreign countries. That it is the opinion of this House, that the whole of the territories of British India should receive the benefit of the term for commercial purposes.

8. That those provisions of the existing laws of England which exclude seamen, natives of the territories of India subject to the British Government, from the privilege of being considered British seamen, while that privilege is extended to natives of other British possessions, operate prejudicially to a class of persons entitled to the protection of Parliament; and that it is the opinion of this House, that the law, in this respect, ought to be amended.

Before I sit down, I will add, that it is my intention, on Wednesday, the 4th of March, to move that the whole House resolve itself into a committee, to consider the duties payable on articles the produce of British India, with the view of equalising them.

Mr. HOGG. — Having the honour of a seat in the direction of the affairs of India, I trust the House will kindly grant me their indulgence. I feel deeply conscious how unworthy I am to occupy their time; and I evince that consciousness by my rarely obtruding myself on their attention. On the present occasion, I feel that I have a duty to perform, which does not permit me to remain silent; and I am further prompted to attempt the discharge of that duty, by strong feelings of gratitude and attachment towards the country where I passed the best days of my life. I know, full well, how little disposed Honourable Members are to submit to the infliction of an Indian debate. There is infused into it none of that party spirit that crowds our benches and commands our attention. It affords no expectation that the great leaders in this House will take part in the discussion. There are no watchful constituents to note those who are absent, and require an explanation. It is a dry detail of grievances, long existing and patiently endured; urged, perhaps, by the feeblest voices in this House, and on behalf of millions who can exercise no influence on our councils. The days, however, have passed, when India can be regarded as separate and distinct from the rest of the empire in her political and commercial relations. No man, wishing to take a part in public life, can now regard India as fit only to occupy the attention of the civil and military servants of the East India Company, but as unworthy the consideration or study of a British statesman. India, for nearly a century, has contributed most largely to our political strength and commercial prosperity, and had always a strong claim on our gratitude and justice. It is no longer necessary to confine the appeal to gratitude and justice. Her interests, political and commercial, are now absolutely identified with those of England; and I am enabled to make the more powerful appeal which addresses itself to self-interest. The countries intervening between our north-west frontier and rival European states are no longer unknown and unexplored. The time selected by my Honourable Friend to call attention to this petition has been most happily and opportunely chosen. We cannot forget that many days have not passed since the thanks of this House were voted to our Indian army for their glorious achievements to the west of the Indus; — in a campaign almost without example for the length of the march and the difficulties of the country traversed, — where we saw the natives of India vying with British troops in their endurance of toils and privations, — in their bravery in the breach and in their clemency in the citadel. Whence, I ask, came the immense resources necessary for that campaign? From those, on whose behalf I now address you.

Confine not yourselves, then, to barren votes of thanks to the soldiers of India, who fight your battles. Do substantial justice to the countless inhabitants of that mighty empire; who, without murmuring, furnish you with the means. When thus draining India of her treasure, I do hope that you will not withhold from that country the means of recruiting her exhausted strength, afforded by the bounty of Providence and her own industry. I do venture to hope that the House will this night express its opinion in language sufficiently strong to support the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if wavering, and to coerce him, if reluctant. I believe I have no principle to contend for. Every one admits the impolicy and injustice of discriminating duties, with respect to different parts of the same empire. But with respect to India, they are peculiarly impolitic and unjust. Look at the relative circumstances and condition of England and India. It so happens, that each can furnish what the other requires; and I can see no limit to the extent to which they may mutually benefit each other, without interference or collision. If we are to legislate selfishly for England, and solely with reference to her interests, I do not believe that we could accomplish our object better than by doing full and ample justice to India. England requires an outlet for her manufactures; India affords a market almost inexhaustible, with reference to its extent and population. There is no want of disposition in the natives to purchase our manufactures: they lack the means, not the will. Improve their condition, by encouraging their agricultural and commercial industry, and thereby inducing British capital to find its way to the interior; and you will thus advance your own interests, while you perform a sacred duty towards India. There has been none of that rush of capital to India that was predicted during the debates on the renewal of the charter. It is, perhaps, better for the interests of India, that there has not been an improvident rush of capital and speculation towards that country. It would have been attended with ruin to the individuals, and no benefit to the country, as we saw in the case of South America. I believe that British enterprise and British capital will soon find their way to the interior of India, when the Legislature have shown their determination to give all fair encouragement to Indian interests; and I trust that the result of this night's debate will fully establish that confidence. If Honourable Members who take an interest in the matter have the petition in their hands, I shall, perhaps, best meet their convenience by adverting to the different articles in the order in which they occur in the petition. But, before doing so, I will beg the attention of the House, for a few minutes, to the general state of trade in India, and to its present state, as contrasted with a distant period, and before the trade was opened. I will take the year 1806, and compare the exports from Calcutta, in that year, with the exports in 1836; and, in doing so, I will mention, separately, the amount of opium and indigo, and class the rest as general trade; and the result is as follows:—

	Rupees.
Opium	5,886,888
Indigo	5,221,609
Re-exports	859,859
	11,968,356

1836.

	Rupees.
Opium	17,657,683
Indigo	12,819,150
Re-exports	2,446,089
	32,922,922

General Trade, 1806.

	Rupees.
Raw produce	15,047,988
Manufactures	13,849,670
Sundries	1,044,494
	29,942,152

General Trade, 1836.

	Rupees.
Raw produce	18,061,647
Manufactures	4,501,361
Sundries	1,510,834
	24,073,842

Thus showing a great increase in opium and indigo, the only two articles for which European capital is available; but a very considerable decrease in the aggregate of the rest of the trade. I will now, as shortly as I can, call your attention to the several articles mentioned in the petition. The first is sugar: and I am sure it will be satisfactory to the House to hear the results of the equalisation of the duties. In 1835, the year before the equalisation, the quantity of East India sugar imported for home consumption was 98,722 cwt.; and in 1838, was 418,717 cwt. The petition prays for no new enactment, as regards principle. It was the intention of the Legislature, by the 1 & 2 Vic. c. 33., to extend to Madras and Bombay the same benefit that had been conceded to Bengal; and all we ask is, that the intentions of the Legislature should be carried into effect. The provisions requiring a reference to the Privy Council create delay and uncertainty; and the petition prays that those restrictions may be removed; and that the presidencies of Madras and Bombay should be placed under the same law that is now applicable to Bengal; — to which I cannot suppose any objection will be made.

The next article is coffee; and I am happy to state that the increase in the quantity of East India coffee retained for home consumption, since the equalisation of the duties, far exceeds what could have been anticipated. In 1834, the year before the duty was equalised, the quantity was 4,558,604 lbs.; while, in the year 1838, it amounted to 10,283,047 lbs. I need not dwell on the great advantages of rendering coffee abundant and cheap, and thereby extending its consumption throughout all classes of the community. I believe that the general introduction of coffee, as a beverage, among the working classes, would tend to check the consumption of ardent spirits more than any other measure that could be devised. With respect to coffee, the whole difficulty arises from the construction put on the words "British possessions." The Board of Trade limit the application of the term to territories ceded by treaties, or occupied after conquest, by the British Government, without any native prince being in exercise of any sovereignty, real or nominal. The East India Company contend that it ought to include all states with which we have subsidiary alliances; but more particularly Mysore, where the British Government has actual possession, and administers the whole civil and military government of the country, the Rajah only receiving a stipulated allowance. I beg to state that the Board of Trade has only recently imposed this rigid construction on the words "British possessions." In December, 1833, an Order in Council was passed, allowing pepper, imported from Travancore, to be received at the low rate of duty, as the produce of a British possession; although that country was, at the time, in the exclusive possession of the Rajah, by whom the government was administered. I should hope that no legislative enactment will be deemed necessary, and that the benefit of the Order in Council, which permitted pepper to be imported from Travancore at the low rate of duty, will be extended to coffee grown in Mysore.

The next article is rum, which, coming from the West Indies, is subject to a duty of 9*s*., while the East India rum is subject to a duty of 15*s*., — which amounts to an absolute prohibition. There are annually retained for home consumption upwards of 3,000,000 gallons of rum, not one gallon of which comes from India. Rum must follow sugar; you cannot have equal duties for one part of the produce of the cane, and unequal duties for another. It cannot be said that the duty upon sugar has practically been equalised, while the West Indian can turn his refuse to an advantage from which the East Indian is excluded. I feel that I need not labour this point, and that justice upon it cannot any longer be withheld.

The next article is tobacco. "We pray that tobacco grown in India may be admitted at 2*s*. 9*d*., the same duty as is paid on tobacco the produce of the British possessions in America." In 1836, upwards of 52,000,000 lbs. of tobacco were imported into the United Kingdom, of which, only 44,000 lbs. came from India; where soil and climate are peculiarly calculated for its growth. I am aware that very little has come from the British possessions in America; but I claim for India the same benefit you have conceded to them; and I will venture to predict that the result will be very different. I feel the weight of the argument that may be urged with respect to the extent to which the revenue might be affected. The revenue could only suffer materially if India afforded a considerable portion of the whole supply; and, if she did, the benefit to India directly, and to this country indirectly, would much more than compensate for any such deficiency.

The next article alluded to in the petition is cotton, which, for centuries, has been one of the great staples of India. Her fertile plains can supply, almost without limit, the raw material required by the manufacturing industry of Great Britain. Cotton can be imported from India into Great Britain, and, through the wondrous agency of steam, can be manufactured into cloth, returned to India, and there sold cheaper than the cloths made in the country! The consequence is, that the country manufacturers (except for the very coarse cloths) have been wholly ruined, and entire districts have been reduced to a state of utter destitution. In Dacca the district where the beautiful fabrics known by the name of Dacca muslins were made, thousands have been thrown out of employment; and the accounts I have heard of their misery and distress far exceed any suffering known in this country. Now, under these calamitous circumstances, is it not monstrous that the cotton piece-goods of India, when brought into an English port, should pay an ad valorem duty, in no case less than 10 per cent., while the cotton piece-goods of England are imported into Calcutta at an ad valorem duty of only 3½ per cent.? I believe that no language I could use would be too strong to characterise such gross and grinding injustice. To judge of the extent and severity of the calamity inflicted on the cotton manufacturers of India by English competition, you must look to what was formerly their condition. Cotton is eminently the staple manufacture of the country. From the nature of the climate, every individual of its dense population is clothed in cotton piece-goods; from which fact some estimate may be formed of what was once the extent of the manufacture, and the number of those employed. To aggravate their misery, they have not the same facility in turning to other occupations that persons in this country have. In India, particular trades are mixed up with the peculiarities of caste; and when men are thrown from the calling pursued from time immemorial by their forefathers, they are helpless, and their desolation is complete.

I will show you, from official Returns, the great increase in British exports to India since the opening of the trade; and, in particular, the immense increase in the export of our cotton manufactures. I will, likewise, confirm what I have stated by Returns, showing the utter extinction of the export trade of cotton piece-goods from India. In 1814, the value of the goods exported by the East India Company, and by private traders, to countries eastward of the Cape of Good Hope, excepting China, was 1,874,690*l.*; and, in 1836, was 4,285,829*l.* The value of British cotton manufactures exported to the East Indies in 1814, the first year of free trade, was 109,487*l.*; and, in 1838, was 2,445,654*l.* In 1814, the first year of free trade, there were imported into Great Britain of white calicos and muslins 967,652 pieces, when the duty was 62½ per cent. In 1834, the number imported was only 76,122 pieces, when the duty was only 10 per cent. But, to compare with the present a more distant period: the cotton piece-goods exported from Calcutta, in 1806, amounted in value to 1,460,000*l.*; and, in 1836, to only 108,000*l.* Thus it appears that the export trade of cotton manufactures from India to Great Britain has been utterly destroyed; that the home market in India has been seriously injured by British competition; and in the cloths that continue to be manufactured, a large portion of the yarn used has latterly been imported from Great Britain. In 1814, the amount of cotton yarn exported to India was 8 lbs.; and, in 1838, it was 10,710,136 lbs.

While I deeply lament these calamitous results, I do not ask you to protect the cotton manufactures of India, by imposing prohibitory duties on the importation of English piece-goods — I ask for no artificial protection. I only ask for equal duties, for fair play, and fair competition. If the duties were equalised to-morrow, I do not believe that India, in the finer descriptions of cotton piece-goods, could compete with England, aided by machinery, almost without limit in its powers of production. But you cannot defend the inequality of the duty by showing it to be useless — you cannot defend the injustice by showing it to be gratuitous. Equalise the duties; show me that India cannot compete with England in this manufacture; and, in the language of the petition, I "will not complain of any result which may be regarded as the effect of the natural course of trade, and not as the consequence of unjust impositions." By discouraging the cotton manufactures of India, you have discouraged the culture and improvement of the raw material, in which you are most eminently interested. England is now dependent for her supply of cotton on a foreign country, with which our relations are, at this moment, in a state calculated to create some feelings of uneasiness. What would be the condition of the manufacturing districts if the supply of cotton were interrupted? and what would be the condition of this country if the most important of her exports were, for a time, to cease? Under such circumstances, to India, and to India alone, can you look; and I hope the day is not far distant when she will be able to afford cotton of quality and staple suited to all our manufactures. The natives have not capital, nor have they the requisite information to enable them to make the proper selection as to seed, climate, and soil. British enterprise and British capital alone are wanting. Both are superabundant, and both will be forthcoming when Parliament has evinced its determination to establish a full and perfect system of reciprocity with India.

The next article mentioned in the petition is silk; and I will pass as rapidly as possible over what remains, feeling that I have already unduly trespassed on the kind indulgence of the House. Silk piece-goods introduced into British ports pay a duty of 20 per cent., while British silks are admitted into Calcutta at a duty of only 3½ per cent. The bare statement of this inequality is sufficient; and I should only weaken its force and effect, by any attempt at commentary or argument. Some trade still continues in the export from India to Great Britain of bandannas, or handkerchiefs; but the export of all other descriptions of manufactured silks has almost ceased. In 1814, there were imported into Great Britain 71,502 pieces of bandannas, and in 1836, 331,652 pieces. Of taffeties and other descriptions of silks, there were imported into Great Britain, in 1814, 31,115 pieces; and, in 1836, only 741 pieces: and, be it remembered, that, in 1814, the duty was 62½ per cent., and in 1836, the duty was only 20 per cent. I will not detain the House by dwelling on the importance of giving every encouragement to the cultivation of tea in Assam, at least during its infancy; and feel assured that Government will see the expediency and justice of making some difference in duty between tea produced in the British possessions in India and that brought from a foreign country. I wish to avoid entering on the wide question of discriminating duties, and would, therefore, suggest, that the proposed indulgence should be granted for only a limited period, — say five years.

The petition, lastly, prays relief with respect to certain provisions of the navigation laws, which operate most injuriously on the interests of the natives of India, and of those concerned in Indian shipping. It is declared, by the navigation laws, that natives of places within the limits of the East India Company's charter, although under British dominion, shall not be deemed to be British seamen; while negroes and all others born in the British possessions in America are entitled to that privilege. This provision presses with peculiar severity on the Parsee merchants of Bombay, who are large shipowners; and, I have been informed, it frequently happens that ships from Bombay, which have arrived here, navigated by Lascars, have been compelled to take on board the required proportion of British seamen on the return voyage, and to carry back, as passengers, their own Lascars. I hold in my hand a long list of articles, the produce of India, subject to duties varying from 10 to 160 per cent.; but I am unwilling to encumber the present discussion by referring to articles not mentioned in the petition. I am glad that my Honourable Friend has not moved for a Committee, which would only have produced delay, and continued the injustice for another year. In fact, there is nothing to inquire about; the inequality of duties set forth in the petition is beyond dispute; the injustice of that inequality cannot, I believe, be denied. We seek redress, — immediate redress, — and not inquiry. I do hope that the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not imagine that attention has been called to this petition merely to extract from him some general expression of sympathy towards India, — some abstract declaration of the injustice of the existing inequalities, with the intimation of a hope that he may, at some future time, have it in his power to afford relief, but concluding with the usual official wind-up, that the present is not the fitting time and occasion. I shall consider it my duty to urge the Right Honourable Gentleman, as strongly as I can presume to do, to declare, this night, his opinion and intentions as to each of the resolutions, clearly, distinctly, and definitely, as to time. If there be any one of them that states any fact which can be disputed, or involves any principle not admitted, let him single out that resolution for consideration, and declare his adhesion to the rest.

I know not what course the Right Honourable Baronet at the head of the Board of Control may feel it his duty to pursue; I believe that Right Honourable Gentleman to be most anxious to advance the interests of India, as far as may be in his power. I am aware, however, that he must act in concert with his colleagues; — I know that he must pay due attention to divers suggestions from his Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer; — I know that there are powerful opposing interests, which cannot fail to influence, or, at least, to embarrass him. The little parliamentary experience I have had tells me, that when a Minister is thus circumstanced, — when he is unable to accede, and cannot refuse, — he seeks refuge in a Select Committee. I do hope that my Honourable Friend will not agree to any such proposal, but will press his resolutions to a division. I rely with confidence on the justice of this House; and that confidence is, in no small degree, increased, when I make my appeal, not on behalf of an individual, — not on behalf of any particular interest, but on behalf of the whole inhabitants of a distant empire, whose destinies have been committed to our rule. It matters not that half the world intervenes between them and the seat of our councils. I do believe that the British House of Commons, regardless of distance, of climate, or of colour, will ever prove itself ready to dispense equal justice to all subjects of the Crown, whether in the West or in the East.

Upon the question being put, —

Mr. LABOUCHERE said: — Sir, I certainly do not rise to express any difference of opinion from the Honourable Gentleman who has introduced the subject, either as to the importance of the subject itself, or the weight which it derives from the character of the gentlemen who have signed the petition — the representatives of that great company which has so long managed our vast East Indian empire; and, I may add, that the subject comes further recommended by the circumstance of its being brought forward by a Gentleman who, after a long and distinguished career in India, is now sitting among us, uniting, in his own person, so many claims to our attention; and I can assure the Honourable Baronet and the House that I approach the subject in anything but a hostile spirit. I may be permitted to say, that the Honourable Baronet has no reason to apprehend that the question will be considered by Government with any desire to come to an unfavourable conclusion, when it is remembered that it was the good fortune of that Government, only a few years ago, in 1836, to carry the first great step towards placing the interests of our East Indian fellow subjects on the same footing as those of their fellow colonists in other parts of the world; — that it was that Government which, in 1836, placed those two staple articles of East Indian produce, coffee and sugar, on the same footing with the same articles grown in the West Indies. I trust, therefore, that if I feel it my duty on the present occasion to urge on the House the strong objections which I feel to its pledging itself to the resolutions now proposed, it will not be imputed to me that I am actuated by any hostile or unfavourable spirit toward the interests of our East Indian fellow subjects. But, Sir, it is impossible to look at the many all-important questions involved in these resolutions, having reference, as they have, to the highest interests in commerce, finance, and manufactures, without feeling that the House would not be acting with the deliberation it ought to exercise on such a subject, — that it would not be acting with the care and caution which the importance of the case demands, — if it were now to affirm the principles embodied in the Honourable Baronet's resolutions. With respect to these resolutions, in themselves, I must, in the outset, observe, that although many of the points advanced in them seem, at first sight, to exhibit a comparison showing unfair treatment, as between our East Indian possessions and the other portions of our colonial empire, yet, when we look more closely into the matter, it will appear that the difference does not, in many cases, exist at all; and is, in many other cases, more theoretical than practical. I am very glad to find that the Honourable Gentleman opposite is satisfied with the measure of 1836. That measure has been most beneficial in its effects, both upon sugar and upon coffee. The following is a statement of the quantities of raw sugar, the produce of the British West India colonies, and of the British possessions in India, imported and entered for consumption in the United Kingdom in each year, from 1832 to 1839: —

Years.	West Indies, exclusive of the Mauritius.		India.
	Imported.	Entered for Consumption.	Imported.	Entered for Consumption.
	Cwts.	Cwts.	Cwts.	Cwts.
1832	3,773,456	3,824,264	88,238	79,595
1833	3,646,204	3,469,642	120,625	98,282
1834	3,843,976	3,748,934	77,230	121,481
1835	3,524,209	3,774,821	107,100	98,722
1836	3,601,791	3,296,641	155,950	110,257
1837	3,306,408	3,562,778	297,923	270,078
1838	3,520,675	3,369,084	443,853	418,726
1839	2,822,872	2,790,294	460,344	478,010

I am happy to say that the House, in passing these measures, has not been disappointed. We have effected increased production in India, and furnished an increased supply at home. I will also add, — although I cannot, perhaps, very regularly allude to it, — that the Government, in acceding to a motion in another place for a Select Committee to inquire into the subject of the resolutions, has at least evinced a disposition to allow the whole question to be thoroughly investigated. Notwithstanding that the Honourable Gentleman who seconded the motion seems to think that we ought at once to jump to his conclusions, as self-evident and plain. I consider that the question before us is one which requires the most grave and serious inquiry; but, whenever it can be shown that, with security to the revenue, and with justice to other interests, any further progress can be made in removing the anomalies that exist between the trade and commerce of our East Indian possessions and those of the other parts of our colonial empire, then there will be no indisposition on the part of the Government to follow up the principles which have guided them in the reductions already made in the duties on coffee and sugar.

I now come to the statement made in connection with the first resolution, — that although, nominally, we have admitted sugar from India on the same terms as from the West Indies, yet that we have not really done so; — in fact, that sugar from India still labours under a practical discouragement. The House must consider, in questions of this kind, that when we are desirous to deal out equal justice to two parties, if the circumstances of the parties are different, we must employ different means of attaining the object. What is the case with regard to our West Indian possessions? By an Act of the Imperial Legislature, our West Indian possessions are absolutely prohibited from importing a single pound of foreign coffee. There are many parts of India to which that law could not be applied, because they depend on foreign countries for their own supply of coffee. It would, also, not be a boon, but an injury, to extend to all parts of the continent of India permission to export sugar, accompanied with a prohibition to import any for their own consumption. The Government have taken another course. We have allowed any district of India that chooses, to renounce the privilege of importing sugar. A prohibition may now be issued of the importation of foreign sugar to that particular part of India, and therefore such district will have the privilege of exporting sugar to this country. It is true that we reserved to the Queen in Council the right of judging whether the proofs laid before them of the non-importation should be satisfactory. We do not allow the local Government of India to be judge in that matter; which appears to me to be a proper subject for Imperial legislation, and not fit to be determined by any power, however respectable, in any other part of the world. We should be departing from the principles of the connection between colony and mother country, by allowing so important a question to be decided in any other way. Nor is the present arrangement of any practical inconvenience to India, because it can only cause a delay of a few months. And let me also observe, that, as the importation of any commodity from India to this country concerns the officers of the revenue and the executive department, it would be hardly right that they should receive their instructions with regard to an alteration in the duties on any commodity from the authorities in India, instead of from the Government at home. With regard to the question of coffee, the Honourable Gentleman has allowed that the importation of coffee from India is working well; but he complains that we do not admit coffee grown in tributary and allied states on the same low duty as that from the British possessions. That is a very important, and not a very easy, question; and I would entreat the House not to commit themselves rashly by any expression of opinion upon it, at present. In the first place, the West India colonies, which are truly British, have a right to expect that care should be taken, when admitting the produce of any other country on an equal footing with their's, that that country should be completely and bonâ fide British. In the next place, I doubt exceedingly whether, if we were to admit the produce of countries, not strictly speaking British possessions, at a low rate of duty, we should not lay ourselves open to claims on the part of other powers with whom reciprocity treaties exist, binding us to admit their productions on the most favourable terms which are afforded to any foreign nations. It must be obvious, therefore, that this question requires the greatest consideration before any decision can be come to upon it. The Honourable Gentleman also complains, that, with regard to tobacco, the trade of the East and West Indies is not on the same footing. It is undoubtedly true that the duty on tobacco from India is 3*s*., and from the West Indies and the British possessions in North America, 2*s*. 9*d*. Some years ago the reduction was made in favour of the latter countries, but it has remained a dead letter. The whole amount imported from these countries has been so inconsiderable, that the law which enacted the reduction may be considered inoperative. I will read to the House the amount of the manufactured tobacco from the British plantations in America within the last few years: —

	lbs. manufactured.	lbs. unmanufactured.
In 1832	15	25,156
1833	41	11,001
1834	47	7,926
1835	1,523	8,928
1836	1,316	13,866

In 1837 the whole quantity of manufactured tobacco imported was 214 lbs.; in 1838, 25 lbs.; and in 1839, not one single pound of tobacco, manufactured or unmanufactured. I mention these facts, for the sake of showing that, while there appears to be favour shown in this matter to other colonies over India, there is, practically, none. On the other hand, it is the case, — and I am glad that it is so, — that we are importing a continually increasing quantity of tobacco from India. When I am asked whether the Government should at once pledge itself to allow all tobacco from the East Indian empire into England at the reduced duty of 2*s*. 9*d*., I must beg leave to point out the importance of the financial questions involved in such an arrangement. Tobacco is an article from which we obtain an enormous revenue, in proportion to the prime cost of the article, which is not more than 2*d*. or 3*d*. a pound. Upon that we are enabled to levy a duty of 3*s*. a pound, and to derive an enormous revenue from it. Now, whatever may be said as to the justice of reducing the duty on tobacco from the East Indies, still the House must consider the importance of the financial question upon which we are called to pledge ourselves. The next question which the Honourable Gentleman brought forward, and on which he addressed the House with great eloquence and effect, was, the conduct of this country with regard to the cotton and silk manufactures of India. The Honourable Gentleman has pointed out the high duty which has been laid on these articles when brought from India to Quebec and other places, and the low duty which is paid on the same articles when exported from England. Whether this difference is just or unjust, no Gentleman who has paid attention to the history of the cotton manufacture can think that it has had any serious effect in the extinction of the cotton export trade of India, and the substitution of the immense cotton trade of this country. It has been owing to machinery, to capital, and to other causes, that the trade of this country has been raised to such a pitch of magnitude and importance; and neither the imposition nor the repeal of the duties in question can have materially affected it. In any case, however, I must confess that, with regard to these duties, we shall be bound to consult the interests of the revenue, as well as those of trade. Certainly it would neither be wise nor judicious for the House — without seeing what existing interests would be affected by it, and without looking narrowly into the complicated considerations which are involved in the question — to pledge itself at once to a great and sweeping alteration. I think we may trust in the spirit which actuates the country and the House of Commons, and I may say the Government, for the removal of the anomalies which exist, whenever, with justice to the finances, to the interests of our colonial empire, and the manufacturing and mercantile classes, whom a change would affect, that removal can be accomplished.

The question of the admission of rum from India is one which the Honourable Gentleman seems to treat as perfectly simple. To me, however, it appears to be a very complicated one. If rum could be admitted under regulations which would prevent other spirits coming in along with it, the question might be easily settled. But the boon once granted to India of admitting her sugar on the same terms with West Indian sugar, it would follow, as a natural consequence, that rum made from the refuse of sugar should be admitted also. That principle seems to be fair and just; but I believe that, practically, it would be found difficult to carry it into effect. There is a very large manufacture of spirit from rice in India; and it would be extremely difficult, if the door was opened for the admission of rum, to prevent arrack from getting in also. It would be scarcely possible to preserve the distinction. By a little mixture of molasses with the rice, spirits might be obtained which would easily find admission. Upon this point, also, I wish the House to observe the importance and extent of the question we are called on to decide. I do not mean to say that the question is not well worth the consideration of the Government; but, assuredly, nothing could be more injudicious than a precipitate pledge upon the subject by the House of Commons. With respect to the article of tea, I believe that the quantity imported from Assam is a mere trifle.

Whether we should make a distinction between such tea coming from our own possessions and any other, I am not prepared to offer an opinion. If I had an opinion on the subject, which I must confess I have not, I should not think it right to declare it now; because it is the duty of a Minister not to announce his intention of altering a duty until he is prepared to bring forward a measure to effect the alteration, and to take the opinion of the House without loss of time. In making such a reduction it would be necessary to take effectual steps for preventing Chinese tea from finding its way into the ports of India, and being imported as coming from Calcutta; otherwise we might find a great deal of Assam tea which had never grown on British territory. In the next resolution (the sixth) there appears to be a misprint of "England," instead of "India."

SIR R. JENKINS. — The word should be India.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — The resolution proposes that inequalities of duty in any of the colonies, on British and Indian produce, should be removed. I think it is wrong, by an Act of the Imperial Legislature, to create such inequalities; but I believe that the hardships suffered from them, by India, are not very great. In the British possessions of North America the whole produce of India is admitted duty free. The last resolution complains that the Lascars, or Indian seamen, are not treated on the same footing with what are commonly called British seamen. A ship, manned by Lascars, is not entitled to the privileges of a British vessel. With respect to that resolution, I can only say that this has been an old principle in the navy, which has been recognised by enactments of the East India Company. It is a question of defence and of national policy; and I doubt whether the House would be warranted in departing from that policy which encourages a nursery for British seamen, who, in times of peril, are to defend their country. The House should pause before it adopts any resolution upon those important subjects. I do not think it will be necessary for me to trouble the House at greater length. I shall feel it my duty to oppose the adoption of these resolutions by the House; but, at the same time, I can assure the Honourable Baronet who has introduced them, that the question on which they bear shall not the less receive the attention of Government. I fear that, by acceding to the resolutions, the House would be taking a leap in the dark, and would not be benefiting one colony, while they would run a chance of injuring another. I think it is the duty of the Legislature, while it seeks to do good to every part of the empire, to endeavour to do so with as little admixture of harm as possible.

Mr. HUME. — It gives me great satisfaction to find the Honourable Baronet opposite bringing forward a question which is so important, not only to India, but to the whole empire. I am one of those who have always regretted that facilities have not been given to Indian commerce and production, because I know that that country only wants such facilities to make it a market for our own manufactures to an enormous extent. If we were to give encouragement to the industry of the people of that country, and thus enable them to pay for our manufactures, they would be our best customers. Sir, I give to every one of the propositions of the Honourable Member for Shrewsbury my most hearty concurrence, except that one which suggests a differential duty on tea. I think that, by establishing such a duty, we should only be encouraging individuals to employ their capital in a trade which must ultimately be checked. I quite agree with the Honourable Baronet, that a most unfair distinction has been made between East Indian produce and that of other colonies; and I do hope that a very short time will elapse before this distinction shall be abolished. With regard to the duty on spirits, I think there is no reason why spirits from India, the produce of sugar, should not be imported into this country on the same terms as spirits from the West Indies. I therefore concur in the resolution which recommends that reform. To that resolution I have heard no answer from the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade, except his assertion that advantage would be taken of any relaxation, in favour of spirits distilled from sugar, to import spirits the produce of grain. There might be some trifling fraud of that description; but we should not refuse a great good through fear of a trifling evil. I do not see, either, why spirits distilled from grain should be excluded. The great island of Ceylon produces arrack in abundance; and I do not understand why it should be excluded from our markets. At the same time, if the President of the Board of Trade shall choose to raise the duty on spirits generally, I will not object, because I consider spirits to be the opium of this country; and that whatever restricts its consumption will improve the morals and health of the people. With regard to tobacco, I have heard no satisfactory reason given why the duty on that which is produced in India should not be reduced. In India good tobacco is sold in the bazaars at 1*d.* a pound; and if the duty here were such that it could be manufactured for our market, we could have an unlimited supply from that country. If the duty on all tobacco were reduced to 1*s.* 6*d.* a pound, smuggling would be prevented, and India would have a share of our market. The next article mentioned by the Honourable Baronet was coffee; and certainly the strongest argument in favour of its admission into this country has been adduced by the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade. He has shown that, in the import of sugar, the article on which we have reduced the duty, there has been a most enormous increase since the reduction. I do not think that the fact of there being a Committee sitting in another place on Indian affairs should prevent our investigating the question, here. Among the important points we should investigate is the treatment which is afforded to the Indian cultivators of cotton. They could produce enough to supply half the world, and should at least be encouraged by an equal duty. The last question to which the Honourable Baronet alluded was the position of Lascar seamen. The Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade stated, that the reason why the use of these seamen has been discouraged, has been a fear that they might interfere with the increase of British seamen, and thus lessen our means of defence in time of war. I can assure the Right Honourable Gentleman that the reason why the employment of Lascars in homeward-bound ships was prevented was, that those poor men often suffered much misery from inability to return to their native country. I believe that this was the cause of the Registration Bill. I have thought it right to make these few observations; and I trust that, even should the Right Honourable Gentleman below me deem it expedient to oppose the resolutions, he will speedily take the matter into his consideration, with a view of doing justice to our Indian possessions.

Mr. A. CHAPMAN. — I am much pleased to see this subject brought under the consideration of the House. I took the liberty, four years ago, of recommending a change in the system of duties which regard the trade of India. That recommendation has been adopted, and the result has been most satisfactory. I do hope that that result will induce the Government to proceed to further changes in those duties; that they will proceed to such an equalisation as will effectually encourage the Indian trade. The importance of the coffee and sugar of India has greatly increased since the time when the Noble Lord below me (Lord Stanley) succeeded in emancipating the negroes in the West Indies, because the produce of those latter colonies has been decreasing ever since. What we ask for is, an equalisation of duties for India; we ask for what is, in fact, a mercantile Bill of Rights; and I trust that our demand will receive the favourable consideration of Government.

Mr. EWART. — I rejoice, Sir, that this question has fallen into such able hands. It is a question which those of the Members of this House who advocate the principles of free trade have long taken an interest in, — and no one more than myself. Whichever way we look at this question, it resolves itself into two points — justice and self-interest; — justice towards India, and self-interest as regards this country. Based on these two principles, I am quite convinced that the question introduced by the Honourable Baronet the Member for Shrewsbury will at length be carried. I cannot accede to the argument of the President of the Board of Trade, in which he asserts that the resolutions of the Honourable Baronet pledge the House to a specific plan of legislation. They pledge us simply to go into a Committee of the whole House to consider the present state of the laws respecting Indian produce. With respect to the objection of my Right Honourable Friend to the introduction into this country of coffee, the produce of our Indian dependencies, I beg to remind him, that in the case of Africa, it was ruled, that coffee produced on any land connected with or near to any British factory, should be considered as British colonial produce. Now I would ask, why should not the produce of our Indian dependencies be placed on the same footing? The consequence of the relaxation of the law with respect to Africa, has been, that foreign coffee has, to an enormous extent, been imported into this country from the Cape of Good Hope, to the exclusion of Indian coffee. With respect to tobacco, it would be equally beneficial to India and to this country to admit it at a low duty. As to rum, also, I cannot conceive how my Right Honourable Friend can think it just or reasonable to admit East India sugar, and to exclude rum, which is made from it, from our market.

I am sorry to disagree with my Right Honourable Friend on another point, which is, the question of a differential duty on tea. I should be sorry to find any difference made in this matter, in favour of India. I would not consent to make a sacrifice of principle, even in favour of India, to which I think it would only give a false protection, and, besides, it would be a deviation from those principles of the late Mr. Huskisson, which I hope to see my Right Honourable Friend follow. The subject of sugar has been so fully treated, that I will not trouble the House with any figures in relation to that subject, but will proceed to the article of cotton. In that article, our imports have latterly very much increased. In 1838, our imports were 34,000,000 lbs.; and in 1839, they increased to 39,000,000 lbs. The subject of cotton is most important, as Honourable Gentlemen will scarcely believe to what extent the plant may be cultivated in India. That country is capable of producing the Sea Island, the Georgian, the New Orleans, the Egyptian, and the indigenous cotton plant; in fact, there is no species which may not be cultivated in India. However, no reduction of duties on Indian produce will effectually serve the country, unless we make such a change in the laws as shall give to the natives a fixed title in the land. We must also make good roads — than which nothing is more necessary for the advancement of commerce. By doing these things, and thus developing the resources of India, we shall be opening a market for our own produce in a country whose present demand for them is inconceivably small. I have ever felt that it is one of our most prominent duties to attend to the interests of our Indian empire; and I sincerely hope that this House will no longer be indifferent to the welfare of those mighty regions,—regions which form the finest territory that ever was consigned to the care of any country. I will, in this hope, then, vote for the motion of the Honourable Baronet, not wishing to be understood as pledging myself to all these resolutions; but with the intention of giving to them all, my best consideration, with the view of doing justice to the interests both of this kingdom and of our Indian empire.

SIR J. HOBHOUSE. — My Honourable Friend the chairman of the Court of Directors, and the Honourable Gentleman who seconded this motion, have done me no more than justice in attributing to me, since my connection with the Government of India, the utmost desire to promote, to the best of my abilities, the interests of the inhabitants of the great empire intrusted to our charge. With reference to the present subject, the Court of Directors have done me the honour to request me to support the petition that has been presented, and to give my best services to carry the prayer of the petition into effect: and I think I shall best act up to — not my pledge, for I made no pledge, but to — the answer which I gave to that application, by asking my Honourable Friend opposite, and the House, to adopt the course which I shall now propose to them. It is very true, as the Honourable seconder of the motion has said, that I feel myself in the situation in which almost every President of the India Board must necessarily be placed, — willing and anxious, on the one hand, to do all that can tend to the advantage of India, but, on the other hand, from my position and connection with the general Government, obliged, also, to pay due attention to all interests contradictory to, and in collision with, the interests of that empire. Still, notwithstanding the difficulty of such a position, I am happy to say that I hope I shall be able, without sacrificing any general interest, to do that which will be an essential and an unmixed good to India, and which I hope my Honourable Friends opposite will agree with me is the best and safest course that can, under the circumstances, be adopted. I need scarcely say how anxious Her Majesty's Government is to effect everything it properly can accomplish to promote the object of this petition; and in proof of this, I may refer to the fact, that the petition in the other House was presented by a Nobleman holding a high situation in Her Majesty's Government — my Noble Friend the President of the Council. It is evident, therefore, that the Government has no intention to discourage this petition, or to put on one side the great and just claims of the subjects of our Indian empire. I must say that I think the arrangement which has been suggested for a Committee of the other House of Parliament has been much undervalued by Honourable Gentlemen who have spoken to-night, more especially, when it is remembered that this Committee is to be presided over by the Noble Lord whom I immediately succeeded in this department, and whose interest in and acquaintance with the affairs of India are familiar to all. It appears to me, that by consenting to the appointment of that Committee, the Government has at once removed all doubt as to its intention with respect to the subjects of this petition.

With respect to the proposal made by my Honourable Friend the chairman of the Board of Directors, that the House of Commons should be called on, on Wednesday next, to affirm or deny, in Committee of the whole House, all the important resolutions which he has submitted, — resolutions altering the duty on so many articles, and actually changing the whole fiscal system of the country, — I can only say, that it would be, in my opinion, to call upon a Committee of the whole House to do that which has never before been done. No such Committee was ever called upon to give, at once, a decided opinion upon a series of resolutions involving such great and important changes. I trust that my Honourable Friends will see that such an attempt would be futile, and that they would not be enabled by such a mode to arrive at a wise and deliberate decision, such as the great and important points in question demand; and that a decision so come to, far from being satisfactory to the country, would be like taking a leap in the dark, the consequences of which, in case of failure, could never be retrieved. Nay, I think my Honourable Friend would be frustrating his own views; for he would find many Honourable Gentlemen friendly to his general object who would be by no means at once prepared to affirm these various resolutions. For myself, I should not like to give any one of them, at present, a decided negative; but I am sure, if they were submitted to a Committee of the whole House, that there would be a great chance of many of them meeting with a negative which they might not deserve. I therefore think the appointment of a Select Committee by far the best mode of dealing with the subject. Some observations have been made with reference to the territory of Mysore; and it is true that we have civil and military possession of that country, and that the Rajah at present is but our pensioner. But still I am compelled to come to the decision I do, — and I have taken good care to have the best legal opinion upon this subject, — in consequence of a fact which is not very generally known, and which Honourable Gentlemen opposite have not taken into their consideration, but which compels me to decide against the claim put forth with regard to that country; namely, that we hold the territory of Mysore only in trust for the Rajah; that we administer its affairs for him; that books are regularly kept, and balance sheets regularly made; and that, whenever the time shall arrive for relinquishing that trust into the hands of the Rajah, every shilling of the revenue received by us will have to be accounted for to him.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and, "Oh, oh!"]

My Honourable Friend says that that time will never come. That, however, I cannot say. For the existing state of things I am not responsible; and I simply mention the fact as it stands, and on which I am compelled to decide that Mysore is not a British possession. I do not, therefore, mean to imply, that a Committee of the House of Commons or of the House of Lords would be prepared to say that the produce of Mysore should not be treated as coming from a British possession; but I do say that that is a question which ought to be decided by reference to the state of the territory of Mysore, its juxtaposition, its resources, and many other circumstances which cannot be taken into deliberate consideration in a Committee of the whole House.

There are many other questions, such, for instance, as that of taxation, and others, which could not be considered in Committee of the whole House. The course, then, which I am prepared to propose will, I hope, be satisfactory to my Honourable Friends, and be considered by them as a redemption of any promise I have made them, by showing that the Government is as clearly alive as themselves to the great interests at stake. I am willing that the same course of proceeding should be adopted in this as in the other House, that a Select Committee should be appointed to proceed pari passu with the Select Committee appointed elsewhere; and I am willing to leave the selection of that Committee to my Honourable Friend the chairman of the East India Board; and that it shall have the power to inquire into all the allegations contained in this petition, and all the propositions involved in the resolutions. I think that this is but just, and that it ought to meet all the reasonable wishes of Honourable Gentlemen opposite. That is all that can be done by a parliamentary inquiry. Of course the inquiries of this Committee will be confined to the petition and resolutions, and will not embrace many of those extraneous subjects which have been alluded to by my Honourable Friend behind me; such, for instance, as the subject of domestic slavery in India. Still, on behalf of the Government of India, I must say, that it has not neglected those various matters which have been thus alluded to. With respect to the transit duties in the Bengal government, those duties have been abolished as well as in the Bombay government, and with the most beneficial results; and in the Madras government they have been partially abolished, and the Government is preparing to abolish them altogether. With regard to the cultivation of cotton in India, Lord Auckland has paid the utmost attention to that important subject; and, in consequence of the information received from several deputations, and in coincidence with the enlightened views of the Court of Directors, the Government has at this moment, not in operation, but in preparation, an experiment which it is hoped will be of the utmost value to the propagation of cotton in India. Upon this subject we have recently received very valuable information from America; and I have pleasure in informing the House that a most admirable minute has been drawn up by the Governor General of India, which has already been in partial circulation, having been sent to several chambers of commerce in this country, and which I feel to be so important that I shall shortly lay it on the table of the House. The question of a permanent land settlement has been alluded to by the Honourable Member for Wigan; but that subject will not be embraced in the proposed inquiry; though I take this opportunity of stating that the Governor General has not neglected his duty in that important particular. In the north-western provinces, a very important, and, considering the trying circumstances of the dearth of 1837, a very successful experiment, has been made for improving the settlement: the land assessment has been moderated, and the experiment bids fair to produce the best fruits. A great improvement has also been made in the collection and amount of the salt revenue. I might also enlarge on the hopes and expectations formed from the cultivation of the tea plant; and I shall, at some future day, take the opportunity of observing upon what has been done by the Government and the Court of Directors in the improvement of steam navigation in India,—a subject to which Lord Auckland has devoted the most diligent attention, and which opens to the view of India a future of prosperity equal to the anticipations of the most ardent imagination. I mention these circumstances to show that the Government of India has not been negligent of the important duties imposed upon it; and as I hope my Honourable Friend opposite will accept the fair proposition I have made, I do not think it necessary to enter into any debateable subject,—and, indeed, between my Honourable Friends of the Board of Directors and myself there are very few debateable topics; — and I will only add, that I see very many propositions in the petition which the Honourable Baronet has laid before the House the truth of which I desire to see established by Parliament in the most formal manner. With these views, I ask my Honourable Friends to consent to my proposition, as I feel assured that by so doing they will best discharge their duty, not only to those whom they immediately represent, but to that far more numerous body, the one hundred millions of India, whose interests are practically intrusted to their care.

Mr. CHARLES BULLER. — I am anxious, Sir, to follow the Right Honourable Baronet for a few minutes, if it be only for the purpose of impressing on my Honourable Friends the policy of adopting the advice which he has just offered them. The conduct of the Court of Directors, who are the representatives of the Indian population, in thus coming forward for the purpose of applying, on behalf of the millions intrusted to their care, those great principles of free trade which are found of so much benefit wherever they are established, affords one of the most pleasing spectacles — one of the most gratifying scenes — it has ever been my lot to witness. I cannot but think, however, that this motion, in the form in which it is at present proposed, is much too precipitate; as it must be remembered, that before the presentation of the petition on which my Honourable Friend has founded these resolutions, the House has had no notice of what it was that the Court of Directors was about to do or to recommend; whereas that body now comes forward, and calls upon this House to adopt, in a Committee of the whole House, the suggestion for an entire change in the whole system by which the commerce of our Indian empire has been hitherto carried on. Now, Sir, I must confess, that it would be with great difficulty that I could agree to the sudden adoption of these resolutions, however much I may concur in them with reference to the great principles of free trade which they involve, and however much I may be of opinion that we ought not to make any distinction between the principles on which we conduct the commerce of our East Indian and our West Indian possessions. I have heard nothing on the other side of the House (I am now speaking from the Conservative side) that goes against any intention of equalising, on this principle, the sugar duties, or the duties on cotton, or on silk goods; and I must say that it is my opinion that, having, by the system we have adopted towards India, driven the native Indian trade out of the country, and taken calico goods there, we ought no longer to refuse to the natives of British India all the benefits that can be enforced by a free trade, — the only privilege we can give them that will enable them to compete with the trade of British artisans. I have heard nothing, however, favourable to the proposition for an equalisation of the spirit duties; but, at the same time, these questions are all matters of detail; and though the equalisation of the spirit duties may appear to be unobjectionable in theory, yet there may be many objections to it in practice; and it might, perhaps, with some considerable show of justice, be argued that such equalisation would operate seriously against our distilleries, and the manufacture of spirits in this country. I would not, then, be called upon to affirm or negative the resolution relating to this subject in so precipitate a manner; but I would wish to see a Select Committee inquire how far it might be advisable to allow rum to be imported from India into this country. With respect to the resolution regarding Indian tobacco, it should not be forgotten that the taxation with reference to that article is not a restrictive one; as we have been enabled to allow a smaller duty to be laid upon it than upon foreign tobacco in general; and that the effect of East Indian tobacco coming into the market of this country might be to replace Virginia tobacco, by which we should lose a revenue of 3*d*. a pound, — a circumstance that would constitute a most serious objection to this particular proposition. Another of these resolutions relates to Lascars; and I must say, on this head, that while I admit the force of the objection raised by the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, I think he has overlooked the fact that it would bear somewhat hardly on British commerce carried on in British ships in British India. With respect to the resolution regarding the designation of British possessions, it seems to me that it involves a question of very great importance; and I do not see how the Right Honourable Baronet the President of the Board of Control can get over this fact, that, though the territories referred to are British possessions, we have chosen to keep another species of authority in them, saying, in our fiscal arrangements, that they are British possessions, and in our diplomacy, that they are not! If, then, Sir, I am called upon to vote in so precipitate a manner in favour of these resolutions, I must of necessity, under these circumstances, vote against them; but if called upon to vote for a Select Committee to inquire into the different subjects to which they refer, I will certainly do so, inasmuch as I think that my Honourable Friends have very plausible objects with reference to British interests on their side — objects sufficiently important to justify them in bringing these questions under the consideration of Parliament.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I entirely concur, Sir, in the recommendation given by my Honourable Friend who has just sat down, to the Court of Directors. I must express my surprise, however, that at this time of day so strange a principle should for a moment be agitated, as that it should be doubted whether there should be any discussion whether this empire should, or should not, carry on the most extensive trade which it could maintain with its most extensive colony. It appears to me that the only question is, whether, having laid out the immense capital we have upon our Indian empire, we, as the mother country, shall, or shall not, receive some adequate return for this great outlay? and I think it is a disgrace to the House of Commons, that, glorifying ourselves as we do on being a great commercial community, we should debate for a moment the question of whether we should discuss, here, so important a principle as that involved in the present resolutions. With respect to the question of whether the Mysore territory be actually a British possession, or not, we are told that we ought not to encourage the growth of coffee there, because it is not so. But we are trustess for the Mysore territory; and being so, we naturally wish, in that capacity, to put it in the best condition we can. Now, Sir, for my part, I do not see why we should be unable to decide whether Mysore be a British possession, any more than if the question were of Madras, or any other part of our Indian colonies. I was reading, the other day, an account of a conversation between the author of a book on the court and camp of Runjeet Sing and that sovereign, in which it was said, that "20,000, or, at the most, 30,000 British troops could march from one end of India to the other, and no power in the country could stop them;" and I think, such being our power, that if we owe a duty to those parts of India which are subject to our rule, and which are, strictly speaking, our own possessions, we are still more bound to look to the interests of, and to do our duty to, those possessions which, though not actually under our rule, are virtually so—inasmuch as they are kept down by us in a state of subjection and impotence. Our Indian commerce may very properly be said to consist of remittances for the payment of the salaries of our numerous public officers in India; and we are bound in duty to give that empire every facility in our power towards the establishment of a free and unfettered trade. With respect to the Lascars, to whom my Honourable Friend has very properly alluded, it was only in an Act of Parliament of so late a date as 1825, that the provision was inserted, which enacts that they shall no longer be considered as British seamen; and we, therefore, shall only be reverting to our former law, if we grant the prayer of the petition of the Court of Directors, so far as this point is concerned. If our wish be, as it naturally is, to encourage navigation with India, we must do this; and by doing it, our trade will be considerably benefited, and British ship-owners will participate in that which will be a general source of advantage to the whole empire. I entertain a strong objection against one of these resolutions, that which relates to the protection of the Assam trade; and I think that to petition, at present, in favour of that protection, is to mix up matter which is objectionable with much that is most commendable and worthy of support. With regard to the duties on spirits, in my opinion it would be wise for the East India directors to make common cause with the West Indies, and to use all their efforts to bring about a general reduction of the duties on British spirits. This, too, be it recollected, is not a question now, for the first time, introduced into this House, but one which has frequently before been made the subject of discussion here, there having been scarcely a Session in which my Honourable Friends the Members for Wigan or Wolverhampton have not contended that it is high time that these differential duties should be abolished. Let it not, I say, be attempted to be maintained that the House has been, in the least degree, taken by surprise upon this point, for I repeat that the question of putting our East and West Indian commerce on the same footing has often been debated in this House. I agree with my Honourable Friend, that subjects such as that relating to domestic slavery, and some others which have been alluded to, should be altogether excluded from an inquiry of this description; and I trust that this Committee will enter upon its investigation as soon as possible after its appointment, and that it will not be any longer than may be absolutely necessary for preparing its Report; in order that we may have, in the course of the present Session, the result of its inquiries laid before the House — a result which I hope may be favourable to the principle of the establishment of free trade for India, and lead, also, before the expiration of the present Session, to the adoption of measures to insure so desirable an object.

SIR R. JENKINS. — After the cordial support, Sir, which this question has met with on all sides of the House, I can have no objection to alter my motion in the manner suggested by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, and to move for the appointment of a Select Committee, instead of pressing for a Committee of the whole House. I can but add my hope to the wish expressed by the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, that this Committee will speedily commence its inquiries; and I will say no more, at the present moment, than this,—that the chief reason which actuated me in not moving, on the present occasion, for a Select Committee, was, that I was fearful that, by so doing, I should be deferring the consideration of these important matters to a later period than by moving for a Committee of the whole House. With the permission of the House, I will now, therefore, withdraw my motion, and substitute the following in its place: — "That the petition of the East India Company (presented 11th February) be referred to a Select Committee, to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their observations thereupon, to the House."

The motion was agreed to.

SIR R. JENKINS. — I beg to give notice that I will nominate the Committee on Thursday next.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, the motion I now rise to make is, to enable the House to proceed with the Bills before it, after the 1st of June next, in such a manner as to obviate the reproach cast upon us, that we send measures up to the other House of Parliament when there are no Members of it in town to consider them sufficiently. Many Bills to which this House has paid a great deal of attention have been postponed from Session to Session, on that ground of excuse; and as Mondays and Fridays will be occupied in supply by the Government, and Tuesdays will be necessarily devoted to the purpose of furthering many Bills before the House; under these circumstances, I therefore move, " That, after the 1st day of June next, Orders of the Day take precedence of notices of motions on Thursdays."

SIR R. PEEL. — I am not at all disposed to throw any difficulty in the way of the Noble Lord, if, on any particular occasion, he show a special cause for the motion he now proposes; but to make such a motion at the present period of the Session, without such cause being shown, is, I think, to begin rather too early. I can easily see what it will end in. If this motion be agreed to now, it will form a precedent to regulate the business of the House in all future Sessions; and thus Honourable Members will be deprived of an opportunity of bringing forward measures which may be necessary, in their estimation, for the good of the country. As I have already said, on special circumstances being shown, nothing whatever shall prevent my acceding to the motion; but, in this instance, they have not been shown; and the Noble Lord, in a speech of two minutes, calls on us to relinquish a portion of our rights, without the slightest valid reason being assigned for so doing. At this early period, — the 25th of February, — I think the House can hardly decide as to what may come before it; and therefore I think it should not be asked to agree to such a proposition. There will, in my opinion, be a great advantage derived to the House, if the Noble Lord postpone his motion to a later period of the Session, when we shall be in a position to form a better judgment on the subject it involves. But, as I have said, to adopt it, now, would be to establish a precedent for future times; and that which is proposed for June this year may be proposed for May next year, and so on for every year after in a decreasing ratio. Under these circumstances, I think the Noble Lord should at least wait a little longer, — say, for example, till the Easter recess, — until he sees what course the business of the House is likely to take, before he brings on this motion.

Mr. HUME. — The corresponding motion of last year took me by surprise; and I hope that the Noble Lord will be satisfied with converting the present motion into a notice of one. If he do so, it will serve all the purposes of Members and of the Government, — giving the former the opportunity of bringing on their motions in due time, and enabling the latter to go on with the business of the country, — in case they wish to go on with it.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!"]

LORD J. RUSSELL. — If I proposed this motion at a later period, many Honourable Members might say that they had been excluded from bringing forward their motions; and as it occurred to me that no Honourable Member would bring forward any motion after the 1st of June, I did not consider that it would at all interfere with their rights. The Right Honourable Baronet has said that no special circumstances have been shown, and that I should wait till such had arisen; but the Right Honourable Baronet knows as well as I do that they may arise, and do arise, every day. It is quite a common thing, on going into the business of the country, — as, for instance, on motions for going into Committee of Supply, — for Honourable Members to bring forward motions which last two or three hours, thereby depriving the Government, practically, of the power to proceed with it, by occupying so much of the time of the House. For six weeks past, an hour and a half a day has been the average time which the Government have had for the business of the country. I do not agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman that, if this motion be adopted, it will form a precedent for future years; nor do I think that the encroachments which he suggests will ever take place. I must say, however, that something to remedy the present state of things is much needed; and I think, though I feel a great deal of regret at their throwing out our measures, that those objections of the other House have been in some degree reasonable, which have been taken on the ground of their having had to sit for months without getting any Bills from this. It is for that reason that I have proposed this resolution. But if it be considered better that I should postpone it until before the rising of the House at Easter, I can have no objection to bring it forward then, in preference to pressing it now. I will, therefore, withdraw it for the present.

SIR R. PEEL.—I think this is a question entirely affecting the independence of the House of Commons; and I think we should not, under any circumstances, agree to it on light grounds. A Member might have a motion to make, calling in question the conduct of the Government, yet, by the motion of the Noble Lord, he would have his chance of bringing it forward greatly diminished, while the Government would derive, in the same degree, additional impunity. I can, as I have stated, conceive that special circumstances may make it advisable to allow only one day a week for motions, but those circumstances have not been shown in the present case; and I think that, in any case, the House should be extremely cautious how it adopts such a resolution as that proposed by the Noble Lord. I am, however, glad that the Noble Lord has adopted my suggestion with respect to its postponement; and I would further advise the Noble Lord not to bring such a motion forward at any time when, by possibility, any Honourable Member might have it in his power to say that it would intercept any motion he might have to make. The chief ground of my objection to it, however, is, as I have stated, the fear lest it should be drawn into a precedent, and the House of Commons be thereby deprived of a most important right, on the ground of a temporary convenience.

The motion was then withdrawn.

COMMERCE WITH TURKEY.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to move, Sir, pursuant to notice, for "copies of any correspondence with the Foreign Office, or the British authorities in the Levant, as to the continuance of monopolies agreed to be abolished by the treaty of commerce with the Porte; and of any representations made as to the increased duties levied by the said treaty of commerce in the provinces of the Danube, or in Egypt and Syria." Also, for a "comparative statement or Return of the rate of duties levied in the Turkish empire on articles exported and imported by British and Russian subjects under the new treaty and under the old one." Also, for a "Return of the rate of duties levied on imports from and exports to Great Britain in Turkey Proper and in the Turkish provinces of the Danube, and in Syria and Egypt, previously to and since the late treaty of commerce with the Porte." My reason for making this motion is, that while the British nation, as one of the parties to the treaty, is paying 12 per cent. duty on imported articles in these provinces, the Russians, who are not included in it, are paying only the old tariff of 3 per cent. on the same articles. I hope the Noble Lord will not refuse the papers required.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I shall not object to the production of the papers in question; but I warn the Honourable Member that there will be some difficulty in furnishing them, especially as to the amount of the duties hitherto levied. The information, however, shall be as complete as it can be possibly made. At the same time, I think it is only fair to state that the treaty made a change in the whole commercial relations of the Turkish empire, and that it has not yet had time to come into operation in all parts of that empire. Doubts have arisen whether its application to the Danubian provinces would be advantageous to Turkish and British commerce; and a correspondence is at present going on, of which that question is the subject. When it is terminated, the House shall know the result; and if that result shall be satisfactory, there will be no difficulty in applying the treaty to those provinces. With regard to the other provinces, Egypt and Syria, I believe it would be for the benefit of British commerce to apply the treaty to them; and though the same vexatious system does not exist there in respect to inland imports as in those of the Danube, still it is desirable to destroy the monopoly which, in Egypt and Syria, takes their place. The treaty has not been in existence sufficiently long to give it a fair trial; but, at the same time, I have no objection to grant the papers moved for by the Honourable Member.

Motion agreed to, and the papers ordered.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND).

LORD STANLEY. — Sir, although I have no reason to apprehend that any opposition will be made to my submitting to the consideration of this House a plan for removing the great and acknowledged abuses which exist in the system for the registration of voters in Ireland, yet the subject is one of so much importance that I think it will be more respectful to the House, and that it is due to the subject itself, that I should state, very briefly, the principles upon which I intend to proceed, and the main objects which I have had in view, in framing the measure I now move for leave to introduce. In the first place, I will assure the House that my first and principal wish is, that a question of this kind should be discussed without any reference to party feeling, or to the side of the House from which it emanates. It has been my fate to have been so much mixed up with discussions upon matters connected with Ireland, that, if I had followed the dictates of my own judgment, I should rather have wished that this measure should have been brought forward by any other person than myself; and if I have yielded to the opinions and wishes of others, who have pressed me to undertake the task, and who even think that, in so doing, I shall be redeeming a pledge given, or supposed to have been given, by Lord Grey's Government — of which I formed a part — when the Irish Reform Bill was introduced, without any alteration being made in the existing system of registration, I beg the House to believe that I have done so, not with any regard to any party interests or views, either on this side or the other. I cannot but be aware that a measure of this kind, and particularly coming from this side of the House, must be subject to a great deal of scrutiny, and of even, perhaps, unfriendly criticism; and that it must entirely rest its chances of success upon its fairness and usefulness being generally apparent. I do not wish, unnecessarily, to take up the time of the House; but, perhaps, I may be allowed, as succinctly as possible, to describe the difference which exists between the law in England and in Ireland on this subject. In some respects the English Reform Bill and the Irish Reform Bill are differently framed. By the Irish Reform Bill, not a single borough was disfranchised, whilst the English Reform Bill disfranchised no less than thirteen boroughs: the Irish Bill added five Members to the counties, but it took away no Member. With respect to the freehold tenure, the English Reform Bill was a good deal occupied in restricting the forty-shilling freehold tenure; but that subject was not touched by the Irish Reform Bill, as it had been settled, a few years before, by a statute which abolished forty-shilling freeholds. But, as regards the freehold tenure which it allowed, the Irish Reform Bill gave the qualification to those possessing a smaller amount of interest than was named by the English Reform Bill. Then, again, with regard to the polls at elections, it was a great point in the English Bill — and no doubt it has worked well — to have the polls taken in a shorter time than before, and at many places in the counties, instead of at one. There were great doubts prevailing, at the time, as to the expediency of applying that arrangement to Ireland; and many of those doubts may still prevail. Now, I shall say one or two words with respect to registration. Previously to the Reform Bill, there had been no system of registration in England, and therefore it was competent to Parliament, being unfettered by precedents or existing systems, to adopt such a course as it thought most expedient; and it had accordingly framed a system of registration, which, I think, has been very successful. But, with respect to Ireland, the Parliaments of that day had to deal upon a different footing. A law for the registration of freehold tenures has been many years in existence in Ireland, — I believe as far back as the 35th of George III.; and the system has been gradually amended, by subsequent statutes, up to the period of the Reform Bill. Under these circumstances, it was considered by the House advisable to watch the progress and operation of the English Reform Bill in these respects, and not to introduce any wholly new system into Ireland, until it had been seen how it worked in England. But, at the same time, it was announced by Lord Grey's Government that it would watch the operations of these provisions in England, and that, if they were found to work advantageously, it would be the wish of the framers of the measure to practically apply the same provisions to Ireland, as far as possible.

Now, I would beg to submit to the House, as shortly as may be, although somewhat in detail, the points of dissimilarity between the existing systems of registration in England and Ireland; and I will at the same time say to the House, that, in the measure which I now seek to bring in, I propose to confine myself entirely to the subject of registration. I do not propose to deal with the elective franchise, nor with those disputed points of law relating to it, which if I were to attempt to meddle with on the present occasion, I am sure would lead to the delaying, and might, ultimately, prevent the passing, of this Bill. Neither do I intend to offer any provisions with regard to the taking the polls at elections. I shall leave both these questions to be dealt with by the House at any future period it may think proper. To return, then, to the subject of registration. In England, the registration or revision of voters takes place, annually, before barristers selected by the judges of assise, who, previous to making their circuits, fix the places and times at which they shall hold their courts, and call upon all persons within the respective courts to appear, and make out their claims. In the case of counties, it is necessary for persons making a claim for the first time to send in a notice of it, previously, to the overseer of the parish. The overseers in towns, from their general knowledge of the inhabitants, and the clerks of the peace in counties, from the information they receive from the overseers, are then required to publish a list by the 31st of July, which is to be posted on the church door, containing the names of all persons claiming to be registered. This list remains open till the 25th of August. The overseers, in making out these lists, have no discretion, either as to inserting or rejecting any name proposed to them; but are only required to annex to the name against which there may be any objection, the words "objected to;" whereby the person, against whose name those words are affixed, is called upon to come forward and substantiate his claim before the revising barrister. The list of objections made by other parties than overseers then remains public till the 5th of September; and the session of the revising barister's court cannot be held earlier than the 15th of September, nor later than the 15th of October. In Ireland, on the other hand, the registration is not annual, but quarterly; not before barristers appointed by the judges of assize, but the assistant barristers of counties, permanent officers, and who perform that duty in the Sessions' House, and nowhere else, and as part of the ordinary duty of the sessions. The claims are sent in—not, as in England, at least six weeks, and possibly twelve weeks before the revision of the registration, but—only twenty days before the periods for registration, which are four in the year. The clerk of the peace has then to draw out a list, not of each parish or district, but of the whole county or town, and to place it in some conspicuous place ten days before the session. Thus, whilst in England a party has twenty-five days, from the 31st of July to the 25th of August, to examine and object to the claims of his comparatively near neighbours; in Ireland, there are only ten days allowed to wade through the list of the whole county, and see if there be any one to whom he may feel it necessary to object. In England, a voter against whom no objection is made, is not required to appear before the revising barrister; by his not being objected to, his claim is thereby supposed to be admitted, and he remains on the list for twelve months; but, if his name be objected to, he is called upon to defend his title before the revising barrister. In Ireland, on the contrary, the elector who seeks for the first time to be put upon the list of voters is obliged, whether objected to or not, to appear before the Court and produce the deeds of his property, and make oath of his qualification to vote. In England, also, the revising barrister fixes the particular place and time at which particular claims will be taken into consideration. But in Ireland, the claimant has an opportunity of preferring his claim at any quarter sessions, or at any adjourned sessions, without reference to the part of the county in which he resides. I will take the case, then, of a rich person who may have a flaw in his title, or of a poorer person who may have a flaw in his title, but who is supported by a rich man, to whom expense is no object. Such a person could give notice each session twenty days before, and any objecting person in the county may appear at the sessions, perhaps at the distance of fifty or sixty miles from his home, and then the claimant may not appear after all; and this may be repeated time after time, till at last, having tired out the objecting party, the claim, however unjust, must be registered. In England, if a party's name be objected to, he is obliged to come up year after year before the revising barrister, and prove the affirmative of his being qualified. I will not, however, say that this may not lead to great vexation; I think it very probable it might do so, and I think that might well be taken into consideration, with a view to being altered. But in Ireland, the party having once made out his claim, perhaps in the absence of an objector, before the barrister, and verified it by affidavit, receives a certificate, which enables him, during the ensuing eight years, to tender his vote, which must be received without question, examination, or the possibility of rejection by the barrister. But the effect of this certificate does not end here; for I believe it has been ruled, that at the end of that period of eight years, the certificate of registration is still taken as primâ facie evidence of the right of the claimant to vote: thus, the freeholder who may have registered in 1832, would have a primâ facie evidence of that description in 1840, which would, if held good, establish his claim until 1848, and so on, toties quoties, as often as the operation might be renewed. So that these certificates are of the same nature as Exchequer Bills; they are actually transferable securities; and there is nothing whatever to prevent me, if I hold a certificate of this description, from handing it over to another person; or in case of death, there is no check afforded against another party using the certificate, unless that which arises from the holder of the certificate merely making an affidavit that he is the person still in possession. And how, may I ask, can the question be tried in such a case? Only by the operose and expensive proceeding of a Parliamentary Election Committee. There is no other mode of trial; and even an Election Committee may decide that it will not open the question of the registry. But it may be a doubtful case whether the House of Commons has a power, by a resolution of an Election Committee, to alter the registry! The result of all this is, that if a Member, before an Election Committee, were to succeed in striking off a number of false votes which had been given at an election, and if the election were made void, in that case, those votes might be tendered at the next election, without the possibility of the returning officer objecting to it. I understand that the Honourable and Learned Member opposite (Mr. O'Connell) has expressed his regret that I should have brought in this Bill; and I can only say, that of all the Honourable Members in this House I am most surprised at such an observation coming from the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, and for reasons which I shall presently have occasion to state. Now there is another great objection to the present system of registration in Ireland, which is, that when a person re-registers, his name is not cancelled in the list of the former registry; so that a person who registered in 1832 might have had five different certificates of registry since, and have his name entered in five separate lists; and, if he pleased, might hand over those certificates to others, without any check upon such a proceeding, but an investigation before a Committee of the House of Commons. In this way, as it requires but six months' possession to give a qualification to register, it is quite possible that in seven years and a half, which have elapsed since the passing of the Reform Bill, a man might have fifteen different certificates, each for a separate half year.

Mr. D. R. PIGOT. — Show such a case.

LORD STANLEY. — How is it possible that I can be prepared, without any notice, with a case which cannot be of common occurrence? I am merely showing what may take place under the existing state of the law in Ireland; and I challenge Honourable Gentlemen opposite to show that such a case may not happen. And of this I have no doubt, that two or three successive occupiers have held certificates of the right to vote out of the same property. Honourable Gentlemen will not deny that the names of men who have been dead some years have not been cancelled from the register! The county registry, particularly, is a growing mass of confusion and absurdity. It is impossible to draw any inference as to the real number of qualified electors from the number of certificates issued. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has moved, this Session, for the number of electors and inhabitants in each county and city of Ireland, with the view of showing the small number of voters compared to the immense amount of population. Now, I will assist the Honourable and Learned Member by the admission, that the number of electors on the register is much larger than that brought to the poll. It is to rescue the law from the increasing confusion caused by the accumulation of names on the registry for eight years, without any possibility of their being expunged, that I propose an alteration in the existing system, the necessity of which has been universally admitted. I stated that I should refrain from irrelevant topics. I will not go into the abuses which have already arisen. I will not discuss the cases which have been brought under the consideration of the Fictitious Votes Committee; I will not impugn the decisions of any of the revising barristers; I will not say that an extensive system of fraud and perjury prevails at the elections in Ireland; but this I will say, that the law, as it stands, holds out an inducement to fraud, as well as renders it difficult of detection, and induces perjury, by allowing the insertion on the registry of persons who are not bonâ fide electors, in every county and town in Ireland. These abuses and defects have been over and over again recognised and acknowledged, on both sides, in this House. There is no question as to the fact of their existence; and no difference of political views prevents the acknowledgment of that fact. But the first person who took notice of the discrepancy, and proposed the amendment of it, was the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin. On the 19th of April, 1835, he gave notice of a motion to consolidate and amend the law of elections and of registry in Ireland, so as to assimilate it to that of England. That notice stood on the books for some time without being followed up; but on the 11th of August in the same year, Messrs. O'Loghlen and Perrin brought in a Bill, which went through Committee on the 19th, and was sent up to the House of Lords on the 29th of the same month. Of that Bill the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin said,—

> Such an Act as the present is not only beneficial but absolutely necessary. It provides for an annual revision of voters, and gives an appeal both for and against the claimant. I trust, therefore, that the Bill will be allowed to go into Committee, and that the expense and inconvenience of a scrutiny before Election Committees will be thereby avoided.

When, then, such a measure was acknowledged to be not only "beneficial, but absolutely essential," in 1835, I cannot reconcile it to my mind how the Honourable and Learned Member can look with surprise at the conduct of a Member on this side of the House in taking up the question, with the view to legislate, in 1840. In 1836, a Bill was brought in by my Noble Friend (Lord Morpeth), assisted by Mr. O'Loghlen, who was then Attorney General for Ireland; the Bill was very much of the same nature as the last, but though the second reading was assented to without debate, it was postponed day after day throughout the whole Session. In 1838, the Honourable Member for Limerick announced his intention of bringing forward such a Bill, but it was taken out of his hands by Mr. Woulfe, the then Attorney General for Ireland, who stated that the Government would bring it forward: that Bill, however, was, like its predecessor, allowed to drop. It was not until my Honourable Friend the Member for Bandon had threatened to bring in a Bill on the subject, that the Government introduced the Bill: it was printed, but, after various postponements, it was not proceeded with. Last year, again, the Honourable Member for Limerick brought in a Bill, with a great part of the provisions of which I concur, but I am sorry to say that he relinquished it before the end of the Session; and since that time, I heard no more of it. Now, here are successive acknowledgments of the evil; concurrence in all the main features of the proposed remedy; no objection taken to any of the measures which have been introduced from time to time, and no division in any stage of their progress; and yet up to this hour, with a universal assent as to the amount of the abuse and the nature of the remedy, we are precisely in the same state as when the subject was started five years ago. Now, I must say, I think this course is not very creditable to the House of Commons; and, as far as in me lies, I am bent on introducing a measure, the fairness of which shall command the sanction of both sides of the House; a Bill, to which, so far as I am concerned, there shall be no unnecessary delay or postponement; and a Bill which, I hope, with the consent of both parties in this House, will, before the end of the Session, be the law of the land.

Now, having stated what are the evils of the present system, I shall state what is the nature of the measure which I propose for their removal. In the first place, I shall follow the example of every Bill that has been introduced on this subject, and make the registration not quarterly at the sessions, but annually. I hope the House will excuse me if I touch on one point where it is impossible not to deal with the franchise. According to the English law, twelve months' residence is required previous to the registration; but on registration, the right is immediately conferred. In Ireland, six months' residence is requisite; but the claimant is also required to be registered six months before he is enabled to exercise the elective franchise. Suppose I should say that the English usage should be adopted; that would certainly have the advantage of assimilating the law to that of this country; but no doubt that change would create a restriction on the franchise as at present enjoyed in Ireland—for this reason, that the registration being quarterly, no person can be in possession of the qualification for a longer period than fifteen months before he acquires the right to vote. But in England it is no very uncommon case for a man who has come into occupation in November, or in the latter end of September, to be actually kept a claimant for twenty-two months, though the law declares him eligible after twelve months' residence. I hope Honourable Gentlemen will consider my proposal on this point an indication of the fairness of my views on this subject; for though I intend to assimilate the Irish to the English law in one respect, I am not about to curtail the franchise now possessed by the Irish voter. On the other hand, I am not inclined to admit that a bare six months' occupation should confer the right to vote. I think there is a mode of meeting any difficulty which may exist in this respect; and it is an arrangement by which the Irish voter will be placed in a somewhat better position than he at present occupies. I would make the registration annual, and oblige the claimant to prove a six months' occupation; but if he have resided for any period more than six, and less than twelve months, I propose that the revising barrister should affix to his name the period at which his right would accrue, by the expiration of twelve months. The question here arises, before whom should these points be raised? In England, a barrister, appointed by the judge of assize, decides them. That course has been objected to, and I think not without reason, as regards Ireland. Again, it is suggested that a barrister should be nominated for the purpose by the Government. I think that would be placing patronage in the hands of the Government, which would hold out a great temptation to exercise it for political purposes, and give the discharge of important duties to inferior barristers, not permanently attached to the registration, but nominated year after year. There are, at this moment, assistant barristers in every county in Ireland; and I have heard no reason assigned why they should not be invested with the power of deciding these questions at one session, instead of at the quarterly sittings over which they now preside. Whether these barristers are selected from one party or the other, I think the best security for their acting impartially is, the responsibility which they must feel in deciding in the face of their courts and of the public; but I do not propose that they should circulate by a certain rotation throughout the counties: that practice must give rise to a multitude of decisions, and to frivolous claims and appeals. I think it better that the same barrister should permanently preside over the same court. That will secure, in the first place, unanimity of decisions; and, in the next, the fair and impartial exercise of the jurisdiction; and, again, if there should be many appeals from the decision of any barrister, and those decisions were often reversed, the fact could not fail to be noticed by the public; and that would, I think, give an additional security. All who have directed their attention to this subject admit the necessity of an appeal. I do not, however, propose to give an appeal to a tribunal of co-ordinate authority, composed of barristers, but to the judge of assize. I would allow the appeal, too, for and against the vote, on the ground that, as the exercise of their jurisdiction in the former case is at present not found fault with, I see no reason to apprehend any danger from investing the judges with authority in both cases. I propose to follow the provisions of the English Bill, as to the assertion of the claim, with this difference, that the clerk of the peace in Ireland shall perform those duties which are assigned to the overseer in England. I intend that the clerk of the peace shall prepare parochial lists of claimants, and also take a list of objections; and the same mode of publicity can be observed which is now observed, in England. I also propose that, with respect to the appointing of places at which the different sessions shall be held, there shall be an analogous principle to that of the English Bill observed; and that the barrister shall appoint those places for holding the sessions; but that, as a check upon his naming only those towns in which quarter sessions shall be held, it shall be in the power of the Lord Lieutenant in council, on the memorial of the magistrates, to fix upon the places where the registry shall be taken. This, to be sure, is a minor detail; but as the spirit of the Bill depends, in a great measure, upon its details, I feel warranted in trespassing upon the time of the House for the purpose of making its provisions clearly understood. On the first registration, every one was bound to come forward in person and substantiate his claim. There was one exception in favour of persons registering as 50*l.* freeholders. They were entitled to register before the judges in Dublin, or the judges of assize, on a mere affidavit, without any possibility of objection being raised. I do not say that this privilege has been abused; but it may be; and there is nothing, except the affidavit, to prevent a man, without a shilling, going before the court, swearing he is a freeholder, receiving a certificate, and tendering it at the next election. I do not propose to take away this privilege,—not, perhaps, unfitly bestowed,—but I propose that the affidavit shall be registered with the clerk of the peace, that the notice of having taken the affidavit shall be published in the list of claimants, and that he shall be as much open to objection as the most humble freeholder, leaseholder, or householder.

Now, of course, after what I have said, I intend that certificates shall be absolute abolished. I am convinced they can le to nothing but fraud, and that they ho out strong temptations to perjury. I pro pose that the assistant barrister sha have the power of awarding moder costs, either in the case of frivolo claims, or frivolous objections; but, on a appeal to the judge of assize, I do n mean to fetter his discretion as to th amount of the costs. But in what matt are we to deal with persons who hav once established their claim? Shall w say, as in England, that a person objecti ing, year after year, shall have the pow of calling upon the voter to substantia his claim? If personal attendance by t voter to answer such an objection be con sidered a hardship in England, how much more sorely must it be felt in Ireland, where the original examination is far more strict. I propose, then, that, in all cases in which an objection shall be raised to a vote on the registry, the onus of proof shall be on the party impugning the vote; that the presumption shall be in favour of the claimant; and that the objector shall substantiate his own case, negativing the right to vote, under the penalty of costs on his failing to show any reasonable grounds for his opposition. Now, in order to render this practicable, it will be necessary to record the date of the registration; the property out of which a person is registered; the nature of the lease; the period at which the lease will expire, if it be a lease for years,—and, if it be a lease for lives, the name or names of the lives: and I am sure the House will see the necessity of such a provision when the onus of proof rests on the objector. Otherwise, if a leasehold tenant of mine, for instance, were to register, without recording the names of the lives, those lives might fall out; the man might continue a tenant at will, and still retain his qualification, because no opportunity would be afforded to the objector to prove that the qualification had ceased. I propose, in all cases, whether of claim or objection, to give an appeal to the judge of assize, subjected, as I said before, to unlimited costs in frivolous or vexatious cases.

Now, Sir, a question has been raised, whether there shall be any limit as to the nature of the objections, and whether the proof shall be confined entirely to new matter? I have very much considered that question, and I have come to the conclusion that, looking at the restrictions of throwing the onus of proof on the objector, and of giving the assistant barrister a limited, and the judge of assize an unlimited, power of imposing costs,—if I were to restrict the objection to matters arising since the last registration, I should only be perpetuating fraud where fraud has been before committed. Because, supposing it to be true that the first registration was obtained by fraud, the present system is bad enough, for the certificate has the effect of continuing it for eight years; but I am going to make it good for the life of a party, unless it shall be proved bad; and if you debar an objector from proving that a party came fraudulently on the register in the first instance, and it be admitted before the public that there is no power to strike him off, a parliamentary sanction would be given to a wrong for which there is no remedy. I find it impossible, therefore, to accede to the proposition for limitation; and, indeed, Mr. Serjeant O'Loghlen, who introduced that provision into his Bill, expressed himself doubtful as to the propriety of it, and thought it a fit subject for the grave consideration of the House. But looking to the checks which exist in Ireland,—considering that the first examination is more strict than in England, and that there is a right of appeal to the judge of assize,— I am prepared to propose to the House that which I consider a great step, namely, to make the annual registration in Ireland good against any inquiry by the House of Commons, and final for that year. I do not, however, propose to prevent the House of Commons from inquiring into any cases subsequent to the last registration. Not only will that be a great concession in favour of the franchise in Ireland, but it will prevent a great deal of angry feeling, a great deal of vexatious annoyance, a great deal of unnecessary expense, and a great deal of—to say the least—not very creditable litigation before this House. I believe that I have now stated the main provisions of the measure which I propose to introduce. There is only one other point to which I need refer, and that is the mode of dealing with the existing registry. I assume, no doubt, that the present registry is full of fictitious votes. There is no question that a vast number of names are on the registry which have no existence at all; and that many persons were placed there, in the first instance, who had no title to be registered. It has been asked by several Honourable Gentlemen, "Why do not you sweep off, altogether, the existing registry, and require new notices to be given, and all parties to be registered afresh, according to the new system?" Now, I cannot help thinking that that would impose very considerable hardship on those who have substantiated their right to be placed on the register. The man who, three years ago, came forward and subjected himself to a strict examination, would have good reason to complain, if he were called upon again to undergo examination, without reference to his previous examination; therefore, I do not propose to sweep away the whole existing registry. But it has been said, that we may allow it to continue for the period for which parties hold their certificates; and, certainly, that proposition has in it some justice to individuals; but there is this great objection to it, that it would continue, for a long period, the gross errors which abound in the existing registry. The course which I propose to pursue, and in the propriety of which I hope to have the concurrence of the House, is — to place the registry, as it stands at present, precisely on the same footing as a registry framed under the proposed Bill would stand at this time next year; that is to say, I would consider the present register as valid, as that of 1840, but liable, in 1840, to objection in all its parts, precisely as if the party had substantiated his claim under the new Bill. I believe I have now stated the principal provisions; nay, even almost all the details, of the Bill which I propose to introduce; and I trust I have done so without any manifestation of party feeling. I hope that Honourable Members will consider that I have no personal interest to serve, and that my only object is, to remedy the abuses which exist, by a fair and impartial measure. I am quite ready to listen, now, or at any future time, to the arguments and suggestions of Honourable Gentlemen on both sides of the House; and if I should be permitted to go into the details of the measure, I can assure Honourable Gentlemen, so far as they go along with me in the legitimate object of my measure, — that of providing an impartial and satisfactory remedy for the evils of the present system of registration in Ireland, — that their arguments and criticisms shall receive from me an equal degree of impartial attention, and an equal amount of respectful consideration. I now beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to the registration of voters in Ireland.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I do not rise for the purpose of offering any opposition to the motion which my Noble Friend has submitted to the House, for there was nothing in the tone and temper of the speech which my Noble Friend has just delivered to which I, or any other Honourable Member on this side of the House, can justly take exception. I quite admit the fault, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, of not carrying legislation upon this subject into effect. My Noble Friend has accurately given the history of the several steps which have been taken on this subject, beginning with 1835, when the present Master of the Rolls in Ireland, then holding the office of Attorney General, introduced his Bill for amending the system of registration in Ireland. That Bill was sent up to the House of Lords, where, after a very brief consideration, it was rejected. Another Bill, the provisions of which were very similar, was introduced by the same Right Honourable Gentleman in the subsequent Session of 1836. It is quite true that that Bill did not pass through many stages in this House; but at that time we had no reason to believe that it would meet with a different fate from that of its predecessor. If we had persisted in forcing that Bill through the House, or in introducing another Bill in a subsequent Session, we should have exposed ourselves to the accusation sometimes directed against us by Honourable Gentlemen opposite, that we were bringing forward measures for the mere purpose of their being rejected by the House of Lords; that we were making a mere mockery of legislation; and that we were adopting the course, imputed to us in a recent debate, of undertaking measures without the hope of carrying them through. In 1838, as my Noble Friend has accurately remarked, the present Lord Chief Baron of Ireland, then filling the situation of Attorney General, introduced a Bill with somewhat different provisions. It is likewise true that that Bill was not carried through this House; but enough transpired, after its introduction, to show—that there was no chance of its receiving the support of both sides of the House, or of the House being able to pass a Bill likely to conciliate the favour of the other branch of the Legislature: and if we had brought in that Bill in a subsequent Session, we should, again, have been liable to the imputation of introducing measures without the hope of carrying them. That feeling, however, does not apper to me to have been confined to this side of the House, alone. The Honourable and Learned Serjeant, the Member for Bandon, in the same Session, obtained leave to introduce a Bill for the same purpose; but he did not attempt to carry that Bill through; for the last stage, I believe, was the motion for the recommittal of the Bill, with a view to its being printed, in order that it might be made more perfect in its details. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman gave notice, in 1839, of his intention to introduce another Bill on the same subject; and we, of course, expected that it would be proceeded with, after what had taken place in the preceding Session; but that Bill never made its appearance at all. It is obvious, therefore, that, however alive the Honourable and Learned Gentleman may have been to the abuses of the present system, he considered it no easy matter to pass a measure calculated to remove them: and precisely the same fact has been made manifest in this country; for in every Session of Parliament since the accession of the present Ministry to office, Bills have been brought forward to amend the system of registration. True it is, with respect to those Bills, that though they involved changes far less considerable than those contemplated by the present measure, in no one instance were the two Houses of Parliament brought to anything like an agreement on the subject. Considering what appeared to be the difficulty — I may term it the hopelessness — of bringing forward a measure which should secure the joint assent of the two great parties in this country, or of the two Houses of Parliament, — considering that plans for the amendment of the system of registration, both in England and Scotland, are still under deliberation, and that it might be possible — and, if it were so, it would be in the highest degree desirable — to bring forward a joint system for the three countries, under some uniform and united plan, — considering also, with respect to Ireland, alone, we should be able to come to a conclusion with greater facility, after the practical bearing of the valuation under the Poor Law Act should be ascertained; — considering all these things, we felt that it would be more judicious to suspend the introduction of any measure upon the subject, with a view to the soundness, success, and permanence of the measure itself. But the Noble Lord, willing for once to merge the character of "obstructor" into that of "constrûctor," steps forward on this occasion, and tenders his aid to solve the difficulties which exist, offering himself as a sort of mediator. I can assure the Noble Lord that his interposition shall be met with the most perfect respect; but whether it will be received with full confidence is another question. Of the Noble Lord's great talents; of his power to solve the difficulties of the present or of any other question, no possible doubt can be entertained. Whether the Noble Lord be perfectly unbiassed, — whether he may not feel that he has some scores to pay off with the present constituent body of Ireland, — is a matter which will, probably, be best understood when we have had the opportunity not only of deliberately weighing the provisions of the Bill which he has fully and candidly developed to the House, but also when we can ascertain the manner in which he proposes to work out the details, which cannot be done until the printed Bill is before the House. Until that time, I should have been content to defer my observations (reserving, of course, the right to form my own judgment upon the tendency, scope, and principle of the measure), had it not been for one consideration, to which I wish for a moment to advert.

It may be in the remembrance of the House, that in the course of last Session a motion was brought forward by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Dublin for leave to bring in a Bill for the purpose of altering the franchise of Ireland, and assimilating it to that of England. Besides the general abstract principle of assimilating and identifying the rights and privileges of the people of the two countries, to which, as an abstract question, the present Government have always professed themselves friendly, the Honourable and Learned Gentleman brought forward many forcible statements, and cited many striking instances, of the disproportion between the number of voters in the two countries — a disproportion which the Noble Lord has admitted to exist to a greater extent than can be accounted for by the difference in the relative wealth of the two countries. The motion for leave to bring in that Bill I met with a direct negative. I hope I did so without discourtesy — indeed, I know that it has been made a subject of complaint against me, that my mode of conducting the opposition was too courteous; but I could not deny the force of some of the statements of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, nor could I contravene the logic of his arithmetical proportions, as he stated them to the House. I observed, on that occasion, that after we had effected a great adjustment of the electoral law of the three countries, — after that question had caused great agitation and excitement throughout the empire, and had been fully considered in Parliament, — we felt it would be inexpedient, in so short a time, to break in upon that settlement, or to introduce any more fundamental changes. The Government are still prepared to adopt the same course, and to act in the same spirit. But I wish it to be distinctly understood, that if, notwithstanding the urgent remonstrances addressed to us by the great bulk of the people of Ireland who honour us with a generous confidence, — (and if the confidence of the people of Ireland is to be reckoned a disparagement to us, may we never exchange our destiny with the party on the opposite side!) — if, notwithstanding the representations which are made to us by the great proportion of the Irish Members who give us their support in this House; — if, notwithstanding the force which rested in the arguments and the arithmetical and statistical statements of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin; — if, notwithstanding all this, we do refuse our assent to such an assimilation and extension of the franchise as they require at our hands, because we think it inexpedient to alter the present law of the existing arrangements in any of the countries affected by the Reform Bill; so, on the other hand, we are not prepared to alter the present system, if we think the scope and tendency of that alteration will be to limit, control, impede, or obstruct,— to use the favourite word of the Noble Lord,— beyond due bounds, and proper and just limits, — that confined franchise which the Irish people have received at the hands of the Noble Lord. There are some topics in the speech of the Noble Lord which may invite discussion; but upon them I will reserve my observations until the measure comes under consideration, when we shall have to make up our minds as to the course that it will be most desirable to pursue. I have thought it candid, both to my Noble Friend and the House, to state, while I do not withhold my consent to the motion for leave to bring in the Bill, that whatever may be the ingenuity with which that Bill may be framed, — whatever may be the plausible ground upon which it rests, or whatever may be the collateral advantages which it offers, if I consider its tendency and scope calculated to narrow and obstruct the legitimate franchise of the Irish people, and their electoral rights, I shall consider myself warranted in offering my most decided opposition to the further progress of the measure. I have now only to add, with respect to the motion before the House, that I do not purpose to offer any obstruction to the Noble Lord in bringing in his Bill, and submitting it, in its finished state, to the House.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I am exceedingly happy to find that the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland does not intend to offer any opposition to the motion of the Noble Lord who has asked permission of the House to bring in his Bill; and I am also happy to find that the Noble Lord has pledged himself and those acting with him, to give this Bill a fair and candid consideration. That is all that my Noble Friend asks the House to give. I have risen on this occasion, because the Noble Lord who has just resumed his seat has done me the honour to refer to my conduct on this subject, — the importance of which has been admitted by Honourable Members on both sides of the House. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin was the first to complain of the state of the law affecting the registration; and he gave notice that he would move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend it. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman, however, for reasons on which I will not speculate, never brought forward any motion in pursuance of that notice; and the subject dropped for a time. In 1835, however, Mr. Justice Perrin, then Attorney General for Ireland, brought in a Bill for the purpose of amending the system of registration, which went through the House between the 20th and the 29th of August in that year. Having stated that circumstance, I must say that the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland has not dealt fairly and candidly with the other House of Parliament, for having thrown out that Bill. It did not go to the House of Lords till the 29th of August; and it was impossible for that House to consider its provisions during the short remainder of the Session. It has been too much the practice, in every year, to send up to the House of Lords a great quantity of Bills at the end of a Session, having till then given them scarcely anything to do. I therefore think the other House ought not to be blamed for not applying themselves to the consideration of Bills sent up under such circumstances; and I cannot consider that any disrespect was meant to this House by postponing such Bills to another Session. In 1836, a similar Bill was introduced in the House of Commons; but after it had passed through some stages, the Right Honourable Gentleman who brought it forward himself moved that it should be taken into consideration that day three months. In 1837, no attempt whatever was made by Her Majesty's Government to redress the grievance which they acknowledged to exist. In 1838, when my Right Honourable Friend, the present Chief Baron in Ireland, was Attorney General, I inquired whether it was his intention to bring forward any measure on the subject; and my Right Honourable Friend said that such was his intention. A great part of the Session, however, passed over without any motion being made on the subject by my Right Honourable Friend; and under these circumstances, I gave notice of my intention to move for leave to bring in a Bill. My Right Honourable Friend then obtained leave to bring in his Bill. A considerable time elapsed without the House hearing anything more on the subject; and I then obtained permission to bring in a Bill, which I introduced. My sole object was to produce a measure which would be satisfactory to both sides of the House, and which would place the constituency of Ireland on a sound footing; — and that I believe to be the intention of the Noble Lord on the present occasion. The Bill which I brought in was founded, to a great extent, on those which had previously been before the House; and I was anxious to make it as perfect as possible. That Bill was printed; and during the long vacation which followed the Session of 1838, I took all the pains I could to get it circulated in Ireland. In 1839, I again asked leave to bring in the Bill, which not only related to the registration of voters, but altered the mode of taking the polls in Ireland. My reason for not proceeding with it was, not because the subject was one which I did not feel to be important, but because the machinery which I had intended to adopt, which was provided by the Poor Law Act, was not then complete. I am glad to find that my Noble Friend has now taken up the subject; because there is no man more competent to deal with it. The Noble Lord was the Minister who brought in the Irish Reform Bill, professing, at the time, that so far as the registration was concerned, it was merely an experiment, which was to be continued only until the working of the new registration system in England, under the Reform Bill, could be ascertained. Before I sit down, I cannot but express my regret that the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland departed from the spirit in which he opened his address, by making use of some rather taunting expressions; and I certainly was surprised at his concluding sarcastic observations on the remarks made by the Noble Lord near me (Lord Stanley), in the course of the debate a few nights ago, more particularly after he had been once before set right on this point. My Noble Friend did not state that he would make it "his business to obstruct the measures" of the Government. What my Noble Friend said was, that Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House would suggest good measures, and "obstruct" such as they apprehended would be detrimental to the interests of the country. The Noble Lord, perhaps, did not distinctly hear my Noble Friend, — the debate was an anxious one; and I have no doubt that the Noble Lord felt considerable solicitude about the event of it; but it is not fair to go back to that debate for the purpose of bringing an unfounded charge against my Noble Friend. Having stated the humble part which I have taken in this matter on former occasions, I will not longer detain the House, except to say, that I am quite satisfied that my Noble Friend is actuated by the purest motives, and that the Bill which he now seeks to introduce will bear the closest investigation.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I certainly did not intend to give any offence to the Noble Lord when I expressed my regret that he should have brought this measure forward; but I must be allowed to say, that the general feeling of the people of Ireland is, that the Noble Lord is the last person in the world who, from his principles and conduct towards Ireland, ought to have meddled in this matter. The principle of the Noble Lord's political conduct has been to limit and restrict, as much as possible, the franchise of the people of Ireland. The Noble Lord brought in the Irish Reform Bill on that principle. I contended with him on the subject out of the House, and before the Cabinet, foot to foot; but when the Noble Lord could not overcome my reasoning, he succeeded in outvoting me. The Noble Lord had an influence in the Cabinet exceedingly deleterious to Ireland; and he succeeded in giving to that country a franchise which is admitted to be inferior in extent to that bestowed on England.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

If that be not admitted, it cannot be successfully controverted. Let the House look at the result. Even with the exaggerated register of 1832, when there was scarcely any contest against the registration, Ireland had not the franchise for 5 per cent. of her population, while England had it for 19 per cent.; and in the agricultural districts in Ireland not 2 per cent. of the population possess the franchise. And shall we be told that England and Ireland are equal in this respect? The people of Ireland know that the fact is not so; and they attribute that defect to the Noble Lord; and even if he should be disposed to bring forward a good measure, it would lose its grace and power to the people of Ireland by being transmitted through the Noble Lord. I am not surprised that he should have been urged to undertake the task by Honourable Gentlemen opposite; because, unrivalled as are his talents in debate, and unequivocal as his zeal is for the restriction of the franchise, he must have been quite a Godsend to those who wish to limit the franchise as much as possible. The instant his ingenious and artful speech, full of admissions and concessions that cannot serve the people, arrives in Ireland, they will at once perceive that no good can come from a measure which has the Noble

Lord for its proposer; and they will be convinced that it proceeds from the party that began the reformed Parliament by giving them the Coercion Bill. I am not now going to enter into the details of the Bill; but its principle is vexation, expense, and trouble. Is the Noble Lord aware that the Conservative party in Ireland — I will not call them "Orange," now — are in the habit of employing both counsel and attorneys to oppose the registration of Liberal voters at every registry? They have regular paid swearers, to beat down the franchise; there is a staff of them in every county; and the landlords are constantly attempting to prevent their tenants from registering. These facts are well known; and I implore every man who is disposed to act in a conciliatory manner towards Ireland, seriously to consider such a state of things. Every opposition is given to the voters in the Liberal interest; and persons acting in the capacity of magistrates condescend to receive the wages of their testimony in this respect. They sit on the bench with the assistant barrister, whispering to him one moment, and swearing, at the next; and if the decision should be against the unfortunate peasant, he is very apt to conclude that it is not on the merits. Every attempt is made to keep documents from the claimant, who has no process by which he can enforce the attendance of witnesses. If his lease should happen to be at all eligible, the landlord or agent refuses to produce it for him. Every impediment is thrown in the way of the poor voter; he is examined on oath; cross-examined hour after hour; and speeches are made to overthrow what he has sworn on oath, and to force him to contradict himself. If the landlord be a Conservative, all this is a matter of course; if the landlord be a Liberal, in nine instances out of ten, or at least in the greater number of cases, the agent is a Conservative. In my own county, Lord Monteagle's agent is as ready to oppose the registration of his Lordship's tenantry as the most decided Conservative can be; and Lord Listowell's agent acts in the same manner. In fact, it is almost the general rule. The claimant has first to go through this ordeal at the sessions; and then, if the assistant barrister decides in his favour, an appeal to the assizes is open to the objector; where the unfortunate voter has to encounter all this formidable array of opposition a second time. But is that all? The Conservative landlord endeavours to intimidate him from coming up to the registry in the first instance, and to prevent him from availing himself of the second opportunity to press his claim at the assizes. The agent also intimidates him on both occasions; and, at the risk almost of ruin, the tenant is obliged to stand the two ordeals, which are forced upon him in order to accumulate and double the evils of intimidation.

The Noble Lord has talked with great seeming regret of the trouble to which the voter is subjected by having to travel thirty or forty miles to the sessions. Why, the voter will have first to go to the sessions, and then he will have to go fifty or sixty miles to the assizes, where he will have to wait, Heaven knows how long, while all the engines of intimidation are in motion against him; and year after year he will have to face the same difficulties. If the Noble Lord had asked leave to bring in a stifling or gagging Bill, for preventing the voter from obtaining the franchise, except by consent of his landlord, his measure would have been an excellent one, because it would have exactly answered its title. I sincerely trust that this Bill, if persevered in, will not succeed; and I know no means of stopping its progress to which I shall not think myself justified in resorting. I thank the Noble Lord opposite for the word "obstruct;" the Noble Lord has taught us that policy; although the Learned Serjeant has declared that he is no obstructor, I contend that this is a measure which every friend to the rights of the people of Ireland ought to join in obstructing. The Noble Lord may say that he benefits the voter by not calling on the registered elector, in the second year, to prove his case. But does not the Noble Lord know that he will be compelled to prove it? One of the hired swearers will come forward and say, "I have examined the voter's land since last year, and I now swear that it is worth 5*l*. less than I swore to last year." And if one of the swearers have any scruple in contradicting himself, there will be no difficulty in getting another swearer for the same price as the first. Am I upholding the present system of registration in Ireland? No such thing. I know that it has great evils; but the people have worked themselves out a certain degree of freedom under it; and, while I desire to alter it, in order that its operation may be made more unembarrassed, I would still adhere to it in preference to the Noble Lord's Bill, especially as that Bill has not a proper basis. Every other Bill that has been introduced on the subject of the elective franchise in Ireland has been favourable to the free exercise of the franchise by all who are rightfully entitled to it, and has explained the original Act in a manner consonant with that view. Even the Learned Serjeant's Bill contained a clause, which, if it had passed, would have been a really useful and beneficial enactment, and would have worked well. But the Noble Lord stands alone; he rejects everything that would favour the franchise, and introduces nothing but what will have a tendency to annihilate it. Why has not the Noble Lord introduced a Bill for the improvement of the English registration? Will Honourable Members say that the English system is at all perfect, or that it gives satisfaction to the people? I cannot but express my regret that the Noble Lord has not applied his great talents to the preparation of a Bill for the amendment of the registration law in England, instead of venturing a new secretaryship for Ireland, and crossing the Channel in order to destroy the franchise which at present exists. I wish the Noble Lord's friends had persuaded him to try his maiden hand on England or on Scotland, where, no doubt, he would have found ample employment.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

I am not surprised at the readiness with which that suggestion is disclaimed. A really good Bill would assimilate the registration in the three countries. In Ireland, you should begin with placing the people on an equality with those in England, by giving them the same franchise; and this is what I urged in vain during the discussions on the Reform Bill. According to the Treaty of Union, the people of Ireland are entitled to an equality in the franchise; but the Noble Lord himself admits that the Irish franchise is not equivalent to that in England. The Noble Lord seems to treat the affidavits of the people of Ireland very lightly.

LORD STANLEY. — At least, I did not talk of "paid swearers."

Mr. O'CONNELL. — No; but the Noble Lord talked of "volunteer perjurers." The Noble Lord certainly did not use the word; but he used the thing. I will not accuse the Noble Lord of any more hostile purpose than that of restricting the franchise. All that the Noble Lord did not deprive the Irish people of, at the time of the Reform Bill, he will succeed in depriving them of by this Bill. The Noble Lord has complained of the Irish law being defective in this respect, that the Committees of the House have not the power to strike off Irish voters from the register. I always considered that circumstance to be a mitigation of those Committees, which now stand condemned by the universal sentence of the House. When I, on a former occasion, talked of perjury in connection with those Committees, I was reprimanded for it; but, without going so far as to accuse them of perjury, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has shown how little those Committees are entitled to the confidence of the public; he having annihilated them, and replaced them by other tribunals; though I very much fear that the new Committees will not be more satisfactory, from the specimens we have already had of the spirit of compromise prevailing in them, which is entirely opposed to anything like generous confidence on either side. I will not divide the House at this stage of the Bill, as the Noble Lord below me has conceded the first reading, and there is no distinct reason why we should refuse it; but in every other stage it shall have the most decided opposition that I can possibly give it. No friend to popular rights ought to rest satisfied until some attempt be made to place the franchise on a proper footing, by introducing a Bill containing, at least, a definition of what constitutes the franchise, so as to put an end to the vexatious questions now continually arising. There is one provision in the Bill to which I have a very strong objection, and that is the appeal to the judges. I believe the Noble Lord himself does not imagine that there are many judges in Ireland in whose hands the people will be inclined to place the ultimate disposal of the franchise. I am sure that that part of the Bill will meet the universal reprobation of the people of Ireland. On the whole, it appears to me that the proposed Bill is not likely to secure, as it pretends to do, a fair investigation of the claimant's right to vote; but that it is calculated to introduce such vexatious details as will be inconsistent with the situation of the tenantry in Ireland; that it will be ruinous to them in point of expense and time, inasmuch as it will bring them twice, every year, under the lash of their landlord, and will expose them to such merciless intimidation as to annihilate the elective franchise. Certainly the situation of the Irish people ought to have excited commiseration, rather than resentment, in the breast of the Noble Lord; for he left them so little of the franchise in his Reform Bill, that it is hardly worth while, now, to endeavour to extinguish the remainder.

LORD STANLEY. — Sir, although I have been somewhat disappointed at the manner in which the Bill has been received by the Honourable and Learned Member for the city of Dublin, and in some respects by my Noble Friend the Secretary for Ireland, yet the observations of the Honourable and Learned Member shall not make me depart for a moment from that deliberate line of argument and calm discussion to which I determined to confine myself in bringing forward this Bill; and in which I intend to persevere. I was, indeed, apprehensive that there might be objections arising from the political part which I have taken in opposition to the other side of the House, on Irish questions; and I am sorry to say that I was confirmed in that anticipation by finding that an association, designating themselves as the Loyal Registry Association of Dublin, had — of course without any concert between the parties — shown exactly the same spirit, and announced the same hostility, even before I moved for leave to bring in the Bill, as the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has now done, having agreed that instructions should be sent to all the "Liberal" Members for Ireland to oppose the measure,— whatever its provisions might be.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

For an assembly, calling itself a deliberative body, and assuming, under the guidance of the Honourable and Learned Member opposite, to direct the judgment of the people of Ireland, I must say that a more absurd resolution, or one which more clearly shows its supporters to be utterly unworthy of the confidence of any one class of the community, never yet was passed; and I trust that the Liberal Members of the House will show that they have, at least, more "liberality" of feeling than to be guided by such blind leaders, and will not take the instructions given to them by such unreflecting politicians, but will fairly consider the merits of the question. I do not intend to notice the imputations which the Honourable Member for Dublin has cast upon me, in attributing to me motives by which I am not actuated; but there was one part of the Honourable Member's statement which it is impossible for me to pass over in silence. The Honourable and Learned Member has repeated, over and over again, that by the Reform Bill there was given to Ireland a franchise infinitely more cramped and restricted than that which was given to England; and that I was the author of the plan! Now, I meet the Honourable and Learned Member with a flat, direct denial of the fact; and with an assertion, which I will prove, that the franchise in Ireland, as settled by the Irish Reform Bill, is more extensive, and not less extensive, than the corresponding franchise given to England. I do not refer to the case of the 40*s*. freeholders; I have already stated that that question was settled some few years before, and was not at all disturbed by the Reform Act. The English Reform Bill restricted the 40*s*. freehold franchise, but did not abolish it; the Irish Bill did not interfere in any way whatever with freehold occupation, but left it as it had been previously established in Ireland. The Irish and English Bills both added a leasehold constituency to the freehold constituency, which had formerly prevailed. What, then, is the tenure of leasehold property required to entitle to a vote? There are three several classes of leasehold voters. In England, the franchise is given to the lessee or assign entitled to any lands or tenements for the term originally of sixty years, of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l*. over and above all charges. The corresponding provision with regard to Ireland is the lessee or assign of any term originally not less than sixty years, having a beneficial interest therein of the clear yearly value of 10*l*. arising out of it. The words originally introduced were the same as in the English Bill, but they were altered — with the consent of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman himself! The second description of voters, under leasehold tenure in England, must hold property for a term of not less than twenty years, of the clear yearly value of 50*l*. over and above all rent charges. In Ireland, the second class is composed of those who hold property for not less than fourteen years, having a beneficial interest of 20*l*. There is no lower term of years in England, excepting tenants-at-will, the voters under which must pay a rent of 50*l*. But there is another leasehold qualification in Ireland, to which there is no parallel in England. The franchise is given to a class of Irish tenants holding property for a term of twenty years, with a beneficial interest of not less than 10*l*. to the person entitled to occupy. That is the plain, simple comparison of the franchises given by the Reform Bill to England and Ireland; and I defy the Honourable and Learned Member to prove that the Irish franchise, on what I have stated to be its present conditions, is more restricted than the English.

The Honourable and Learned Member has urged that the Irish constituency is smaller, in proportion to the population, than that of England; but that is no argument whatever in regard to the amount of the franchise. I say that the Irish Bill requires a shorter and not a longer term, a smaller and not a greater interest; and if in Ireland there is a smaller proportion possessing the smaller interest than the proportion possessing a greater in England, that is no ground for charging the authors of the Irish Reform Bill (which, like the English Bill, is founded on the basis, not of numbers, but of property) with giving a more restricted franchise to the one country than they have conferred on the other. With respect to the household franchise, there is no difference, and there was intended to be none, between the English and Irish Bills, except that the English Bill requires all rates due on the 1st of July to be paid on the 6th of April previous; while the Irish Bill requires all rates to be paid except such as were due for the period of six months next preceding the day of registration. I defy the Honourable and Learned Member to shake those facts, or to make out any shadow of foundation for his assertion, that the Irish franchise is more restricted than the English. The Honourable and Learned Member says that I wish to introduce needless expense and vexation in compelling persons to submit to an examination, and in giving an appeal to the judges, remarking, that there are not many Irish judges who have the confidence of the country. I was sorry to hear such language from the Honourable and Learned Member, and I must protest against the justice of such a reflection. I have as much confidence in the decisions of Chief Justice Perrin, Chief Baron Woulfe, and Baron O'Loghlen, as in those of any of the judges; and I must observe, that it is most injurious to the character of those learned persons, that such allegations should be thrown out against them by the Honourable and Learned Member, merely because he differs in opinion with them. But that this objection should now come from the Honourable and Learned Member is really surprising, when he gave the sanction of his authority to the Bill introduced by Mr. Perrin, in 1835, for the amendment of the registration. After speaking of the evils which arose from the uncertainty previously arising from the conflicting decisions of assistant barristers, the Honourable Member said, —

> This Bill is calculated to put an end to all this, by making the vote of every party conclusive for twelve months, with an appeal to the judges; and as its principle has been approved of by Honourable Gentlemen opposite, I trust it will be allowed to go into Committee.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, when I asserted that the Irish franchise was more restricted than the English, my meaning was, that the Irish Reform Bill, not going so far as to restore the same franchise which was continued in England, — the freehold franchise, — was by that means infinitely short of the Reform Bill, taken altogether, in England.

LORD STANLEY. — Then, Sir, I have the Honourable Member's admission of the fact, that, setting the freehold franchise aside, the qualification of the leaseholders and householders is at least as extensive in the Irish Bill as in the English. I have proved, indeed, that it is more so.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, I only beg to be understood as not admitting that.

Motion agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by Lord Stanley, Lord Granville Somerset, and Mr. Emerson Tennent.

REGISTERED ELECTORS.

Mr. HUME. — As I do not anticipate any objection to the production of the Returns for which I intend to move, I will, without further observation, propose, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to give directions, that there be laid before this House, Returns of the number of electors on the register for each county of England and Wales for the year 1839-40; and distinguishing, in classes, the number registered, as freeholders, copyholders, leaseholders, occupying tenants at 50*l.* a-year rent and upwards, or as holding qualifications of a similar nature; together with an abstract of the numbers of each class, showing the increase or decrease in number under each separate head, since the Returns of the registered voters at the general election in 1835 (as given in Parliamentary Papers No. 199. and 227. of 1836):

Of the number of electors on the register for each city, town, or borough, in England and Wales, for the year 1839-40; and distinguishing, in classes, the numbers registered in each place as 10*l.* occupiers, and the numbers registered under the old qualifications reserved by the Reform Act; specifying what such qualifications are in each, and whether the party possessed the old and the new franchise; together with an abstract of the numbers of each class, and of the whole; showing (as above) the increase and decrease since 1835:

Of the number of electors on the register for each county in Scotland, for the year, from July, 1839, to July, 1840, showing, in columns, those transferred from the old roll of freeholders to the new roll, the 10*l.* life rent, and those enrolled on the different qualifications of property or lease; distinguishing in each class those enrolled as life-renters, and those enrolled as a joint qualification, showing a comparison of the increase or decrease since 1835:

Of the number of electors on the register in each city or burgh returning or contributing to return a Member or Members to serve in Parliament, in classes of burghs, for the year 1840, showing, in columns, the number of owners and occupiers, joint owners, and joint occupiers; together with an abstract of the number of each class, and of the whole; showing also a comparison of the increase or decrease since 1835:

Of the number of electors on the register for each county of Ireland, qualified to vote at any election which may take place before the 1st day of January, 1841; and distinguishing, in classes, the numbers registered under the different qualifications, in each county; together with an abstract of the number of each class, and of the whole; showing also a comparison of the increase or decrease since 1835:

Of the number of electors on the register for the year, qualified to vote at any election which may take place before the 1st day of January, 1841, in each city, town, and borough of Ireland; and distinguishing the numbers in each place registered under the old qualifications, specifying what such qualifications are in each, reserved by the Reform Act, and the numbers registered under the new qualifications admitted by the Reform Act; together with an abstract of the number of each class, and of the whole; showing also a comparison of the increase or decrease since 1835."

The motion having been seconded, —

LORD ELIOT said: — I shall certainly object to the motion of the Honourable Member in its present form, because I consider that it will be productive of great trouble and expense. It may be supposed that the Returns now moved for are similar to those ordered in 1836, which are alluded to in the first paragraph; but that is not the fact; because the present motion is not merely for Returns of the number of electors, but for the classification of them also. This will impose great labour upon the clerks of the peace of the several counties; and it cannot be supposed that they are to perform such great extra labour without remuneration. Is it the intention of the Honourable Member that the respective counties shall pay the expense of getting up these Returns? If so, although I do not object to the information, I must decidedly object to that mode of defraying the cost of obtaining it. Unless, therefore, the Honourable Member can show that the expense will not fall upon the counties, I shall be inclined to oppose the motion.

MR. HUME. — Sir, it is perfectly true that the Noble Lord will not find the Returns of 1836 made in the same words as the present motion, because the wording of this has been amended, in order to make it more comprehensive. The former Returns were defective, and I wish to obtain complete ones. All the trouble that will be imposed upon the clerks of the peace will be, merely to count up the numbers of voters in each printed register, and to select from each page a statement of how many freeholders, copyholders, leaseholders, and occupying tenants there are. If the order be sent out from the Home Office, I hope a prepared table, to be filled up under heads, will accompany that order. This information is of such importance, that if the individuals furnishing it cannot be remunerated in any other manner, I am certain the House will not hesitate to vote a sum for that purpose.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — I admit that the information sought by the motion of the Honourable Member may not be unacceptable; but I wish to know in what way the Government will set to work in order to obtain it? I presume application will be made to the clerks of the peace in the different boroughs; but I very much doubt the power of enforcing these Returns. Although some payments of this kind may have been made by counties, other clerks of the peace have been unable to procure any compensation for similar work. I very much doubt whether this be a legal charge on the county. If the Noble Lord opposite has any means of remunerating those individuals, he perhaps will give the House some information on the subject. I wish the Honourable Member to pause until that point be settled.

Mr. SHAW.—Great complaints have been made by the clerks of the peace in Ireland of the trouble and expense to which they have been put in making out Returns similar to those now moved for by the Honourable Member. They have been unable, in many instances, to procure remuneration; and I believe that a charge of this kind ought not to be made on counties.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—Sir, the clerks of the peace are compelled to prepare printed lists of the persons entitled to vote, a copy of which any person can procure for a shilling. The labour and expense of compiling the Return asked for from those lists will therefore be very trifling.

COLONEL PERCEVAL.—The lists referred to by the Honourable and Learned Member contain a number of claimants, and are continually undergoing such changes as will render them comparatively useless for the purpose of making up any Return.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—I beg to inform the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman that the list of voters is one quite distinct from the list of claimants.

Mr. ESTCOURT.—I trust, Sir, that the Honourable Gentleman will not think of imposing this additional labour on the clerks of the peace without devising some means for their remuneration. I think the Honourable Member would obtain the information which he seeks much more effectually through the Home Office; and I hope that he will either suspend his motion altogether, or bring it forward in a different shape.

Mr. TATTON EGERTON.—I must also enter my protest against the motion, on the ground of its having a tendency to increase the already heavy charges imposed upon counties. If the Honourable Member would procure a list of the voters for each county and borough, he could have an abstract made by the officers of the House.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I feel very strongly the objection founded on the extra labour imposed upon clerks of the peace in getting up Returns like those now moved for by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. But if clerks of the peace and other officers are to be permitted to make out bills for their trouble, and charge them upon the public purse, an enormous burden will be thrown upon the country. I think that those Returns only should be ordered which are likely to be of essential service; and that they ought to be made by the proper officers. The Returns now moved for will prove extremely valuable, and will be attended with much less trouble than the Returns ordered, not long ago with regard to the county rate, which were of a very complicated nature.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I beg the Noble Lord to consider, if the payment for these Returns will entail an unreasonable burden upon the public purse, how much greater is the burden imposed upon the clerks of the peace, who are required to get them up? As chairman of a county, I have repeatedly seen the great trouble and expense to which clerks of the peace have been put by such motions as the present. I doubt very much whether it be practicable to make the Returns from Ireland now moved for. On behalf of a very meritorious class of public officers, upon whom this gratuitous and useless burden is to be thrown, I protest against the motion, and I recommend the Honourable Member to put it in a simpler form, which he may do without losing any necessary information.

Returns ordered.

BUDE LIGHT.

SIR F. TRENCH. — I beg, Sir, to move for "Accounts of all expenses connected with the experiments of the Bude light, from their commencement to the present day, including erection of machinery, wages, and labour, and remuneration of the inventor:

Also, the expense of removing and again replacing the lustres and shades."

Mr. WARBURTON. — Sir, I do not mean to make any offensive observations; but as the Honourable Baronet is continually bringing the subject before the House, I cannot help comparing him to a hen with only one chicken.

[Laughter, and cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. — I am sure the Honourable Member must see that an allusion directly personal to another Honourable Gentleman must be calculated to give offence.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I am quite ready to apologise to the Gallant Member, if I have given him any offence. I hope the experiments which have been commenced have not terminated; for the present temperature of the House does not tell in favour of the mode of illumination recommended by the Honourable and Gallant Officer. I trust that Mr. Gurney will be enabled to complete his experiments, and that the Bude light will be again introduced after the Easter recess; for as Mr. Gurney had only ten days' notice to complete his arrangements, before he was called upon to light the House, it could not be expected that he would be able to do it in so satisfactory a manner as he would have done if more time had been allowed. I shall have no objection to the Returns now moved for when the experiments have been completed.

Mr. H. HINDE. — I cannot see any objection whatever to the production of these Returns. On the contrary, I think they ought to be made; for we shall then be able to judge, from the expense already incurred, whether it be worth while to continue that mode of lighting the House.

Mr. WALLACE. — It may be very proper that we should have a Return of the estimate of the probable expense of completing the experiment; but I cannot see the use of the Returns now moved for. The expense already incurred is very great, in comparison with the expense of further experiments, and therefore it will not be a fair criterion.

SIR F. TRENCH. — I beg to inform the Honourable Member for Bridport, that the temperature of the House has generally been at sixty-two during the Session, and that it would have been so high as sixty-five to-night, had not orders been given to that effect. With regard to the expense, I wish to mention that the charge for lighting the House with candles is not 6*l.* per night, as stated on a former occasion; in reality it is little more than half that sum; the candles which are not entirely consumed in the House being made use of in the reading and other rooms.

Motion agreed to; accounts ordered.

SUPREME COURT (SCOTLAND).

On the motion of Mr. Fox Maule, Committee nominated:—Mr. Fox Maule, Mr. Wallace, Doctor Lushington, Mr. Goulburn, The Lord Advocate, Sir William Rae, Mr. Pigot, Mr. Serjeant Jackson, Sir Charles Grey, Sir Robert Harry Inglis, Doctor Stock, Lord Teignmouth, Mr. Horsman, Sir Thomas Acland, and Mr. Ewart.—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS (IRELAND).

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—I have given notice of a motion for a Return of the number of freemen or burgesses in each of the boroughs in Ireland entitled to vote in the election of Members to serve in Parliament for such boroughs, having obtained certificates of registry. My object was to assist the House in framing a clause in the Municipal Bill, by which freemen might be allowed to vote in the election of town councillors.

Mr. PIGOT.—I really think the motion quite unnecessary.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON.—Sir, I think the production of the Returns will not compensate for the trouble and expense of making them; and therefore I will not press the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SHERIFF EVANS.

SIR M. WOOD.—Sir, in rising to bring forward the motion of which I have given notice, it may, perhaps, be necessary for me briefly to explain the object which I have in view. The corporation of the city of London have always taken a prominent part in the manifestation of their loyalty and attachment to the Sovereign; and on the occasion of Her Majesty's marriage, they agreed to an address of congratulation on the happy event; but they have been unable to present that address, in consequence of the unhappy position in which the sheriffs have been placed. For the last 200 years, the uniform practice has been for the sheriffs to wait upon the Crown in order to ascertain the most convenient period for the presentation of addresses.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I think Honourable Gentlemen ought to have some little regard for the sheriffs, who have been incarcerated merely for persisting in the proper discharge of their duty. The gentleman who still remains in confinement is now suffering severely, and the House will have great cause for regret if they detain him much longer. The question now is, whether the House will grant the corporation the indulgence which they seek, or whether they will interrupt a practice which has invariably been followed? It can be no very great indulgence to the sheriff to give him his liberty for one day; but I think, if the House should not accede to the present motion, they will not be acting with courtesy either to the Sovereign, the corporation, or the country. I endeavoured to prevail on the corporation to allow the address to be presented to Her Majesty without the personal attendance of the sheriffs; but they do not wish to depart from their ancient custom; and it is a very natural feeling. I ask what opinion the country will entertain of the House of Commons, who are resolved to torture men for impartially discharging their duty? On a recent occasion, when the sheriffs endeavoured to place themselves in a proper position before the House, I asked the Noble Lord whether there was any prospect of their liberation. The Noble Lord replied, "Let them petition." In consequence of that suggestion, a petition was drawn up last night.

An Honourable Member.—Where is it?

SIR M. WOOD.—Where? It is in my pocket. They requested me to state, that if it met the approbation of the House, they were ready to petition; but I understood, from a high quarter, that no petition will do, but that they must pay the money; and I do not see the advantage of presenting a petition without any probability of success. Pay the money! What! is the House about to sell its privileges? Are the sheriffs to have the freedom of the House on the payment of 650*l.*? If the sheriff who is now in custody be detained until he has paid that sum, he will not be liberated until a dissolution of Parliament; for I can assure the House that it will not be paid. Have not the sheriffs done everything they could to avoid giving offence to the House? Have they not, in deference to the resolution of the House, endeavoured to stay the writ of inquiry now pending. After all that has taken place, I am quite in the dark as to the real cause of the detention of Mr. Sheriff Evans. My present object is to obtain for him the indulgence of waiting on Her Majesty, to ascertain when she will be graciously pleased to receive the address of the corporation. If, after the discharge of that duty, the House should think proper to order him back to his cell, I pledge my existence that he will immediately return; and then the House may indulge itself in the pleasure of keeping him as a prisoner. I am afraid, from the temper of the House, that there is very little prospect of my request being complied with; and I am sorry to find those Honourable Gentlemen with whom I have had the pleasure of acting for forty years, after all their professions of liberality, disposed to act in this tyrannical manner. I now beg to move, "That the corporation of London having, on the 12th instant, resolved to present an address to Her Majesty, Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and His Royal Highness Prince Albert, on the marriage of Her Majesty; and by the ancient custom of the city of London, the sheriffs being permitted to wait on Her Majesty to receive Her Majesty's commands with respect to the presentation of such address; be it resolved, That Mr. Sheriff Evans be allowed to wait on Her Majesty, for the purpose of receiving such commands of Her Majesty."

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Sir, I beg to second the motion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I will not now attempt to discuss a matter which has been so often before the House. I am afraid that the Honourable Baronet will never be able to comprehend the ground on which the sheriff is detained. If it be improper to discharge the sheriff, I cannot think that it would have any good effect that he should wait on Her Majesty, for any particular purpose, in custody of the messenger, when some other officer of the city — as the Chamberlain, or the Remembrancer — may just as well obtain Her Majesty's commands. I shall, therefore, meet the motion of the Honourable Baronet by giving it my decided opposition, and by moving, as an amendment, that the Orders of the Day be now read.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I beg to second the amendment.

Question put, "That the Orders of the Day be now read."

MR. FRESHFIELD. — The Noble Lord has stated that the worthy Alderman does not understand the precise position of the sheriffs ——

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I, also, labour under the same disadvantage, so far as the question of privilege is illustrated by the present situation of the sheriff. I understood the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General), on a former evening, to contend that we were proceeding, as if the person of the printer had been in the custody of the sheriff, and that we were endeavouring to deliver him out of custody; for the Honourable and Learned Gentleman said that the money represented the printer, and that we were perfectly consistent in trying to get it back again. The argument of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman appeared to receive the sanction of the House on that occasion. But let us consider what is the state of the question at present. The money is no longer in the hands of the sheriff. It is not in the power of the House to pursue the money for the purpose of getting it repaid to Mr. Hansard, because it has been paid to Mr. Stockdale. Our present course of proceeding may, perhaps, be intended to punish the sheriff for what he has already done, in levying the execution; but if so, let the House at once declare the fact. It may be for the purpose of inflicting a fine on the sheriff; but if such be the case, let the people know our intentions in that respect.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I can readily excuse a little impatience on this occasion, in consequence of the subject being so trite. It relates only to the personal liberty of one of Her Majesty's subjects, — the sheriff of the county.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I do not intend to detain the House many moments; and I am quite willing to wait until Honourable Members are ready to hear me. The sheriff, perhaps, may be detained in order that he may be forthcoming, should any new breach of privilege be committed. Whatever be the intention of the House, let it be sincerely and positively announced; and let us not continue to represent that we are following the goods of Mr. Hansard in the hands of the sheriff, when we are fully aware that the money is no longer in his hands.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

ADJOURNMENT.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Question put.

Mr. GODSON. — I must enter my protest against the present unusual mode of proceeding. It is quite contrary to the usual practice of the House to dispose of the Orders of the Day before the Notices of Motion have been gone through.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I have a motion on the paper for the discharge of Mr. Sheriff Evans, which has been thus passed over. It is said that the sheriffs ought not to be discharged until the money has been paid; although it has been admitted that they are not in custody on that account. I will now confine myself to the personal conduct of the sheriffs; and I think it quite unfair that the question of privilege should be discussed, as it always has been, when their personal conduct, alone, has been brought before the House.

[Cries of "Adjourn!"]

They delayed the proceedings in the action in this case as much as they possibly could, thinking that the House would arrange the matter, by passing some Act of Parliament; but this not having been done, they were compelled to obey the law laid down by the court; and the imprisonment has now continued for five weeks. The sheriffs having obeyed the law, what course is the House pursuing? It is teaching the Court of Queen's Bench the law, by means of the imprisonment of the sheriff.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

The privilege of commitment is, undoubtedly, an ancient one; but it is as barbarous as it is ancient.

[Cries of "Adjourn, adjourn!"]

I beg to propose, as an amendment, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "William Evans, Esquire, Sheriff of Middlesex, be forthwith discharged," instead thereof.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—Sir, I beg to second the amendment.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question," put, and agreed to; main question put, and agreed to.

Adjourned at one o'clock.

Sheffield and Rotherham Railway Bill, — Reported; Report to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Bolton Small Debts Bill. — Read a second time, and committed to Mr. Bolling and the South Lancaster list.

Wolverhampton Chapel Bill. — Reported; to be ingrossed.

London and Greenwich Railway Enlargement and Station. — On the motion of Lord Granville Somerset, Report from Select Committee on Standing Orders (24th February) read.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET.— I rise, Sir, to propose that the Croydon Railway Company have leave to proceed with their Bill for the London and Greenwich railway enlargement and station, as though they had, in every respect, conformed to the Standing Orders. There is no one in the House more anxious to maintain the Standing Orders than myself. I believe they are calculated to do great good; and I assure the House that, were it not for some peculiar circumstances in this case, which I shall, in as few words as possible, endeavour to explain, I should not ask them to make it an exception to the general rule. From an investigation that took place before the Select Committee, last year, it appeared that the Croydon, the Dover, and the Brighton railways had but one common terminus, —namely, at the north side of the London terminus of the Greenwich Railway; and that, to arrive at that common terminus, it was necessary for the trains of the three lines I have mentioned to cross the Greenwich line. As yet, the Croydon company, only, have opened a communication with London; and already have the obvious inconvenience and danger of this arrangement been experienced. The House will, at once, perceive, when I inform them that the Greenwich trains run every quarter of an hour, and, during fair times, every five minutes, throughout the day, what must be the danger of collision between the trains of the two lines, — from the fact of the Croydon trains having to cross the Greenwich rails; and in what imminent peril the lives of the passengers must be placed. One case of collision has already occurred: fortunately, no lives were lost; but it is quite evident that the most fatal consequences might have resulted.

I will now, having shown the necessity for a remedy, proceed to state the special reasons why the Croydon company should be allowed to proceed with their Bill. In consequence of the Report of the Committee of last year, to which I have before alluded, the Croydon, Greenwich, Dover, and Brighton railways entered into mutual negotiations. Many plans and projects were devised; but, hitherto, no agreement has been come to between the various parties. It was under these circumstances that the Croydon company gave notice of their intention to bring in a Bill for the purpose of enabling them to enlarge their railway, and to run a parallel line from the present junction of the two railways along the south side of the Greenwich line; thus obviating the inconvenience complained of. The Greenwich company proposed a similar Bill; and they were enabled to comply with the Standing Orders, inasmuch as the whole of the property required for this new terminus was already in their own hands; but the Croydon company, although most anxious to afford a safe and efficient means of communication, were not enabled to give the notice to the proprietors of the land which the Standing Orders of the House require should be given. The Standing Orders require that a notice should be given in the spring of the year previous to the application to Parliament. I can, however, say, — having been myself a member of the Committee by whom those Orders were framed, — that it never was the intention of that Committee that the rule should apply so strictly as to prevent the accomplishment of a great public benefit, in a case such as this, wherein it was impossible for the Company to have given the notice within the prescribed time. The Croydon company have complied with the Standing Orders as far as they were able to do so; and have, by all the means in their power, given publicity to their intention. The fact is, the ground they require for their new line is the property of the Greenwich company, except only a very small portion, which is of no importance, and about which there is no difficulty. I therefore can see no private injury that can result from the want of due notice; while, on the other hand, a great public advantage may be expected if the Company be permitted to proceed with their Bill. I shall be told, no doubt, that the Greenwich company are willing to complete this work; but the House will be aware — for it is in evidence before them — that the Greenwich company intend, if they provide this accommodation to the public, to charge an increased rate per passenger for the use of their line. The Croydon company do not propose to make any increase in the charge; and I think, therefore, the House will agree with me, that this furnishes a strong reason for permitting the Croydon company to construct the proposed line. All I ask is, to allow the two Bills to go before the Committee, and let them say which company is likely to afford to the public the more perfect, and, at the same time, the cheaper means of communication. I will say nothing as to the merits of either company; but what I do claim on the part of the public is, that the communication between London, Brighton, and Dover should be as cheap, and as safe, as legislative enactment can make it; and it is on this main ground that I ask the House to accede to my motion, which is, That the Croydon Railway Company have leave to proceed with their Bill for the London and Greenwich Railway enlargement and station.

On the question being put, —

SIR E. KNATCHBULL said: — I wish to offer a very few words to the House on the subject of my Noble Friend's motion. My Noble Friend brings forward that which he considers a specific ground for this indulgence; and I am not disposed to quarrel with him upon the principle of it, — namely, that the present danger to the passengers is so great, that it is necessary to enlarge the terminus where the different lines meet. Upon that ground, I should not find myself disposed to dissent from the motion. But there are two Bills before the House, both for the same object. The one is the Croydon company's Bill, on which the Standing Orders have not been complied with; the other is the Greenwich company's Bill, on which the Standing Orders have been implicitly followed. My Noble Friend says, it is proper to allow the two Bills to go on together, pari passu. I do not think so. I do not conceive we ought to entail on both parties the expense of proceeding with their Bills. It is, of course, a question for the House to decide; but, as chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, I have thought it my duty to make these few observations.

Mr. HODGES.—If there were no other Bill before the House, having the same object of public convenience in view, than that which the Noble Lord advocates, it might, I think, be a question whether, under the circumstances, the Standing Orders ought not to be dispensed with, so far as to allow the Bill to proceed. But that is not the state of the case; for here we have another railway company, who have brought forward a Bill for precisely the same purpose, and who have, in every way, conformed to the Standing Orders of the House. I conceive it to be our duty not to put parties to unnecessary expense; and therefore I hope the Greenwich company's Bill will be considered sufficient.

SIR GEORGE STRICKLAND. — It was for some time considered that great injustice was often inflicted on individuals by the power we gave to railway companies to interfere with private property, which, in many cases, had been vested for particular purposes, — without giving to the parties any power of redress; and it was on this view of the subject that the Railway Committee felt great regret that they could not lay down rules and regulations of a more stringent character for the protection of private property. They, however, came to one resolution, which was, "that no railway company should hereafter be permitted to interfere with any private property, except after proof of proper notice having been given, — that is, in the month of February in the year preceding the bringing in of the Bill." That resolution, which was made a Standing Order of the House, has, in the present case, not been complied with; and the simple question is, whether the mere fact of the property in question belonging to a rival company is a sufficient ground for dispensing with the Standing Orders? In my opinion, it is not. Much has been said about danger to the public; but let it be remembered that the Greenwich company have also brought in a Bill to remove that danger, and to afford the same extent of convenience which the Croydon company would give by their Bill. This ground, therefore,—which, in my opinion, is no ground at all, — fails. The land which the Croydon company require is the property of the Greenwich company; but that is no reason why we should deprive it of that protection which we extend to the property of other persons. I, for one, shall vote against the Noble Lord's motion.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — If the House refuse the present application, the Greenwich company will decide for themselves whether the public shall or shall not have the advantage which it was the object of the Committee of last year to afford them. The Greenwich company are in possession of the property by means of which this improvement is to be made; they, therefore, cannot be placed in a better situation; and they have, under the authority of Parliament, obtained ground to lay down two additional lines of rails on the south side of their present line. But the inconvenience complained of is this, that the trains of the three lines of railway — the Dover, Brighton, and Croydon — have to proceed along the Greenwich line, and to cross the rails both of the up and down line, to arrive at their terminus on the north side of the Greenwich line. This the Committee of last year thought was fraught with great danger to the public, and they reported to that effect; and the object of the Croydon company, is to remove that danger. The Greenwich company can desire nothing better than that the matter should remain as it is; and if the Croydon company be not allowed to proceed with their Bill, the Greenwich company may carry out the improvement or not, as they please; or they may allow their own Bill to drop at any period. The question, then, resolves itself into this, — Shall we afford protection to the public by the only means by which the public can be protected, that is — (if no arrangement can be made between the Croydon and the Greenwich companies) — to give the former the power to purchase the ground they require to make a proper terminus on the south side of the Greenwich line? This is not a question of invasion of private property, in which the Standing Orders would obviously apply; but it is one in which the public feel great interest; it is, in fact, in all respects, a public, and not a private, question.

Mr DARBY. — The Report of the Committee of last year was, that, for the trains of the three railways, the Croydon, Dover, and Brighton, to cross the Greenwich line, was unsafe to the public. The Croydon company were anxious to comply with the recommendation of the Committee, and to afford the public the required convenience; but the Report was made too late in the year to enable them to give the notices which the Standing Orders require. Under these circumstances, they ask the House to permit them to proceed with their Bill, as though those notices had been given. If this were a new railway, and the property about to be taken were private, I should be prepared to insist on a full compliance with the Standing Orders; but the question I have now to consider is, whether the Dover and Brighton railways shall be allowed to go on?—for into that it resolves itself. I am of opinion that the public should have the advantages which these means of communication would afford, therefore, I shall support my Noble Friend's motion. It is a little curious, that, in the course of last Session, when a similar application was made to dispense with the Standing Orders, that application was at once agreed to, and the Bill was allowed to proceed.

Mr. ALDERMAN HUMPHERY.—The Croydon company are told by this House that their present terminus is unsafe, inasmuch as it is necessary for their trains to cross the Greenwich line. The Greenwich company say "If you will pay us 3*d.* per passenger more than you have agreed to pay us, we will build an additional terminus for your accommodation." The Croydon company do not object to enter into an arrangement with the Greenwich company, provided they will undertake to carry out the improvement immediately; but that is the difficulty. And it must be obvious to every one who considers the position of the Greenwich company, that it would be all but impossible for them to afford the required accommodation. They have already obtained all the money they could raise on the security of their railway; and it is quite clear that without funds they can do nothing. There is another reason why the House should accede to this motion, which is, that—as I have been informed—the Croydon company do not intend to make any increased charge on the public for this additional convenience to the public. It is unfortunate that the Croydon company ever went to the north side of the Greenwich line; they should have made their terminus at the south side in the first instance. But after the Report of the Committee of last year, and the experience we have already had of the inconvenience and danger to the public, occasioned by the present arrangement, I think it would be most unfair to prevent the Croydon company from proceeding with their Bill.

Mr. HUME.—Sir, my opinion entirely coincides with that of my Honourable Friend the Member for Southwark; and I hope the House will understand this question, not as one that affects the two rival companies only, but as one in which the public have an interest. It is a matter of great importance to the public that the two railways, the Dover and the Brighton, should be completed, and that they should have the means of communication which those two railways are calculated to afford. The object of the Croydon company is to facilitate that communication, by constructing a safe and convenient terminus. Another important consideration is, the charge on the public; and I believe, if the Greenwich is to be the sole line, the rate of charge will be increased by one third, or perhaps one half. There can be no doubt that the public convenience will be best consulted by allowing the Croydon company to proceed with their Bill; and under all the circumstances, considering that there has been no neglect on the part of the parties themselves, I trust the House will consent to waive the Standing Orders.

SIR T. FREMANTLE.—I think, Sir, the observations of the three last Honourable Gentlemen who have spoken comprise the arguments which should have been urged before the Committee, to induce them to recommend the House to depart from the Standing Orders in this case. I will, with the permission of the House, call the attention of Honourable Gentlemen to the Standing Order that refers to the case. The Standing Orders Committee considered that it was necessary, for the protection of the public, that notices should be given, not only in the months of November and December, but also in the spring of the year, preceding that in which any Bill of this sort is introduced; in order that parties might know that their property would be likely to be invaded. After this resolution had been in operation for twelve months, it was resolved, by another Committee, that the spring notice ought, in all cases, to be insisted upon. In the present case, the spring notice has not been given; consequently, the parties are not in a condition to proceed with their Bill. My opinion is, that this is a case in which compliance with the Standing Orders ought to be required more than in any other; because the land which this company propose to take is already in the possession of another company, who, having already gone to very great expense in constructing a suitable terminus; and it having been allowed to them to lay down a second line of rails, in addition to what they have already, hold, at this moment, a great part of the land, and are willing to proceed with the work. I think, then, under such circumstances, it would be most unjust to allow another company now to step in and take from them by force their land, for the purpose of building a rival line. It has been said, that the Greenwich company will charge more than the Croydon company; but that is a question for the Committee to consider. If it should appear to the Committee on the Bill that the proposed rate of tolls is exorbitant, they can throw out the Bill. Then it is said, this is a question that interests the public, and that it is essential, on the ground of public convenience, that there should be this second line of railway. I admit that, if it could be shown that the Greenwich company were not prepared to go on with the work, that would be a ground for extending the indulgence to the rival company. But let us first see whether the Greenwich company will refuse or neglect to act in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee of last year. If, when they have the power, by Act of Parliament, to proceed with the work, they neglect to do so, then my Noble Friend, at some future time, will come before the House with a good case in favour of the Croydon company; and, although the application may be made at a late period of the Session, I, for one, shall be most willing to vote with him.

Mr. KEMBLE. — If the Croydon company were applying for any advantage for themselves, the observations of the Honourable Baronet who has just sat down would be fair and proper; but they are about to incur this great expense, in conformity with the resolutions of a Committee of this House. The Croydon company have the greatest interest in effecting this alteration, and therefore are likely to carry it out in the most speedy and effectual manner.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—The consequence of refusing this application will be, supposing the Greenwich company should not proceed with their Bill, to postpone the communication between Dover, Brighton, and London for a twelvemonth longer. That, I think, is a sufficient reason why the Standing Orders should be dispensed with in the present case. Then, it should be remembered that this Company do not propose to infringe on any private property; the land they require being the property of a rival company, and extending only about three or four miles. Under these circumstances, I think the notice of three or four months, which has been given, is amply sufficient.

Mr. ESTCOURT. — Although I was not present when the decision of the Standing Orders Committee was come to, still, from all I have been able to collect of the facts of the case, I perfectly coincide with that decision. I consider that the parties to a Private Bill are bound to comply with the Standing Orders which the House has laid down; and that the House itself is bound to see that those orders be strictly adhered to, except only where a great and paramount case of necessity can be shown. But no such paramount ground of necessity has been shown in the present case; nor have I heard anything during the present debate which, in my opinion, should induce the House to make it an exception to the general rule. I will not remark upon the private interests of the Company, because with them we have nothing to do: it is the interest of the public, and the public only, that can justify a departure from the Standing Orders; and I must say, that I see no public advantage that could be gained by complying with the present application. The Greenwich company have a Bill now before the House, to enable them to carry the proposed improvement into effect, and they have complied with the Standing Orders. I repeat that I quite concur with the decision of my colleagues on the Committee. I think, that, as the Croydon company have not complied with the Standing Orders, they should be stopped in limine. I, for one, therefore, shall oppose my Noble Friend's motion.

Mr. B. WOOD.—The House should not lose sight of this most important feature of the case, — namely, that at this moment the trains of the Croydon line cross the Greenwich line at every hour of the day, to the great risk of the lives of the passengers. The ground, therefore, of public necessity for the present Bill is, I think, sufficiently shown. It is not more than two months since a collision actually took place; and there is danger of similar accidents occurring every hour of the day. I hold, that the public convenience, as well as justice to the parties, requires that the two Bills should go before the Committee together.

The House then divided, when the numbers were — Ayes 95, Noes 22; Majority 73.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

Resolution reported: —

That, in the case of the Cambuslang and Muirkirk Road petition, the Standing Orders ought not to be dispensed with.

Report to lie on the table.

COMPTROLLERSHIP OF THE EXCHEQUER. — PENSION TO SIR JOHN NEWPORT.

Mr. HUME. — I wish to give notice, that, to-morrow, I intend to move an amendment on the last paragraph of the resolutions to be proposed by the Honourable Member for the county of Durham (Mr. Liddell), to the effect that the pension of Sir John Newport be withdrawn from the Civil List, and that his long services be submitted as a special case to the House for its consideration, with a view to make proper compensation for the same.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — Seeing the Noble Lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in his place, I wish to put a question to him relative to a Bill which was passed in a former Session touching international copyright. I wish to know whether any negotiation for carrying into effect the design of that Bill has been concluded with any foreign power; or whether the Noble Lord can hold out any prospect of any one of the negotiations, which it is understood have been going on for some time, on this subject, being brought to a speedy conclusion?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I have to inform my Noble Friend, in answer to his question, that, since the Bill was passed, several communications with foreign powers have taken place upon the subject; but as yet these negotiations have not led to any agreement. I trust, however, that in a short time I shall be enabled to announce their successful result.

SULPHUR MONOPOLY.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I see, by the public papers, that a report has reached this country, that a new treaty of commerce has been, or is about to be, made with Naples; and that the abolition of the sulphur contract has been agreed upon. As that report has occasioned some anxiety amongst commercial men, I wish to know from the Noble Lord whether or not it is true?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—I certainly must express my regret that it is not in my power to confirm the report in all respects. It is quite true that negotiations with Naples are pending; but that the sulphur monopoly is abolished, unfortunately, is not true. Regarding that monopoly as a violation of the existing treaty, it is to be hoped that we shall very soon hear of its abolition.

WAR WITH CHINA.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I beg to inquire of my Noble Friend whether the papers relating to China, which have been promised by the Government, are likely soon to be laid on the table?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.— They are in the course of preparation, and will, I hope, be ready in a day or two.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS BILL.

SIR E. WILMOT. — In moving the second reading of the Juvenile Offenders Bill, I hope the House will allow me to say a few words on the details of the measure. Several objections have been made against the measure; but I think the objectors have confounded the details with the principle of the Bill; and if the House will suffer it to be read a second time and to go into Committee, I am sure all those objections will be there fairly, and I hope satisfactorily, dealt with. The Bill proposes to give summary jurisdiction to magistrates in cases of larceny and misdemeanour; but it has been suggested to me, that this would embrace too large a field of crime; and that it would be almost impossible to apply the principle of summary jurisdiction to larcenies generally. But I am perfectly willing, if it be the wish of the House, to leave out the clauses relating to that subject, or to restrict the summary jurisdiction to certain misdemeanours which shall be specifically designated. It has also been suggested, with respect to the summary jurisdiction of two magistrates in petty sessions, that a jury should be formed of a few of the inhabitants of the localities, or de circumstantibus; and, in Committee, no doubt some arrangement of that nature can be made. With respect to the clause for doing away with the holding of petty sessions in public houses, I am so convinced of the evil of the practice, that I think some means should be taken to discontinue it; at least, wherever that may be practicable. Upon this point, however, I am also willing to act upon the sense of the House in committee on the Bill. It has been objected, that the measure I have proposed would be productive of very great expense to counties. From calculations which I have made, founded on the accounts of the charges incurred in prosecuting criminals, I venture to premise, without the slightest misgiving, that the counties will save by the Bill. I am quite sure there will be very little difficulty in settling, in Committee, all points of doubt and dispute. My object is, to erect an intermediate tribunal between the magistrates and the superior courts, in order to prevent young persons of twelve, eleven, and ten years of age, and perhaps even younger children, from being sent to prison for first and trivial offences, where they are usually not reclaimed from, but confirmed in, vice. This proposition has been before the public for years. Grand juries and petty juries, magistrates and judges, and persons of all descriptions, have countenanced and supported it; and this House itself, some time ago, appointed Committees to investigate the subject, which have supported the same view. I deny that this is a Bill of punishments, which I understand some who object to it have called it. It is a Bill to invest magistrates, not with an arbitrary power to inflict punishment, but to give them an authority similar to that which a master has over his apprentice, or a father over his son, — a moral authority, which will enable them to bring juvenile offenders under a course of moral training and discipline, that shall have the effect of reclaiming them to the paths of honesty and industry. The Bill is a merciful Bill, its object being to provide national parents and guardians for those who, unhappily, are deprived of natural parents and guardians; and thus to save them from being sent to gaols, there to be contaminated and ruined, to the great increase of crime and mischief in the land. The object of good laws should be as much to prevent as to punish offences; and I wish, by this Bill, so to deal with those who render themselves obnoxious to the penalties of the law for the first time, that, while suffering for their offences, they may be relieved from the stigma and pollution which would deprive them of the chance of reformation. I doubt not that the penitentiary in the Isle of Wight is found to answer; but I know, for a certainty, that the penitentiary at Warwick has done a great deal of good. The result of the experience acquired by the operation of the system pursued in the penitentiary of Warwickshire is this, — that though some of those juvenile offenders who have passed through gaols have been reformed, all those who have not have been altogether reclaimed. I am sure there is no one who has taken the trouble to make himself acquainted with the feelings, opinions, and practices of other countries, with regard to their criminal law, their management of offenders, and the amount of punishment which they inflict, but will readily agree with me that undue severity prevails in England. I believe, that, by the French code, although I have not myself read it, boys under the age of sixteen years are not subjected to punishment in the same manner as adults; being considered to be sans discrétion. It is not considered that their reason is awake; and, whenever brought to trial, if satisfactory evidence be given that they have not reached the age of legal responsibility, they are acquitted, as a matter of course. It is not my wish to detain the House a moment longer than necessary; but, seeing a large force collected for the purpose of overthrowing my Bill, I have felt it incumbent on me to make these few remarks. I would ask those Gentlemen who have come here to vote against the second reading, whether they can deny that a measure, having for its object the education of the people, should not be treated lightly? In all the experience I have had, I have discovered no reason to think that the majority of delinquents are urged to commit crime by the pressure of want. I do not believe that two cases could be found out of a hundred of juvenile offenders, in which the delinquents are driven into crime by distress: on the contrary, there are the best grounds for believing that crime is, in most cases, to be attributed to general ignorance; but more especially to ignorance of moral and religious duties, and to the absence of that sound discipline and control, without which, in early life, it is vain to hope, in any country, for a well-ordered population. A recent instance has come under my notice in the city of London, of two girls, one aged nine, the other eleven years; both were tried, and one sentenced to seven days' imprisonment, the other to seven years' transportation; and why was the latter sentence pronounced? Because the Children's Friend Society undertook the care of one of them; and in order to give that association the requisite authority over the offender, it became necessary to sentence her to seven years' transportation. I feel that the grievances arising out of the present state of the law are so intolerable, that the House must see the necessity of some alteration. I therefore move, that the Bill be now read a second time.

On the question being put, —

Mr. WILLIAM MILES said: — Sir, it is with great regret I rise to oppose the second reading of this Bill. But, after having listened with great attention to the speech of the Honourable Baronet who has moved the second reading, I cannot find that the arguments with which he has supported his motion agreed, in any one particular, with the principles contained in the Bill. I trust that my Honourable Friend will bear with me while I state the reasons which induce me to dissent from his proposition. I can assure him that I have looked narrowly into the character of the class of delinquents whom he would screen from any penalty; and the result of my inquiry has been to make me form a conclusion totally different from that to which he has come. I have, however, other and stronger objections to his Bill. I fear that one consequence of the passing of the Bill would be, that in graver offences than the mover contemplates, the measure would materially interfere with the trial by jury. I would, however, so far agree with the promoters of the Bill, as to assent to the removal of minor offences from the jurisdiction of juries. My Honourable Friend has gone at great length into the different efforts which have been made to establish summary jurisdiction in the case of minor offences; but I would refer him to one which he has omitted, — I mean the appointment of the County Rates Committee, of which the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth was chairman. To that Committee the end now suggested appeared to be opposed by insurmountable obstacles. In their Report, they gave it as their opinion that it would be advisable to establish some tribunal to which immediate appeal could be made in the case of minor offences; but, at the same time, to guard effectually against abuse, the danger of which would be more imminent, as the process should be made more summary, the Government so far acted on that Report that they referred it for consideration to the Commissioners of Criminal Law, then sitting; and, in 1837, that Commission published its Report on juvenile delinquency, known as its Third Report. In that Report they laid down three propositions: first, that, in the case of a delinquent of tender years, the justice of peace should either dismiss him or take bail; — second, that a justice of peace should be able to pass sentence in cases of robbery, where the value did not amount to ten shillings; — and, thirdly, that no lengthened custody should, if possible, take place between the commission of the crime and the trial. Now, my Honourable Friend would have twenty different sessions in each county, and would have, also, twenty different prisons for juvenile offenders. Let the House consider what would be the expense of so many small prisons as his Bill would have the effect of creating. If, under such a Bill, two magistrates are to try offences, it must, of course, be at petty sessions. The places for holding petty sessions will probably be fifteen or sixteen in each county; and there must, therefore, be an equal number of small gaols. Let us look to the character of the offenders which this Bill would remove from the cognisance of courts of justice. He speaks of offenders of from nine to eleven years; but his Bill extends the privileged age to sixteen. Now, there is a very great difference between children of eleven years and children two years older. I can state, from my own experience, that the majority of offenders who appear in courts of justice range, in age, from fifteen to twenty-two years. I have had occasion to undertake the arduous task of looking through the criminal calendar of Somersetshire for the last ten years; and I will now state the result of that examination. The whole number of offenders from 1827 to 1837, was 7100. Of those, 500 were under the age of fifteen years; of whom, one fourth were, during that period, twice tried. But I have a better test than that, — a Report to which the House will attach greater importance. It is the Report of a Commission of which you, Sir, were Chief Commissioner. I do not think that a more interesting book ever was published. In this book, I find the character of juvenile offenders fully exemplified in the confessions of two boys in Knutsford gaol. These boys were of the age of fourteen, and had, by their own confession, been thieves from the age of nine. They were employed by men to steal into houses, and open the doors, and also to pick pockets in crowds; and, when detected, their accomplices used to "mill them out," as it was termed in slang phrase. These are the sort of delinquents which my Honourable Friend would screen from juries. I would ask my Honourable Friend, what are the difficulties attendant upon trial by jury? Does any one suppose that any difficulty is found arising out of the age of the accused, in determining his guilt or innocence? On the contrary, the difficulty in obtaining verdicts arises, almost invariably, from the valueless character of the articles stolen. My view of the course most expedient to be taken with the present Bill is, that it should be sent to a Committee up-stairs; and, if my Honourable Friend will not agree to that, I must move, as an amendment, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I would recommend the Honourable Baronet who has brought forward the Bill to adopt the suggestion just made of referring it to a Committee up-stairs; as, otherwise, I apprehend that, in the present state of the House, he must lose his Bill. I am willing to admit that a summary jurisdiction, for juvenile offenders, might be carried much further than the present state of the law permits; at the same time, I entertain a strong conviction that a measure having such an object in view ought to be submitted to a Select Committee, where the country Gentlemen will have an opportunity of investigating it; and, if for no other reason, on this account, that it will have a material effect upon the county rates. I am unwilling to vote against the principle of the Bill; but, if the Honourable Baronet will not consent to a Committee up-stairs, I must oppose the second reading.

COLONEL WOOD. — I do not mean anythiug disrespectful to the Honourable Baronet; but I am afraid that his Bill will not be improved by its being sent to a Committee up-stairs. I think that any alteration in the punishment of minor offences would be better effected by a Bill originating with the Under Secretary of State. I am not one of those who hold that the question of age should limit the jurisdiction of juries; but I think that the grades of offences might be altered so as to remove from our calendar the present weight of minor offences. I cannot help feeling that summary jurisdiction, with a fine, might be beneficially applied to minor offences. The Honourable Under Secretary wishes this Bill to go to a Select Committee, for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the country Gentlemen. I can tell him that the country Gentlemen have formed their opinion already; and that they consider their counties sufficiently burdened by the new rural police force, which, if vigilant, may do great good, but must, in any case, entail great expense on the counties. In my opinion, the best way would be, not to read this Bill a second time, but for Her Majesty's Government either to move for a Committee to inquire into the expediency of lowering the grade of offences, or to introduce a Bill for that purpose themselves.

Mr. SANFORD. — I think we are much indebted to the Honourable Baronet for bringing forward this measure; and I think we may fairly proceed with it another stage, without sending it to a Committee up-stairs, as we have already had the opinion of such a Committee as far as the principle is concerned. It might, however, be as well to allow the details to be discussed by such a Committee, particularly those portions to which the Honourable Member who spoke last has alluded. If the Bill were so examined and reported on, I think that some benefit to the country might be expected from it; but if it be left in its present state, it will be my duty to vote against it.

GENERAL JOHNSON. — I object to this Bill, because, in the first place, if carried, it will cause the erection of new gaols in every part of the country; and, secondly, because, as it now stands, it is a direct attack on the trial by jury; for all persons supposed to be under the age of sixteen are to be deprived of that advantage. I have a great objection to the Bill, and think it perfectly impossible to be made useful, even if sent to a Committee. I shall therefore vote for the amendment, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. ESTCOURT. — I entertain a very great objection to this measure, on the ground stated by the Honourable and Gallant Gentleman who has just spoken, — namely, that it is a direct attack on the trial by jury, the greatest of our constitutional rights; but I should be sorry to see it thrown out without giving it the chance of its being amended in the Committee. Nothing, in my opinion, can be more erroneous than to consider age as a criterion for summary jurisdiction; because, amongst persons under fifteen years of age, we often find the greatest criminals; while, on the other hand, persons far beyond that age are often brought before magistrates, in whose cases summary jurisdiction would be an act both of justice and humanity. This consideration presses so strongly on me, in consequence of what fell under my observation while sitting on the London Police Committee, that I cannot give my assent to any Bill which would limit summary jurisdiction to the cases of persons under sixteen. But, without troubling the House further, I will say, that, if the Honourable Baronet will adopt the suggestion of the Honourable Member for Somersetshire (Mr. Miles), he shall have my vote for the second reading of the Bill.

SIR E. WILMOT. — If the Honourable Member will examine the Bill, he will find that I have not taken age as a criterion for punishment, but as a criterion of education; and with regard to the clauses for summary jurisdiction, a similar clause passed this House last year, but was afterwards thrown out in the other House. By Returns which I hold in my hand, it appears that the average number of offenders under sixteen years of age is, — in Warwickshire, as 1 in 7; in Kent, as 1 in 8; in Middlesex, as 1 in 6; and in all England, as 1 in 10. An Honourable Member has hinted that this Bill will be thrown out in another place; for that I care not one farthing. I, as a Member of the House of Commons, have brought forward this measure, because I have thought it right to do so. The other House of Parliament will, of course, use its own discretion; but that shall not deter me from persisting in what I deem to be a right course. I would consent to this Bill going to a Committee, but that I predict that, if I do, it will come down totally different in principle from what it was when it was sent up. It may come down improved in principle, but it will not be my principle; because my principle is, to prevent boys from being contaminated by early imprisonment.

SIR G. STRICKLAND. — I think this Bill most objectionable on many grounds; but most especially because it will take away from those who come under its operation the advantage of trial by jury. For my part, I am not at all anxious to take away the trial by jury, for the purpose of increasing the power of the magistrates. My objections to the Bill are insurmountable; in fact, on looking over the Bill, I find it full of objections.

I shall therefore give my vote for reading the Bill a second time this day six months.

Mr. H. A. AGLIONBY.—As I believe that, notwithstanding the concession of the Honourable Baronet, it is intended to take a division on the second reading; and as so much has been said about the value of trial by jury, I cannot, consistently with my duty, give a silent vote on the question. No man regards the privilege of trial by jury more than I do; but there are some cases in which, in my opinion, that privilege could with advantage be dispensed with. There are two objections against the Bill: first, that it will abrogate the trial by jury; and, second, that it will greatly enhance the expenses of the various counties. I do not hold either of those objections to be valid. With respect to trial by jury, much as I value it, I think there are cases in which, however good it may be in theory, in practice, it would be detrimental; and in which it would be much better, as in the case of juvenile offenders, to exercise summary jurisdiction, and thus to keep them from the pollution of gaols. Although not having the honour of a seat on the bench of magistrates, I have had much experience of these matters during my professional attendance at quarter sessions; and I have often seen persons, for the theft of a few peats, consigned to a gaol, merely that they might benefit by this boasted palladium of trial by jury. Now this Bill, instead of consigning such criminals to gaol, will give them immediate trial and summary punishment. As to the expense, it will chiefly fall on the wealthy classes, who are the best able to bear it. For these reasons I shall give my vote for the second reading.

Mr. PRYME.—My Honourable Friend the Member for Cockermouth has praised the Bill of the Honourable Baronet the Member for Warwickshire, as keeping juvenile offenders from the contamination of gaols. As far as I can see, the Bill has no such object.

SIR E. WILMOT. — May I ask, has the Honourable Member read the Bill? He certainly cannot have read it.

The SPEAKER. — Order, order!

Mr. A. WHITE. — I shall vote for the second reading of this Bill; and I can assure the House that the bench of magistrates with whom I have the honour to act have often regretted the absence of a power of summary jurisdiction in cases of juvenile offenders.

Mr. PRYME. — One word, in answer to the assertion of the Honourable Baronet. I find in his Bill the words "common gaol or penitentiary."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the question to add the words, "on this day six months." Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

The House then divided: — Ayes 49, Noes 16; Majority 33.

VAGRANTS' REMOVAL BILL.

Reported; to be read a third time on Friday.

SUPPLY. — WAYS AND MEANS.

Committees deferred till Friday.

SALE OF BEER ACTS.

Mr. SANFORD. — I move that the resolutions of the Committee on the Sale of Beer Acts be now reported to the House.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I must express my disapprobation at the mode in which these resolutions were adopted. The House went into Committee on the Bill at one o'clock on Friday morning, when there were only ten Members present; and, moreover, there was no notice of the Committee on the Vote Paper of that day.

Mr. SANFORD. — I must make one observation, in justice to my Honourable Friend the Member for Droitwich. The fact is, with respect to what the Honourable Member for Bridport has stated, that the Order of the Day for the Bill was on Friday last a dropped order; and the Honourable Member for Droitwich merely exercised his right in having its consideration resumed, with the consent of the House. If the Honourable Member for Bridport will allow the Report to be now brought up, I will answer, on behalf of my Honourable Friend the Member for Droitwich, that there will be ample notice given of the second reading.

Mr. WARBURTON. — After what the Honourable Member has said, I do not think it necessary further to oppose the bringing up of the Report.

COLONEL WOOD. — I do not wish to oppose the Bill in its present stage; but when it goes into Committee, I shall move the insertion of a clause prohibiting the granting of any new licences for the next three years, and I shall also attempt to apply to it the 47th clause of the Metropolitan Police Act, relative to the opening of alehouses on Sundays.

Resolutions reported: —

1. That the annual duty of 3*l.* 3*s.*, now payable upon every excise licence to be taken out by any person for selling, by retail, beer to be drunk or consumed upon the premises where sold, shall cease, and that in lieu thereof there shall be paid an annual excise duty of 5*l.*;

2. That it is expedient to alter and amend the laws relating to the sale of beer.

Resolutions agreed to. Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Pakington and Mr. Sanford.

INLAND WAREHOUSING BILL.

Second reading deferred till Friday.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

Petition from the town of Galway, for expunging the eighth section of the Bill, and placing the town of Galway in Schedule A. — To lie on the table.

Civil List Pensions. — Return presented — of pensions on the Civil List granted since 1st February, 1828 (ordered 18th February). — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

Trinidad. — Copy presented — of a circular despatch addressed by Lord John Russell to the Governors of the West India colonies, transmitting an order of Her Majesty in Council, relative to immigration into Trinidad (Address 25th February). — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

Jamaica. — On the motion of Sir H. Hardinge, copies ordered —

Of any correspondence, reports, and estimates that may have taken place between the Secretary at War, the Board of Treasury, the Master General of the Ordnance, the Governor of Jamaica, or any other departments, on the subject of temporary barracks at Maroon Town, Jamaica, from the 1st day of January, 1838, up to the 1st day of January, 1840.

Copper and Tin. — On the motion of Mr. Pendarves, accounts ordered —

Of all copper imported into the United Kingdom in the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840; distinguishing each sort of copper, from what country, and into what ports imported:

Of the quanties of copper exported from the United Kingdom in the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840; distinguishing each sort, from what port sent, and to what country exported:

Of the quantities of copper exported from the port of London in the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840; distinguishing each sort, and to what country exported:

Of the quantities of copper exported from the port of Liverpool in the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840; distinguishing each sort, and to what country exported:

Of all copper ore that has been imported into the United Kingdom, without payment of duty, for the purpose of exportation, in the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840.

Tin.—On the motion of Mr. Pendarves, account ordered—

Of all tin imported into the United Kingdom in the year ending the 5th day of January, 1840; distinguishing from what countries imported:

Also, an account of all tin exported from the United Kingdom in the year ending the 5th of January, 1840; distinguishing to what countries exported.

Registrars of Deeds (Middlesex).—On the motion of Mr. Hayter, Returns ordered—

(In continuation of the Return made on the 26th day of April, 1825), of the amount of fees received by the registrars of the Register Office for Deeds, in Middlesex, in each year from 1824 to the present time; stating, also, the rate of fees actually demanded and taken for the registry of memorials of deeds, and the authority under which such fees are charged; and stating the application of such fees, distinguishing the amount paid for the expenses of the office, the amount paid to the deputy registrars, and the amount paid to the registrars; stating, also, the highest fee demanded and taken in each year for the registry of any one memorial, and the amount payable for the registry of such memorial, according to the rate allowed by the Act of Parliament establishing the registry:

Of the number of holydays (exclusive of Sundays) kept in each year, on which the office has been closed to the public, and a statement of the hours of public attendance at the office on each day, exclusive of holydays, and whether any and what duties are performed by the registrars in person:

Of the rate of fees actually demanded and taken for the registry of deeds during the years 1822, 1823, and 1824, stating the authority under which such fees were demanded;

Of the number of deeds and memorials relating to such deeds left at the Register Office during the several months of November and December, 1839, and when such deeds respectively were ready to be returned, and were returned to the parties leaving the same; and when such memorials were respectively entered in the books of the Register Office.

CHURCH EXTENSION.

The Bishop of Llandaff and the Bishop of Ely presented petitions in favour of, — of inhabitants of Clifton; Muchelney; and Whittington.

SCOTCH CHURCH PATRONAGE.

The Marquess of Bute, the Duke of Argyll, the Earl of Aberdeen, and the Earl of Galloway presented petitions in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, —of ministers and elders of Union parish, Aberdeen; of the presbytery of Fordyce; of heritors, elders, and inhabitants of parish of Cardross; of members and friends of the Church of Scotland resident in Union parish, Aberdeen; of members of the Church of Scotland within the parish of Midmar; of the moderator and members of the Kirk Session of the East parish of Aberdeen; of inhabitants of Helensburgh; Closeburn; Kilmorie; Marytown; Torthorwald; Monivaird and Strowan; Forgan; Kingussie; Alva; Poolewe; Murroes; Inverarity; Friockheim; Dundee; Paisley; Longside; Castle Douglas and Kelton; Ferry Port on Craig; Bon-Accord; Farnell; Saint Clements; West Kilbryde; and Carnoustic; and of female inhabitants of Gargunnock.

The EARL of GALLOWAY (on presenting the petition from Castle Douglas) said: — The petitioners represent that the necessity for the intervention of the Legislature is imperative; and they pray that the subject may be brought under the immediate consideration of Parliament. As I am instructed, the petition is not only numerously, but very generally, signed by the various denominations of persons residing within the district. I do not wish, in the present critical juncture of the affairs of the Church of Scotland, to give a premature opinion on this important question; but, as, when the Noble Earl on the bench behind me put a question to Her Majesty's Ministers the other day, with the view of eliciting the intententions of the Government in respect of it, the answer of the Noble Viscount did not appear to me to be very cordially given, nor to carry with it the promise of a speedy issue, I feel myself compelled to state to the House, for myself,—and I believe I may state as much for every Noble Lord connected with Scotland, — that not a day passes that we do not receive the most distressing representations of the fearful agitation of the public mind, in the sister kingdom, on this all-engrossing topic. I have been informed that a deputation from the General Assembly has come up to London, and has been conferring with the Government. I do not know whether or not my information be correct — I hope it may be. At any rate, I feel it my duty earnestly to entreat the Noble Viscount, as he values the peace and good order of society in Scotland, and much more, as he values the religious interests and welfare of the people,—I entreat him not to allow another month to pass over without using his best exertions to bring this matter to a settlement. I hope he will not be deterred by the impossibility of passing a measure which shall be satisfactory to all parties; but that he will bend his mind to the subject in such a way as to commend it to the well-intentioned and enlightened portion of the community.

BEER ACT.

Lord Portman presented a petition for alteration, — of guardians of the Clutton union.

CORN LAWS.

Petition against alteration of,—of owners and occupiers of land in Hailsham.

POOR LAWS ACT.

Lord Ellenborough presented a petition for alteration of, as to rating workhouses, — of the board of guardians of the Gloucester union.

The foregoing petitions were severally read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FROST, WILLIAMS, AND JONES.

Lord Teynham presented petitions praying that this House will present an Address to Her Majesty for the pardon of said convicts, — of inhabitants of London and Westminster and Finsbury, and of persons signing (three petitions). — Read, and ordered to lie on the table. And a petition of the inhabitants of Kingston upon Hull, in public meeting assembled. — Read, and ordered to be received as the Petition of John Peck (chairman), who, only, has signed it.

Also, petitions for commutation of the sentence passed upon them, — of inhabitants of Cheddington and Chorley.

LORD TEYNHAM (on presenting these petitions) said: — Having heard the lucid exposition of the objection taken by the counsel for those unfortunate men at the time of their trial, by a Noble and Learned Lord not now in his place, I confess I come to the conclusion that they ought to have received a free pardon. The first of these petitions is signed by 1927 individuals. That from Cheddington, which prays only for a commutation of the sentence, is signed by agricultural labourers, who state their complete conviction, that the time has arrived when it will be necessary for this House, for its own safety and security, to consider the present situation of the labourers — particularly the agricultural labourers—of this country, for the purpose of improving and amending their condition.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE PETITION OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY FOR RELIEF.

Several witnesses ordered to attend.

Message to the Commons for William Crawford, Esquire (a Member), to attend.

PAPERS, &c.

PRIVATE BILL NOTICES.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Sir, I have now a petition to present, for which I beg a moment's attention from the House, while I state shortly the circumstances to which it refers. The petitioner, Francis Watts, who is printer and superintendent of the London Gazette, states, that by the Order of the House, several notices concerning Private Bills are required to be inserted in the Gazette. He alleges, that the practice of the parties concerned is, generally, to delay the insertion of these until the last moment. He goes on to state, that the number of notices required to be printed by him is very considerable; and that, since the consequence of a single error in printing a proper name would be fatal to a Bill, the responsibility devolving on him is very considerable. He prays the House to take his case into consideration, and to permit a space of three days at least to elapse between the receipt of the notice, at his office, and the publication.

Petition referred to the Committee on Private Business.

PAPERS, &c.

Postage (Poor Law Commission). — On the motion of Mr. Barneby, — Returns ordered —

Of the total amount of expenses incurred by the boards of guardians in England and Wales for correspondence with the Poor Law Commissioners, or assistant Commissioners, between the 10th day of January and the 20th day of February, 1840:

Of copies of any orders or circulars sent by the Poor Law Commissioners to the boards of guardians in England and Wales relative to the postage of letters:

Of copies of any answers or resolutions received from the boards of guardians relative to the same.

Letters Patent. — On the motion of Sir Robert Peel, — Address for —

Returns of the cases, if any, in which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has reported to Her Majesty upon the petition of any person having obtained letters patent, and presenting such petition for the exercise of the power given to Her Majesty under the second section of the Act 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 83.; together with the Report of the result of such petitions:

Of the cases in which applications have been made for the prolongation of the term of any patent, and have been referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, under the fourth section of the Act above mentioned; together with the result of such applications.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. ORD. — Sir, I beg to lay before the House the Report I hold in my hand, agreed to by the General Committee of Elections, of which I have the honour to be chairman. The necessity for this Report has arisen in consequence of a difficulty which has occurred in considering the Ludlow election petition. Owing to the proper notice not having been duly served on the parties petitioning against the return, those parties have not been able to comply with the Act of Parliament; and they having petitioned the Committee, stating certain causes for such irregularity, we have thought it necessary to make this Report; which I now move may be read by the clerk at the table, and printed with the Votes. I beg, also, to move that the petition of G. Cooper and others be referred to the General Committee on elections.

The Report was then brought up, and read, as follows: —

Report from General Committee of Elections.

Mr. Ord reported from the General Committee of Elections, that a difficulty has arisen in the case of the Ludlow election petition, in consequence of the notices required by the Act (2 & 3 Vic. c. 38.) having been served on Thomas Alcock, Esquire, instead of on the parties who, it appears, were, in the last Session of Parliament, admitted to defend the return.

That the Committee find, on referring to the Journals of the last Session, that, on the 8th day of July last, Mr. Speaker acquainted the House that he had received a letter from Thomas Alcock, Esquire, who was returned a burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the borough of Ludlow, stating that he, the said Thomas Alcock, did not intend to defend his return for the said borough; and that, upon the 10th day of July, a petition from George Hooper, John Nash, and William Downes, of Ludlow, was presented, praying to be admitted as parties to defend the election and return of the said Thomas Alcock, Esquire; and that the House ordered that the petitioners be admitted parties, in the room of the said Thomas Alcock, Esquire.

That, by the 48th section of the Act, "Notices are directed to be given to all the parties petitioning, and to the sitting Member or Members, and to any parties who may have petitioned to be permitted to defend the election or return, and whose petition shall have been referred to the General Committee."

That the petition of George Hooper and others has not yet been referred by the House to the Committee; and the Committee, not being aware of the existence of that petition at the time when they appointed the day for choosing the Select Committee to try the Ludlow election petition, directed the notices to be served on Thomas Alcock, Esquire, as the sitting Member, and the parties petitioning against the return.

That the Committee having appointed the 12th day of March for choosing the Select Committee to try the Ludlow election petition, and the 47th section of the Act requiring that three weeks' notice should be given to the several parties entitled thereto, it will be necessary for the Committee (in case the House should think fit to refer to them the said petition of George Hooper and others) to appoint another and more distant day, in lieu of the day originally appointed for choosing the Select Committe to try the Ludlow petition, in order that the proper notices may be given; and the 52d section of the Act, directing that the General Committee should not in any case proceed to choose a Committee to try any election petition, until they shall have chosen a Committee to try every other election petition standing higher in the list prepared by them, in conformity with the provisions of the 30th section of the Act; it will be further necessary that a corresponding change should be made in the days which have been appointed for choosing Select Committees to try the election petitions standing in the Committee's list, after the Ludlow election petition.

That, under these circumstances, the Committee recommend that the petition of George Hooper and others should be referred to them by the House; and that the order of the House for the attendance of Panel 1. on the 12th of March, and Panel 2. on the 16th of March, be discharged, in order that the succeeding panel or panels may be summoned for the days which it will now be the duty of the Committee to appoint.

SIR G. CLERK. — Sir, I rise to express my concurrence in this motion. I perfectly agree with the Honourable Member for Newcastle, that the Report should be printed, and the subject brought under the consideration of the House to-morrow. But, feeling great anxiety for the success of the new Act for deciding controverted elections, I wish to call the attention of the House to some other irregularities which have taken place in serving the notices on the Ludlow election petition. I understand that this Report refers only to no notice having been served on those who appear in support of the sitting Member. But I believe that no notice has been served on the electors who originally petitioned against the return. If I have been correctly informed, the messengers, instead of delivering the notices to the persons who petitioned against the return, left them with the agent of the sitting Member. I wish to have this matter explained; and therefore I shall move that, to-morrow, Mr. Rose, the clerk attending the General Committee on Elections, Stein, the messenger, and Poingdestre, the assistant messenger, be called to the bar of the House to explain how it was that the notices were not served on the proper parties.

Report to be taken into consideration to-morrow, and to be printed.

Ordered, that Mr. John Rose, Mr. Stein, and Mr. Poingdestre do attend the House to-morrow.

TAXATION. — SALT DUTIES.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — As I see the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, I will take this opportunity of calling his attention to a report on a matter which I think is one of great importance; and, as much anxiety prevails in the public mind upon it, the Right Honourable Gentleman, I trust, will not refuse to make such a statement as may tend to relieve that anxiety; I allude to the intention of the Government, if report speak truly, to lay a tax upon salt. I wish to ask, first, if that be true? In the next place, although the Right Honourable Gentleman may not be disposed to permit me to dive into the arcana of the national Budget, perhaps I shall be allowed to ask when the financial statement for this year will be made?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I am sure that the House will at once see the impropriety of my giving an answer to the first question put by the Honourable and Gallant Member. With regard to the Budget, I can assure the Honourable and Gallant Member that I am as anxious as he can be that the financial statement should be made as soon after the expiration of the financial year as possible.

NEW WRIT FOR PERTHSHIRE.

SIR G. CLERK. — I am anxious to call the attention of the House to a matter which is important, because it is connected with the exercise of our privileges. It will be recollected that on Friday evening last, the Speaker was directed to issue his warrant for a new writ for the election of a Knight of the Shire to serve in Parliament for Perthshire, in the room of Viscount Stormont, who has succeeded to the title of Viscount Stormont, in the peerage of Scotland. I believe that a writ was issued from the Crown Office, and despatched that evening to Perthshire, which was not in conformity with the order of the House, directing, as it did, the election of a Member for Perthshire, in the room of Viscount Stormont, who had been called up to the House of Peers as the Earl of Mansfield. In the course of the same evening, the error was discovered, and a second writ was despatched by the mail, on Saturday morning, in conformity with the rules of the House. As election writs are not issued by any officer under the authority of the House, but of the Crown; as the orders of the House ought to be strictly executed; and as this has been the first instance, I believe, in which such an error has been committed, I shall now move that the Deputy Clerk of the Crown be ordered to attend at the bar of the House to-morrow, for the purpose of explaining how this error has arisen.

On the question being put, —

MR. FOX MAULE said: — From the part I have taken in issuing the writ, I feel bound to say that I approve of the course pursued by the Honourable Baronet on this question. No doubt, an error was committed, on the occasion in question; — in fact, it is publicly known that two writs were issued. But the Clerk of the Crown will, unquestionably, be able to explain how the mistake occurred. I know nothing beyond what I have gathered from a statement made by the clerk himself. I have, therefore, no objection to make to the motion of the Right Honourable Baronet, but will, on the contrary, second it.

Ordered, that the Deputy Clerk of the Crown do attend this House to-morrow.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS BILL.

SIR E. WILMOT. — I wish to ask the Under Secretary of the Home Office a question. I yesterday assented to a proposition made by that Honourable Gentleman, — that the Juvenile Offenders Bill which I had brought in, should go to a Committee up-stairs. As it is an important measure, I wish to know whether the Government will take it into their own hands, and appoint their own Committee, in order to investigate the subject? If so, both myself and several other Gentlemen, I believe, will most willingly lend the Government every assistance to make the measure useful and advantageous to the public.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Sir, as the Honourable Baronet has not given me any intimation that he intended to put this question, I am unable to give an answer to it at present. The measure is one replete with difficulties; and it will require some grave deliberation before any decision can be come to by the Government, as to whether they will undertake it or not.

HILL COOLIES.

SIR E. WILMOT. — I beg to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies on what day he intends to bring under the consideration of the House the subject of the emigration of Hill Coolies to the West Indies?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I am not at present prepared to name any day; but I will take care that due notice of it shall be given. With respect to the Bill, to which the Honourable Baronet has just now adverted, I wish to know whether the Honourable Baronet means that the Government should take charge of that particular Bill, or that they should direct their attention to the whole subject?

SIR E. WILMOT. — My meaning was, that the Government should take up the whole question, with a view to legislate upon it effectively; and, knowing how often it has been under the notice of the Government in various ways, I cannot but express a hope that it will receive attention in that quarter.

POST OFFICE.

Mr. PRYME. — I wish to ask a question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer concerning the present Post Office regulations. At present, a prepaid letter, on arriving at a post office town, and being re-directed forwards, is charged with double postage. I wish to ask whether that is consistent with the new regulations?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Directions have been already issued that, in such cases, the charge should be 1*d*. only; an arrangement which will be an advantage to the Post Office; for it will save much trouble in sorting letters.

THE CENSUS.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Sir, as ten years have now elapsed since a census of the population has been taken, I wish to ask whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to have one taken this year?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I believe that it is the intention of Government to have a census taken this year.

CONTRACTS FOR PAPER.

SIR M. WOOD. — Sir, some few weeks ago Government advertised a contract for 24,000 reams of paper. Several persons have sent in tenders, but no reply has been yet given to them. I wish to ask the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when it is likely that answers will be sent to these tenders?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The tenders have been sent into the Excise Office, but the chairman of the Board of Excise has referred some points to the consideration of the Treasury. This has caused the delay. I believe, however, that the tenders will be answered in a day or two.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Mr. EWART. — I wish, now, to call the attention of the House to a subject of very great importance. The subject to which I allude is, the exclusive power now possessed by the serjeants-at-law of practising in the Court of Common Pleas, while they share in common with the entire bar the practice of the other courts. This is an evil which had attracted attention so long ago as the time of Lord Chief Justice Coke, who said, that the binding up of the Court of Common Pleas to the serjeants was a great disadvantage to the public. In the reign of George II., in the year 1755, a Bill was introduced into this House, the object of which was to do away with the exclusive privileges of serjeants-at-law; but from circumstances which I need not repeat, that Bill was not passed. In the year 1829, a Commission was appointed under the authority of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, which Commission made a Report and recommended certain alterations. But their recommendations were not acted upon; and nothing more was done, in relation to this subject, until the year 1834, when, at the suggestion of Lord Brougham, who was then Lord Chancellor, a Royal warrant was issued, freely opening the Court of Common Pleas to the bar in general; and from the date of that warrant, in 1834, to the end of last year, the court has continued an open court to all the bar. A case, however, was subsequently brought before the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, by which he was called upon to decide whether, by law, the serjeants were possessed of the exclusive privilege which was claimed for them, or not. The decision of the court was, that the serjeants did possess the privilege; and since that time the court has been closed against the bar in general, to the same extent as before, leaving the exclusive privilege in the hands of the serjeants. The object I have in view, in moving for these Returns, is, to show what has been the effect of opening the Court of Common Pleas to the bar, and what also has been the effect of closing it; to show what has been the effect with respect to the feeling of the bar, and what it is with respect to the interests of the public. I cannot conceive any ground upon which this motion will be opposed. I do not see my Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General in his place; but I cannot suppose — serjeant though the Honourable and Learned Gentleman is — that he would oppose the motion. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has lately stood up for the privileges of the House, for the sake of the public interest; and therefore I cannot think he will now advocate the exclusive privileges of the law serjeants against the public interest. I beg, Sir, to move an Address for the following Returns: —

An Address for "copy of the warrant of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, under which the Court of Common Pleas was opened to King's counsel and outer barristers, and which was published in that court on the 25th day of April, 1834:

"Of the number of actions commenced in the Courts of Queen's Bench, Exchequer, and Common Pleas, respectively, each year, for the period of five years, prior to the publication of the said warrant, and five years subsequent thereto:

"Of the date at which the Court of Common Pleas gave its judgment, determining no longer to hear Queen's counsel and outer barristers; but to restore an exclusive privilege to the serjeants:

"Of the number of causes and rules standing for argument in the said courts respectively, in the special paper, new trial paper, peremptory paper, or paper for enlarged rules, Crown paper, and other papers, if any, kept in the said courts for the entry of arrears, on the first day of each term within the same period:

"Of the number of days after each term appointed by the said courts respectively for sitting, under the provisions of the Act 1 and 2 Vic. c. 32.:

"Of the number of causes, distinguishing between special jury and common jury causes, standing for trial at Nisi Prius, in each of the said courts, in London and Middlesex, on the first day of each sitting, within the same period:

"Of the number of summonses taken out at the chamber of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, in the months of January and February, respectively, 1839."

Question put, and agreed to. Returns ordered.

POST OFFICE.

Mr. WALLACE. — Sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to a subject which is of much importance to the small community to which it relates. The House will recollect that a petition upon this subject was presented, a short time since, from the parish of Bowden, in the county of Roxburgh, complaining that the inhabitants had, at the time, neither post office nor post. These inhabitants have expressed their willingness to defray the expenses of a post office in their own part of the country, if the Postmaster General would appoint a person to that situation. I do not wish, however, by this motion, to cast any blame on the Postmaster General. I am quite aware that the Post Office has recently been put to a great deal of trouble by the new regulations; but when the immediate difficulties of these fresh arrangements have passed away, I am sure that the Postmaster General himself will see the necessity of making a total change in the management of the country post offices. But, Sir, although the case I am bringing under your notice is a hard one, being that of a community of 1200 persons without a post office, I have been lately surprised to find that it is not at all a singular one. I have recently received a letter from a gentleman in Leicestershire, describing the condition of that part of the country in which he lives, as regards post offices.

Between the towns of Leicester and Nottingham, of Melton Mowbray and Market Harborough, there is no immediate post office communication; they have coaches enough, but no direct post office communication; and there are many places in Kent and Essex, as well as in other parts of the country, which are similarly circumstanced. I feel perfectly satisfied that any improvement in this respect will greatly conduce to an improvement of the revenue derived from the Post Office; and I am equally certain that, in the present year, the deficiency in that revenue will not by any means be so great as the opponents of Post Office reform are disposed to anticipate. I do not believe that the deficiency will amount to anything like 1,200,000*l.* or 1,400,000*l.*; but, on the contrary, I feel perfectly convinced that it will not exceed 700,000*l.*; and that the subsequent improvement in that branch of the public income will fully repay the loss. The letters now passing through the Post Office are triple the number that passed previous to the alteration in the rates of postage; and in many places they have increased fivefold. In Newcastle they are now four times the number that they were; in Dublin they are threefold; and in various parts of Ireland three and fourfold. The Honourable Member for South Durham has stated to me that the increase in his district has been fourfold; and I have received communications from various parts of Scotland, stating the increase to be three and fourfold. I have been rather surprised to find that the increase has been less in the capitals of England and Ireland than in the surrounding districts of each country. I, of course, cannot account for this; but I feel that the new system cannot have fair play except there be plenty of post office accommodation given. At first, the new system cannot possibly give universal contentment; but I have confident hopes that the effect of the stamps proposed to be used will be to afford great public accommodation. The whole of the change made is one of immense importance to the community at large; and therefore we ought not unduly to complain of any deficiency which it may occasion; but the representatives of the people should look attentively to the means which are to be adopted for supplying that deficiency; and now, that they have taken a burden off the poor, they should not consent to a fresh burden being imposed in lieu thereof upon the same parties; they should rather make the rich pay the expense of the improvement. It occurs to me, that there are three modes in which the deficiency might be provided for: one is an equalised legacy duty, affecting real equally with personal property; the second, a fixed duty upon corn; and the third, a property tax. Without troubling the House with any further observation, I beg to move, "That it is the duty of the Postmaster General to afford all reasonable facilities and accommodation to communities who have not a post office or a post at present, especially to such as have a desire to send their letters openly and legally, and who shall apply to the Postmaster General for the usual means of doing so: — That the case of more than 1000 inhabitants in the parish of Bowden, in the county of Roxburgh, as represented in their petition to this House, is one of great hardship, and directly in point; therefore, that the prayer of the petitioners should be granted, by the Postmaster General affording to them similar post office accommodation to that enjoyed by their neighbours in the adjoining parishes."

On the question being put,—

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said: — I trust that my Honourable Friend will not feel offended if I decline to follow him through the whole of the observations which he has addressed to the House, and if I shall rather content myself with shortly stating the grounds upon which I think it my duty to oppose the resolution. When the arrangements for carrying the plan of penny postage into effect were about to be adopted, my Noble Friend the Postmaster General brought before me a statement of what might be done for the purpose of extending the system of the Post Office; and it cannot be denied that since then, as well as before that time, a considerable extension has been accomplished. In consequence, however, of the great increase of correspondence since the introduction of the new system, I took upon myself to direct that no steps should for some time be taken with any view to an extension of the Post Office department; and I recommended my Noble Friend to make no change, that could be avoided, till the pressure of the great transition to the penny postage should have, in some degree, abated. I admit that it is the duty of the Postmaster and of the Government to extend the system of the Post Office as widely as possible, not only as an accommodation to the public, but as a valuable source of revenue; yet still it must be felt that the present is not the proper moment to press the Government or the Post Office for any changes that can possibly be postponed; and I hope that my Honourable Friend the Member for Greenock will withdraw his motion.

Mr. LUCAS. — I presume that the principal object of the Honourable Member's motion is, that which stands first in order; but I am afraid that few Members are sufficiently acquainted with the locality alluded to, to be enabled to give an opinion upon it. I think that there would be great public advantage in the Government and the House having a map of the United Kingdom, displaying the Post Office accommodation, and the proportion which it bears to the wealth, population, and general circumstances of each district.

Mr. HUME. — I hope that, after the candid avowal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, my Honourable Friend the Member for Greenock will not, under present circumstances, press his motion.

SIR R. PEEL. — I wish to take this opportunity of inquiring from the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), when the House may expect to have laid before them the Returns relating to the Post Office, which were, some time ago, ordered? I wish, also, to know, how soon it is probable that stamped covers will come into general use?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — With regard to the last question, I regret that I am not in a position to say how soon it will be in the power of the Post Office to introduce stamped covers. It is intended, in the first instance, to limit their use to the twopenny post district; at all events, not to extend them beyond the local posts; so as to keep their operation within the immediate view and knowledge of my Noble Friend at the head of the Post Office; and after the experiment shall have been tried upon a small scale, it is proposed to effect its general adoption. Various difficulties have presented themselves in the course of the measures which have been taken with reference to the stamped covers; there have been some mechanical failures in carrying the designs into effect; and, owing to several causes, I fear that some time must elapse before they can be brought into general use.

SIR R. PEEL. — I presume that the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite means, by the twopenny post district, that which formerly was subjected to a twopenny rate, and that which now forms the London district?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — That was my meaning. The object with which it is proposed to limit it to that district is, for the purpose of having the working of the stamped plan as much as possible under the eye of the General Post Office. The Returns to which the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth refers are in course of preparation; and I hope, before long, that it will be in my power to lay them on the table of the House.

Mr. WARBURTON. — If such be the Chancellor of the Exchequer's object, I would suggest that the best plan would be, to try the stamped covers first in the local districts of London, of Edinburgh, and of Dublin.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I think that all letters put into the London post office might be on stamped paper; not regulating them by the district to which they are to go, but the place at which they are posted.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The two post offices — namely, the General Post Office, and that which was the twopenny post — are still kept distinct, though the rate of postage is the same in both.

Mr. HERRIES. — In my opinion, the stamp must be varied, otherwise we shall not be able to distinguish the districts.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I must admit these difficulties; but I hope it will not take long to overcome them.

SIR R. PEEL. — I am inclined to think that there is likely to result considerable advantage from making a partial experiment. I think that the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite ought to consider well the proposition for having a special cover for the London district; and there can be no objection to its having a general circulation, if posted within the district, as is the case with the printed covers now used by Members of Parliament. They must be put into a particular office, but may be carried to any part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. ELLIOT. — Sir, I beg, in consequence of the assurance of the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and on behalf of the county in which the petitioners reside, and which I have the honour to represent, to request that my Honourable Friend will consent to withdraw his motion.

Mr. WALLACE. — I have to say one word in reply to the observations of the Honourable Member for Monaghan. I can inform that Honourable Member that there are excellent maps attached to the Report of the Postage Committee. They were prepared with great care and accuracy; and I would anxiously recommend them to the attention of the Honourable Member. If he will take the trouble to look over them, he will see that, in by-gone times, wherever there were deer parks and abundance of game, there was no want of mail coaches and post offices; but that the interests of the several communities were considered matters of small importance. Resting satisfied with what has fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have no objection to withdraw my motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

GREENWICH AND CHELSEA ASYLUM SCHOOLS.

Mr. LANGDALE. — Sir, it was my intention to move for "An Address to Her Majesty, that she would be graciously pleased to direct the Commissioners for the Asylum Schools of Chelsea, Southampton, and Greenwich, to make such modifications in the regulations therein in force as may secure to the children of Catholic and Protestant dissenting soldiers and sailors, if duly qualified, the benefit of those establishments, without the sacrifice of their religion;" but I would first ask the Government a question, and if that shall be satisfactorily answered, I will not occupy the time of the House by proceeding further with the subject. The question I wish to ask is this — whether or not, with respect to the children alluded to in my motion, the necessity of their being instructed in the principles of the Established Church, if their parents dissent from those principles, may not be dispensed with; and, secondly, whether they may not be allowed on Sunday to attend their own place of worship?

Mr. MACAULAY. — I earnestly hope that my Honourable Friend will consent to withdraw his motion; because, if not, worded as it is, I regret to say that I shall feel it my duty to oppose it. Knowing how very large a proportion of the army and navy is composed of persons conscientiously dissenting from the Established Church, I am quite sure that no Gentleman in the House will say that the rewards which those gallant men have earned in the service of their country should be withheld from their children, in consequence of their religious dissent. I can never adopt such a doctrine; but at the same time any change in the establishments referred to by the Honourable Member should be made with great care and caution; and if the Honourable Member will consent to withdraw his motion, I will assure him that the subject shall be immediately and seriously considered by the Government, with the most earnest desire to do everything that can be required for attaining the end he has in view. At the same time, I would just say, that as far as I am concerned, I foresee no objection to the children attending their own place of worship, and not being compelled to learn the Church Catechism.

Mr. LANGDALE. — After the assurance I have just heard from the Right Honourable the Secretary at War, I feel that I should not be justified in persevering in my intention to press my motion.

COMPTROLLER OF THE EXCHEQUER.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Sir, in rising to move the resolutions of which I have given notice, I must express my satisfaction that on this question the Government seem determined to "show fight." For the champion they have put forward on this occasion, I must say, in commencing, that I entertain the highest possible respect; and were it not for the confidence which an honest cause always inspires, I should shrink from a contest with so able an antagonist. But, at the same time that I express my respect for the champion, I cannot compliment him on the choice of his weapons; because an amendment more pointless or tame than that of the Noble Lord I have never seen. Before I call the attention of the House to the resolutions which I have myself proposed, I must beg leave to examine the amendment, so called, of the Noble Lord. It concludes by stating, —

> That it appears to this House that the Right Honourable Sir J. Newport, in his official capacity of Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, exerted himself to the utmost to restrain useless expenses, to promote education, and to improve trade and intercourse between Ireland and the other parts of the United Kingdom: that, while in the said office, he directed, and after leaving office suggested, various inquiries which led to the adoption by Parliament of measures highly conducive to the better administration of the law, and beneficial to the revenue.

That is put in a great number of words; but all it means is, that, during the time Sir John Newport held an official appointment in Ireland, he endeavoured to do his duty. It amounts to nothing more. Since the first discussion on this question, I have taken the advice of the Noble Lord, and have referred to those periods when Sir John Newport was in an official capacity in Ireland; and I am now willing to admit that I have no fault whatever to find with the right honourable gentleman during the short period that he filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer in that country. The chief object, however, which he effected during that time, was establishing the principle of a free intercourse of trade between Great Britain and Ireland. But Sir John Newport is not to found his claims to the approbation of this House on being the sole advocate of that measure. I am prepared to assert that that question had been fully considered by those great men who carried the Union; and Mr. Pitt himself was long aware of the necessity of doing away with the restriction on trade between the two countries. Sir John Newport, therefore, did not follow out his own suggestion, or that of the Government to which he belonged; but a course which was almost self-evident, and had been deemed necessary ever since the period of the union with Ireland. Therefore, let us not suppose that to him, alone, is due the credit of working out the free trade principle. The Noble Lord's resolution goes on to say, —

That, after serving for five years in the honourable office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, being then upwards of eighty years of age, and afflicted with bodily infirmity, he withdrew from public life, respected for the unblemished integrity of his character, to pass in retirement the remainder of his days.

Now, that part of the resolution is not strictly correct. Sir John Newport had withdrawn from public life before he received the appointment of Comptroller of the Exchequer. In his last address to his constituents at Waterford, Sir John Newport said, that, from bodily infirmity, he was unable to perform the duties of a Member of Parliament; and he therefore withdrew from their representation on those grounds: he then withdrew from public life, and yet, subsequently, received the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer. Now, Sir, I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion that the original appointment of Sir John Newport to the responsible and effective and active office of Comptroller of the Exchequer was an injudicious appointment, and not made in the true spirit of the Act of Parliament which created that office. On looking to that Act of Parliament, and to the debate which took place when the Bill for that Act was introduced, I would say, it was never intended that the office then created should be a sinecure office; but that, on the contrary, it was to be a highly active and responsible office. And I do maintain, that to appoint to that office a gentleman at an advanced age, who had previously retired from public life, was, on the very statement of the case, injudicious and improper. The Noble Lord's resolution then goes on to say, —

That, considering that Sir John Newport was not in affluent circumstances when he thus withdrew from office, this House is satisfied that the grant of a pension to a retired Comptroller of the Exchequer, in circumstances so peculiar, cannot be drawn into a precedent in favour of persons who have not just claims on the Royal beneficence, and are not distinguished by the performance of duties to the public.

Now, the Noble Lord may assume that this grant of a pension to Sir John Newport cannot be drawn into a precedent; but I, in my resolution, go further; for I contend that it ought not to be. I dispute the Noble Lord's assumption. If the House take it for granted, it is begging the question; and I will warn the House that most assuredly it may, and will, be drawn into a precedent on future occasions. I would remind the House, — as I have expressed it in one of the resolutions which I have the honour now to propose, — of "the great importance of keeping the Comptroller General of the Exchequer independent of the influence of the Crown." If, then, a Comptroller of the Exchequer, after a term of service, is to be pensioned off, according to the will of the then existing Government, I will ask you, — what will become of the independence of the office? Would anything be easier than for a future Comptroller of the Exchequer to apply to the Government of the day, and allege his great anxiety to retire, and to place at their disposal one of the most honourable offices under the Crown? Would anything be easier, therefore, if, according to the precedent established in the case of Sir John Newport, the Crown were willing to grant such applicant a pension — which, after this example, he might have very just reason to expect — for the faithful performance of his duty, and if the Government were willing to accept his resignation, than for them to appoint some other person in his place, but not allowing him to retire without a pension? I contend that it is incumbent on the House, now that the question is fairly brought before it, to come to such a vote as shall take away the chances of such jobbing for the future. After noticing the latter part of the Noble Lord's amendment, I had almost forgotten to refer to the former part of it; but I must say, it requires some little study to find out the enigma which that part contains. All I can gather from it is, — but I do not pretend that my solution is the correct one, —that, let Parliament hold what language it pleases, and make what regulations it thinks proper for the public service; even if an Act have been passed for the purpose by the Legislature of the country, means will still be found, if the will exist, for — I will not say a corrupt, but — a jobbing Government, to evade and set at nought those regulations which the House had in vain attempted to impose. If there be any meaning at all in the first part of the Noble Lord's amendment, that must be it; if there be any further meaning in it, the Noble Lord, and not I, must be the Œdipus to solve the enigma.

Now, after having observed on the amendment of the Noble Lord, I hope I may be permitted to make some observations on the resolutions which I am about to propose. Those resolutions appear to flow very naturally from the principle which I have attempted to lay down; and which I consider to be embodied in the Act of Parliament referred to by me when this matter was first brought forward. My first resolution recites, "That it appears that the said Comptroller General filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland during the period of thirteen months only, — namely, from the month of February, 1806, to the month of April, 1807." What says the warrant under which Sir John Newport receives his pension? The grounds on which his pension has been granted may be divided into two parts; the one, for zealous and efficient service, rendered to the public during the period that he was out of office; and the other, for similar service, rendered whilst he was in office, including the short period during which he was Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, and, strange to say, the period during which he was Comptroller General. I think that the House, on the former discussion, gave its assent to this great principle, that, although some cases of necessity and exception might arise, yet to lay down as a principle that a mere public and parliamentary life, independently of official service, ought to be rewarded with a pension, was most dangerous, especially considering the disinclination of the Crown to grant pensions in these days. I think, then, I may fairly hold, that, in respect of his parliamentary life, Sir John Newport was not entitled to a pension. As to his official service, let the House see on what ground the pension could be claimed. The Act of 4 & 5 William IV. c. 24. says, —

> That no person shall be qualified to receive any pension on the ground of public duties performed in the highest offices of the state, unless he shall have continued in the performance of such duties for a period of two years at the least.

And it is, therefore, perfectly clear that Sir John Newport had no claim to a pension for the time during which he had performed the duties of the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, as that period was only thirteen months. The right honourable gentleman then attained to the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer; and with respect to that office, one of my resolutions goes on to say, "That it appears that it was also specially provided by the said Act, 4 & 5 William IV. c. 24., that the holder of the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer should be precluded, on his retirement from that office, from all claim to any of the pensions which the Crown was thereby empowered to bestow for civil or political services." It is, therefore, perfectly clear, that, for his service as Comptroller of the Exchequer, Sir John Newport had no claim to a pension. I have thus divided the life of that right honourable gentleman into his public and parliamentary life, and his official life, and have shown, that, for the former, the House cannot allow the principle of granting pensions; and that, for the latter, he is precluded from all claim to a pension by the Act. But the Government say, they admit all this; and, on the principle (I suppose) that two negatives make an affirmative, because Sir John Newport had no claim for parliamentary services, and no claim for official services, they have granted him a pension of 1000*l.* a-year!

I have already reminded the House of the great importance,— set forth, indeed, in the Act of Parliament itself, and recognised by this House, — of keeping the Comptroller of the Exchequer wholly independent of all possible influence of the Crown; and I will now go forward to that resolution which I am about to propose, that refers particularly to the Act of the 1st and 2d of Victoria: — "That it appears that provision was made in the Act of the 1st and 2d Victoria c. 2. that the sum which Her Majesty might be empowered to grant in pensions on the Civil List in any one year should not exceed the sum of 1200*l.*; and that, in conformity with a previous resolution of this House, such pensions should be granted to such persons only as might have just claims on the Royal beneficence, or who, by their personal services to the Crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science, and attainments in literature and the arts, had merited the gracious consideration of the Sovereign, and the gratitude of the country." Sir, I have read this, because, after disposing of this part of the question, I shall feel it my duty to make some observations on the present mode of dispensing the Royal bounty. But this much I must say, — as far as I can learn, by reference to the list of pensions granted since that resolution was passed, the spirit of that Act of the 1st and 2d of Victoria has been rigidly adhered to; and I believe that no fault whatever can be found with the pensions which have been granted by the Crown since that time, with the exception of the case we are now discussing — the pension of Sir John Newport. I am therefore most anxious that the House should affirm the last resolution which I have the honour to propose. It is this: — "That, considering all these circumstances, and more especially the great importance of keeping the Comptroller General of the Exchequer independent of the influence of the Crown, as also of insuring a strict adherence to the spirit of the resolution of this House on the subject of civil list pensions, this House deems it expedient to express its decided opinion that the grant of 1000*l.* a-year to Sir John Newport, under the warrant before mentioned, ought not to be drawn into a precedent." It is perfectly true that my resolutions are very mildly worded; but I considered it much safer and wiser, rather to understate than attempt to overstate the case which I wish to establish, and which, I hope, the House will assent to. But, although these resolutions are so mildly worded, they call upon the House to recognise two great principles; — the first, — that of keeping the Comptroller of the Exchequer independent of the influence of the Crown; and the second, to adhere strictly to the resolution we have passed on the subject of granting pensions. I do not wish to go farther into that point. I have brought forward this question on public grounds, on account of the principle and manner on and in which this pension has been conferred; but the Noble Lord, in his amendment, has put the argument altogether ad misericordiam. To that part of the subject I have no wish to direct the attention of the House; I have no wish to exercise any sort of harshness towards the right honourable gentleman, nor to withdraw from him the pension he enjoys; but I think that the granting of it was an experiment that ought not to be repeated. On a question of this sort, when so much may be said concerning the question of pensions and the propriety of granting them, I have thought it right to look into the list of pensions granted since the resolution passed the House; and, as I stated before, I see in that list no reason to find fault. I conceive that the spirit of that resolution has been in all cases strictly adhered to; and, as far as I can judge, the individuals selected for those pensions have been eminently deserving of the favour conferred on them by the Crown. Among those names, I find some that do honour to this, and would do honour to any other, country. I find among them the names of Southey, Moore, Doctor Brewster, Miss Mitford, Mrs. Somerville, and of several other eminent persons. But there is one great name, equal, if not superior, to any that I have mentioned, which I do not see in that list — the name of a man who has done more than any who ever lived, to open the heart to the most kindly influences of human nature, and who, in his writings, combines the most exalted spirit of piety with the purest inspiration of poetry. I need hardly say that the name to which I allude is that of Wordsworth.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Mr. Wordsworth holds an office.

MR. LIDDELL. — I am aware of that circumstance; and I have not brought forward Mr. Wordsworth's name by way of a reproach to the Government; but I must make one or two observations on the facts of the case. It is true that Mr. Wordsworth holds a provincial office which affords him a tolerably respectable income; and an offer was made, undoubtedly in a spirit of kindness, and it was received in the same spirit, to transfer Mr. Wordsworth's appointment to his son, and to place the name of Mr. Wordsworth himself upon the Pension List. But the amount of the proposed pension was so much lower than that awarded to other persons of literary distinction, — being, in fact, no more than 150*l.* a-year, — that, although Mr. Wordsworth cherishes as little pride, perhaps, as any human being, a just and commendable self-esteem induced him to decline a provision by means of which his name would have appeared on the Civil List in a position inferior to those of other individuals whom he might, without vanity, not consider equal to himself. As I have already observed, I do not consider these facts as a reproach to Her Majesty's Government, although it would be a great satisfaction to me, as well as, I believe, to the House, to see Mr. Wordsworth's name placed on the same footing as those of his literary compeers, by an act of bounty, which would confer as much honour on the donor as on the recipient. Another instance to which I would advert, is one of a very different nature, in which, to my own knowledge, a small pension was applied for on behalf of a person in humble life, but who was deserving of the highest praise and admiration. I refer to her with pride and satisfaction, because she is a fellow countrywoman of mine — I mean Grace Darling.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and, "Oh, oh!"]

Do Honourable Members know the circumstances of the case? Perhaps, when they have heard the whole of it, they will desist from interruption. Do they know that this humble individual, residing on a barren rock, did, by her courage and determination, rescue no fewer than eleven of her fellow creatures from destruction? Such an event could not take place without creating a great sensation in the neighbourhood of the scene where it occurred; and I know that an application was made for a small pension of 50*l*. a-year for life for the female whose conduct has been the subject of universal commendation. The application was not made because she needed to ask the public for means of support; she belongs to a family who are placed above want; but it was thought that a small pension might well have been so appropriated, for the sake of example, especially under the reign of a female Sovereign. However, the pension was asked — and refused. These are two cases which certainly do appear to present favourable objects for Royal consideration; but to these two cases, I repeat, I do not refer for the purpose of reproaching the Government. There is, however, one more case which has been brought under my notice within the last eight-and-forty hours; and I believe a more melancholy narrative it never has been the lot of any Honourable Member to lay before the House; it will show how far Her Majesty's Government is disposed to dispense equal justice to all classes of the community. Sir, in the year 1800, a gentleman named Horatio Leggatt filled a situation in the Office of Taxes; in 1820, the solicitor to the office having retired, Mr. Leggatt succeeded him in his office, at a salary of 1500*l*. a-year. In 1833, Mr. Leggatt, after thirty-four years of public service, without the slightest imputation upon his character, and after enjoying the confidence of successive Governments as solicitor to the Board of Taxes, was compelled to retire, owing to the consolidation of the Boards of Stamps and Taxes, upon a retiring allowance of 1300*l*. a-year. While he filled his official situation, he had a residence annexed to his office, the value of which to him and his family might be estimated at an additional 1000*l*. a-year; and there were, besides, emoluments arising from the situation, which made it altogether worth about 3000*l*. a-year. In 1838, this gentleman, having suffered grievously in his mind from the embarrassment consequent upon the reduction of his income from 3000*l*. a-year to 1300*l*., with a family of six children, dependent upon him for support, put a period to his existence, leaving a widow with a jointure of 300*l*. a-year for her support and that of her children, the eldest being seventeen, and the youngest only two years of age. Under these circumstances, Mrs. Leggatt memorialised, first, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and then the First Lord of the Treasury. One would have thought that this lady, the widow of a man who had for a whole term of thirty-four years performed his duties to the satisfaction of the Government, might, under the circumstances of destitution in which she was placed, have used successfully the argumentum ad misericordiam which the Noble Lord who has moved the amendment to the present motion has placed upon the Votes. Now, Sir, I hold in my hand the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the application made on Mrs. Leggatt's behalf: —

Downing Street, August 22. 1839.

Sir, — I am desired by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th, and to express his regret that your former communication should have remained unanswered. He directs me to inform you, that it will not be in his power to relieve Mrs. Leggatt in the object she has in view, as it does not belong to the business of his department to submit for Her Majesty's gracious consideration the applications that may be made for the grant of a pension. This, duty, he desires me to add, is confined to the First Lord of the Treasury.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
W. Leake, Esq. R. Bourke.

In consequence of this letter, Mrs. Leggatt applied to Lord Melbourne, from whom she received the following reply: —

Downing Street, Sept. 5. 1839.

Madam, — I am desired by Viscount Melbourne to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of August 30., and to inform you that, in consequence of regulations that have been laid down by the House of Commons with regard to pensions, he is unable to comply with your request

I have the honour to be
Your obedient servant,
Mrs. A. Leggatt. E. Howard.

I wish to know whether this was equal justice? Can any one deny that a just claim was made out in this case for the gracious consideration of the Crown? Can any one deny, that if the First Lord of the Treasury could, consistently with the regulations prescribed by Parliament, have granted a pension in this case, he would have fulfilled a much more grateful task than that of carrying into effect what has been called, and will continue to be called, a palpable job? I have brought forward these cases, which have come within my own knowledge, to show, that when a charge was made upon the pension fund absorbing five sixths of its whole amount, there was no superabundance, no plethora of revenue, arising from the absence of claims upon the fund! I have now one word to say with respect to the Noble Lord who lately filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and now fills that of Comptroller. Who was it, that, when in this House, in his zeal for the public service (for to that motive, alone, his conduct must, of course, be attributed), and in despite of the great examples so often referred to on this side of the House, did, in 1837, consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the merits of all the existing pensions, and to overhaul the claims of those placed upon the list in the most unjustifiable manner? Who but my Lord Monteagle?

——— Mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

An Honourable Member. — It was a Government motion.

Mr. LIDDELL. — I do not want to absolve the Government from the responsibility of that measure; but they selected the Noble Lord to make out their case; and, after doing that, he ought, I say, to have been the last man whom they should have chosen for this proceeding, which will never go by any other title than "the Monteagle job," —

Dat veniam corvis, vexat censura columbas.

To be sure, there was no one who knew better than the Noble Lord how to make the best of a bad case. I have seen the Noble Lord extricate himself from situations in which his successor will be very likely to flounder. I do not mean to say that the Noble Lord was a very eminent finance Minister; the present circumstances of the country disprove that notion; but I am much surprised that he would lend his name to such a job as that which we are now discussing. The Noble Lord now enjoys his otium cum dignitate, in the peaceful and calm retreat of the Comptrollership of the Exchequer, where, at length, snugly moored, he laughs at the breakers from which he has just escaped, and listens, calmly, to the murmurings of the distant storm. I wish the Noble Lord health and happiness in his new office, and in that retirement, which his social qualities are so well qualified to adorn; and, above all, I wish the Noble Lord a complete independence from all influence on the part of the Crown. I will trouble the House no further: if my resolutions are, as they have been described, "mild as milk," I hope I shall not see them diluted with water, by means of the Noble Lord's amendment; and I trust that, in after times, we shall not see the high and important office of Comptroller of the Exchequer disposed of by a job. I beg to move the following resolutions: —

That it appears, by a copy of a warrant on the table of this House, that a pension of 1000*l*. a-year has been granted by Her Majesty to the late Comptroller of the Exchequer, on retirement from that office, on the ground of "zealous and efficient services rendered to the public during a period of nearly half a century; in which interval of time he filled the offices of Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland, and Comptroller General of the Exchequer for the United Kingdom."

That it appears that the said Comptroller General filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland during the period of thirteen months only, — namely, from the month of February, 1806, to the month of April, 1807.

That it appears, by reference to the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 24. (by which the granting of pensions for political services was regulated), that no person is qualified to receive any pension on the ground of public duties performed in the highest offices of the state, unless he shall have continued in the performance of such duties for a period of two years, at the least.

That it appears that it was also specially provided by the said Act, 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 24., that the holder of the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer should be precluded, on his retirement from that office, from all claim to any of the pensions which the Crown was thereby empowered to bestow for civil or political services.

That it appears that the person holding the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer now constitutes the sole check (in lieu of all others formerly existing under the ancient regulations of the Exchequer) on the expenditure of all public moneys issued through the Exchequer by the authority of the Commissioners of the Treasury; and it is specially provided that he should be incapable of holding any other office under the Crown in conjunction with such Comptrollership; and should be irremoveable from his office, except in pursuance of an Address from the two Houses of Parliament; this officer being thus withdrawn from the exercise of any influence of the Crown over him in the discharge of his functions.

That it appears that provision was made in the Act 1 & 2 Vic. c. 2., that the sum which Her Majesty might be empowered to grant in pensions on the Civil List, in any one year, should not exceed the sum of 1200*l.*; and that, in conformity with a previous resolution of this House, such pensions should be granted "to such persons only as might have just claims on the Royal beneficence, or who, by their personal services to the Crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science, and attainments in literature and the arts, had merited the gracious consideration of the Sovereign, and the gratitude of the country."

That, considering all these circumstances, and more especially the great importance of keeping the Comptroller General of the Exchequer independent of the influence of the Crown; as also of insuring a strict adherence to the spirit of the resolution of this House on the subject of civil list pensions; this House deems it expedient to express its decided opinion that the grant of 1000*l.* a-year to Sir John Newport, under the warrant before mentioned, ought not to be drawn into a precedent.

The motion having been seconded, and put from the chair, —

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH said: — Sir, the Honourable Gentleman the Member for North Durham has stated, in the beginning of that severe and crushing speech which the House has just heard, that he was glad the Government had mustered courage enough to "show fight" on the present occasion. Now I would humbly remind him that this is not the first occasion on which the Government has mustered courage enough to "show fight" in the course of the present Session; and I look upon it as a cause of no small or mean congratulation to the Administration of which I am a humble member, that, after the opposition to its principles, its measures, and its existence, had been formally announced to be more organised and more determined than it has been in any preceding year, — after it had been stated, on authority, that Honourable Members on the other side were ready and eager to oust the present Ministry and to take its place, — the only topic selected from the wide range of its foreign, domestic, and colonial policy, upon which those Honourable Members could come to the charge, twice, was — this retiring pension granted to Sir John Newport. And, I must say, that after all the denunciations which, having been thundered forth during the recess, were bottled up again ready for explosion at the beginning of the Session, my mind was much re-assured when I found this alleged misdeed selected as the leading and crowning enormity. I do not wish to bandy epithets with the Honourable Member, as to the merits of the resolutions which he proposes, or as to the amendment which I propose to substitute for them. I will only say, that if the amendment be pointless and spiritless, anything better corresponding to the original resolution I cannot conceive. The resolutions are the spear with which the Honourable Member makes his attack, and which should be pointed; but there is no occasion for a pointed shield to repel a pointless blow. With respect to this long string of resolutions, they appear, all of them, to be of such a colour and character that no one can be affected by any fate that may betide them; and, while I reciprocate the respect with which the Honourable Member has been pleased to speak of me, I cannot help expressing my opinion that the Honourable Member's resolutions are nothing but didactic twaddle. Notwithstanding the length of the resolutions, they do not furnish a full account of the subject with which they profess to deal: and as the Honourable Member has given an historical review of the grounds on which he opposes the appointment under consideration, I would suggest an addition to that retrospect. Sometimes, when we attempt to contrast the mode in which pensions are now administered with the mode observed in former times, we are met by the assertion that the terms and conditions are totally different. But so far from that being the case, I think, that, if we refer to the terms of former Acts, we shall find that they lay no foundation for the argument that the present Government has acted in contravention of regulations which former Governments did not violate, because those regulations did not then exist. Very many of the pensions which have been granted by preceding Governments were granted in contravention of the terms and conditions within which they ought to have been confined, in accordance with Acts of Parliament; and this was made manifest on the production of the list of pensions published at the request of the House for the information of Parliament and the country.

In order to show what the previous regulations and understanding on which pensions ought to have been granted were, before the adoption of the resolutions of 1834, and in order to point out the practice of preceding Governments, who were, in fact, as much bound by the stipulations of enactments as the Government of which I am a member can be bound by the words of the resolutions of the House of Commons, or by the enactment of the Civil List of the present Queen, I propose to insert between the 5th and 6th resolutions of the Honourable Member for North Durham the first resolution of which I have given notice. It recites, — "That, by an Act of 22 Geo. III. c. 82., it was declared, 'And whereas much confusion and expense did arise from having pensions paid at various places, and by various persons, and a custom hath prevailed of granting pensions on a private list during His Majesty's pleasure, upon a supposition that, in some cases, it may not be expedient for the public good to divulge the names of the persons in the said list, or that it may be disagreeable to the persons receiving such pensions to have it known that their distresses are so relieved, or for saving the expense of fees and taxes on small pensions; by means of which said usage, secret and dangerous corruption may hereafter be practised; and whereas it is no disparagement for persons to be relieved by the Royal bounty in their distress, or for their desert; but, on the contrary, it is honourable, in just cause, to be thought worthy of reward,' &c: That this limitation to persons in their distress, or for their desert, not having proved a sufficient check on the grant of unmerited pensions, this House, in the year 1834, entered into certain resolutions concerning pensions." I think it desirable, as the Honourable Gentleman has gone into the grounds of pensions, to show that, if, in years preceding 1830, any pension was granted by preceding Governments on other grounds than for distress or desert, those pensions were granted in contravention of preceding Acts of Parliament. The resolution which I have read I propose to add to those to which I have already adverted, as moved by the Honourable Member for North Durham, — for the purpose of clearing up his statement of facts. But the last resolution of the Honourable Member contains the expression of an opinion. Accordingly, it is my intention to move, as an amendment to the last resolution, two resolutions, conveying also an expression of opinion, but of opinion differing from that contained in the resolutions of the Honourable Member. The difference consists in this; that whereas the last resolution of the Honourable Member states "that the grant of 1000*l.* a-year to Sir John Newport ought not to be drawn into a precedent," the resolution which I shall have the honour to move affirms that the grant of that pension "cannot be drawn into a precedent in favour of persons who have not 'just claims on the Royal beneficence,' and are not distinguished by the performance of duties to the public." Now the Honourable Member for North Durham stated, that the tenour of this resolution was, that this pension could not be drawn into a precedent. But he has entirely misconstrued and misinterpreted its meaning, which is, really, that this pension, having been fully deserved, cannot be drawn into a precedent for future grants of "undeserved pensions." But now, what are the grounds on which I rest my preference, and on which I hope the House will rest its preference, for the opinions expressed in my concluding resolution, over that expressed in the concluding resolution of the Honourable Member for Durham? First, I say this one thing; I have no wish but that every part of the case — that the whole transaction — should be looked at and sifted in every possible light. If there be one conceivable point in the whole transaction on which I can imagine that a person determined to find fault might lay his hand, it is the period of life at which Sir John Newport was first appointed to the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer. I can imagine such an objection having been felt, and having been stated. But I do not think, that, throughout the very candid and fair remarks made, in a preceding discussion, by the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, he at all questioned or censured the selection of Sir John Newport for the high and important office in question. But, as I have said, I can imagine such an objection having been felt and stated at the time. No such objection, however, was started at the time of the appointment; no such objection has been started during the whole intervening period; no such objection is now started: and I think, after this long acquiescence in it, none can now be fairly or properly taken. The fact is, that none is now set out, implied, or conveyed in the resolution, or by the Honourable Member himself. With respect to ability in the performance of his duty, while he held the office, no one who had observed the manner in which Sir John Newport discharged his functions, and seen his constant and assiduous attention, would be inclined to call in question his competency, so long as he felt justified in retaining his office: and longer than that Sir John Newport did not retain it.

Before I address myself, Sir, to anything stated directly in the speech of the Honourable Gentleman, I must refer to one or two points, which, though very convenient to leave open for insinuations, sarcasms, and inuendos, he has not had the courage or the consistency to insert in his resolutions. The courage to do so would certainly have been great; but the consistency, — an object of desperate attainment. The Honourable Gentleman has permitted himself to imply that the retirement of Sir John Newport took place in order to enable the present Lord Monteagle to succeed to the office. And he then pelted poor Lord Monteagle with many hard epithets, and some not very new quotations. Now, with respect to that suggestion — though covertly insinuated, — though darkly stated, — though not contained in the resolutions, — though the House is not directly called on to express an opinion that the retirement of Sir John Newport actually took place in order to effect the succession of Lord Monteagle to the vacant office, — yet, to that suggestion I have to give the most distinct and unqualified contradiction, on the part of all the parties concerned in the transaction. If there be any one who disbelieves the deliberate assurance of such parties, I can only say that I leave him most cheerfully to the latitude, the felicity, and the pride of his scepticism. In the year 1838, Sir John Newport, feeling, from increasing infirmities, the performance of the duties of his situation irksome and uncomfortable to himself, expressed, from time to time, to some Members of the Cabinet, his disposition to be relieved from the discharge of those duties. He was induced, however, to consent to continue in the possession of his office; but, in the year 1839, being about to pay a visit to his native country, he solicited and obtained a personal interview with the First Lord of the Treasury; at which interview he placed the disposal of his office in the hands of Lord Melbourne: and I have received the most distinct assurance, that, in the month of May last, if the Right Honourable Baronet opposite had succeeded in the formation of a permanent Administration, he would have found the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer at his absolute disposal. It is true that, on his return to the administration of affairs, Lord Melbourne did postpone accepting the resignation of Sir John Newport, and that Sir John Newport did not give up the office till the end of the Session. But, so far from that retirement having the most remote connection with the succession of Lord Monteagle, not only was the office, held by Sir John Newport, offered, in the interval, to another person; but it is well known to many Members on this side of the House — it must be known to some on the other side — and can be known to none better than to yourself, Mr. Speaker, — that, at that time, and for a long time afterwards, the views of Lord Monteagle were centred on a totally different object. The Honourable Member has stated that Lord Monteagle was one who was able to make, at all times, the most of a bad case. I regret that I cannot, upon this subject, return the compliment to the Honourable Member. But, turning to his resolutions, I ask, where are the grounds for the opinions which he endeavours to twist and torture into the last resolution that he has proposed? The first resolution is a matter of indisputable fact. The second and third resolutions say this: —

> That it appears that the said Comptroller General filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland during the period of thirteen months only; — namely, from the month of February, 1806, to the month of April, 1807: That it appears, by reference to the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 24. (by which the granting of pensions for political services was regulated), that no person is qualified to receive any pension on the ground of public duties performed in the highest offices of the state, unless he shall have continued in the performance of such duties for a period of two years at the least.

Now, all this is undoubtedly true. It is not pretended, by any one, that Sir John Newport had any title whatever to any retiring allowance or pension under the Act which is there referred to, by reason of his official services; but then, whether he had not a fair claim to the favourable consideration of the Crown, by reason of his public conduct, — whether in or out of office,—is another point, and one which I shall consider in a moment. The two next resolutions go on to state,—

> That it appears it was also specially provided by the said Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 24., that the holder of the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer should be precluded, on his retirement from that office, from all claim to any of the pensions which the Crown was thereby empowered to bestow for civil or political services: That it appears that the person holding the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer now constitutes the sole check (in lieu of all others formerly existing under the ancient regulations of the Exchequer) on the expenditure of all public moneys issued through the Exchequer by the authority of the Commissioners of the Treasury; and it is specially provided that he should be incapable of holding any other office under the Crown in conjunction with such Comptrollership; and should be irremovable from his office, except in pursuance of an Address from the two Houses of Parliament; this officer being thus withdrawn from the exercise of any influence of the Crown over him in the discharge of his functions.

But what is it we are to infer from the two resolutions I have read to the House? Is it that the person who has filled the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer is not only to be deemed as not entitled to any claim for a retiring allowance or superannuation, by reason of his tenure of that office,—an assertion which is true to the letter, and which, considering the delicate and important nature of the office, as detailed in the resolution, is as proper as it is true; but is it also to be inferred that every person who has held that office, in all times, if circumstances shall have compelled him to retire from such office, either through increase of years, or from a conscientious sense of his inability satisfactorily to perform the duties,—is he, if there be other considerations, independent of the fact of his having held that office,—circumstances connected with his former life, his former public services, and his present position and state of fortune,—is he, if such circumstances render him a fitting object for the bounty or favour of the Crown,—is he, because he may have held the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, to be debarred from the exercise of the fair discretion of the Crown? I believe it is sufficient, on this point, to say that it was enacted by Act of Parliament that the person holding the office of Treasurer to the Ordnance should not be entitled to any superannuation allowance, by reason of his having held that office. And yet that circumstance did not prevent Honourable Gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, from giving a pension to Mr. William Holmes, who had filled that office; and that, no doubt, upon considerations independent of the mere discharge of his duties in that office. In making that provision, they did not bestow it, as it is given in the case of Sir John Newport, on a man at a very advanced preiod of life; but they gave it to his son, in the full bloom of youth and the vigour of life. I do not, Sir, mean to question the propriety of that grant; but I only call attention to it, for the purpose of showing that the existence of a specific enactment in an Act of Parliament, that no one holding that office should receive a retiring allowance, did not prevent the preceding Government from making such a provision for such an individual or his family, that individual having held such an office, if they thought that the circumstances of the case rendered it desirable that there should be an exercise of their discretion in his favour. The question, then, is,—Do the circumstances connected with Sir John Newport's public career warrant us in the exercise of such a discretion in his case? It becomes my duty to inquire into this, in reference to the sixth resolution moved by the Honourable Member for North Durham, which recites the well-known resolution of this House. It is this:—

> That it appears that provision was made in the Act 1 & 2 Vic. c. 2., that the sum which Her Majesty might be empowered to grant in pensions on the Civil List, in any one year, should not exceed the sum of 1200*l.*; and that, in conformity with a previous resolution of this House, such pensions should be granted "to such persons only as might have just claims on the Royal beneficence, or who, by their personal services to the Crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science, and attainments in literature and the arts, had merited the gracious consideration of the Sovereign, and the gratitude of the country."

The question that we have to deal with is this,—to consider whether the circumstances of the case of Sir J. Newport bring it within the conditions herein specified. In addressing myself to this part of the case, I beg to observe that I refer to it not as a case of sympathy or of feeling, but solely as a claim of public justice. If I might appeal, in an assembly like this, to associations which, I hope, are common to the Honourable Member and myself, I might, perhaps, mention that Sir John Newport had the good fortune of having as fags, when at Eton, such distinguished men as Lord Wellesley and Lord Grenville——

—and that he obtained their respect and affection, which were ever continued during the busy period of his public life. I certainly do not mean to rely upon any such ground with this House. But, then, what has been the public career of Sir John Newport, which entitles him to that grant, and that public remuneration, which he has now received? In order to show this, I shall state circumstances very plainly. I shall mention them in a perfectly unvarnished manner; for, unless the facts are sufficiently strong to speak for themselves, any observation respecting them would be vain and superfluous. Sir John Newport entered Parliament in the year 1804; and continued a Member of this House for thirty years. In the first year, he succeeded in putting an end to the Union Compensation Commission; which was followed by five Commissions, which it was alleged were obliged to sit once a week, and which, I believe, really did nothing. In 1806, the only time in which he was in office, he was Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland. In that year of the tenure of office by him, he either originated or carried through, or laid the basis for, many important measures; and of these the most essential, certainly, was the Bill which opened the corn trade between England and Ireland; for, before that time, the corn trade between the two islands was under as strict a system of law as that of England now is with foreign countries. This restriction, whatever might have been the intention of Mr. Pitt as to effecting its removal, Sir John Newport induced Parliament to repeal. And what has been the result of that measure? Ireland has thereby become the granary of England,—its production annually increasing; and every year has seen marvellous additions to the agricultural improvement of that country; and from that time, too, it has afforded the most profitable market for the manufactured produce of England. It may be truly said, that no enactment has tended more directly to the safety and the very existence of the whole empire. In the year 1806, Sir John Newport, having done so much to provide for the animal sustentation of the Irish people, had also the merit of providing for their mental instruction. In conjunction with the father of my Noble Friend who sits near me, the late Duke of Bedford, he took the first steps towards the establishment of any good general system of education in Ireland. By his advice, the first Royal Commission of Inquiry was issued; and on the Fourteenth Report of that Commission it was that the Noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) founded his system of national education. It was on that inquiry, I would impress upon the House, that the measure of the Noble Lord was peculiarly founded. In 1806, Sir John Newport instituted an inquiry into the Customs, which terminated in the abolition of sinecure offices in that department. The succeeding year he was not in office; but he still persevered in bringing abuses before the public, which he was the means of correcting. In 1810, he brought forward and effected the correction of abuses in the Treasury and the Post Office; and was, in those respects, of great assistance to Sir George Shee. He moved, too, for an inquiry into tithes; and through his means there was a Report drawn up as to the commutation of tithes. In 1814, he proposed and carried, in the face of a violent opposition, and after prolonged discussion, by a majority of one, his motion for a Commission to inquire into the state of the courts of justice in England, Ireland, and Scotland; and, in doing so, he rendered the proceedings in courts of equity and of common law less burdensome and much more expeditious for the suitors. That was a step of the greatest importance, and the utmost value, to the community at large. I have, here, a Parliamentary Return which refers to Ireland, and the reduction of costs to suitors in that country; and which shows, that whereas, previously, the average establishment of the Court of Chancery was 75,000*l.*, the saving has been 24,000*l.*; in the King's Bench, where the average establishment was 30,000*l.*, the saving he has effected is 17,000*l.*; in the Common Pleas and Exchequer, where the total average establishment was 28,000*l.*, the saving has been 16,000*l.*; in the Court of Error the saving has been 450*l.*; and in the Judges' Registers the saving has been 3500*l.* The saving on the whole, as completed by Sir J. Newport, amounts to 75,000*l.* in the courts of Ireland. During the whole of his career in Parliament, he never desisted from bestowing his earnest attention upon measures for the relief of the poor, and for removing the serious distresses that affect them in Ireland. In 1804, he brought forward the case of the lunatic poor, in 1806 he mainly contributed to the improvement which has since taken place in houses of industry and in hospitals; and, in 1819, he drew up that admirable Report on the State of Disease, which has led to the establishment of fever hospitals throughout that country.

With respect to the Church of Ireland, though a zealous advocate for the reform of that church, no man was also more zealous for promoting its real efficiency and welfare. He introduced, suggested, or aided in carrying various acts of the Legislature for putting an end to the evils of non-residence; and the abuses of pluralities, — the union of parishes, — the abolition of the vestry cess, — a taxation of first fruits, — were first brought forward by him. All the provisions of the Church Temporalities Bill were suggested and advanced by Sir John Newport. The grand jury laws, the public works, the salaries of county officers, were all remodelled at his suggestion, or by his direction or advice. In short, there was no subject of great national Irish policy, — there was no one detail, however trivial, that concerned the local administration of that country,— to which he did not give, while he had a seat in Parliament, or out of it, his unwearied supervision and continual attention. Almost every internal measure of improvement was the consequence either of the direct interference, or the salutary suggestion, or the hearty cooperation, offered by him, and willingly accepted, on many occasions, by the party to whom he was opposed. At all times, when he had the opportunity, he was ever ready, and ever anxious, to carry into effect every good measure.

I have now, Sir, mentioned several of those measures for which we are indebted to the vigilant control exercised in this House by Sir John Newport. Indeed, I may truly say, that his deeds follow him. I own that I do not regret, in the position in which I am placed, and bound as I am by duty, — as I hope I am impelled by feeling, — to have at heart the welfare of Ireland, to be called upon thus to recount the advantages conferred on her by her venerable benefactor, and to pay to him, while living, this humble tribute, — not, I am glad to say, tardily to record his merits before "the silent bust," but to carry home the fame of his virtues to the threshold of his retirement.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

It is contended by the Honourable Member, that having been only one year in office, and yet having, during that time, carried, or assisted in carrying, many useful measures, Sir John was only discharging his duty as a Member of Parliament. The Honourable Member for North Durham contends, that the mere duties of parliamentary life do not constitute a circumstance which can be regarded as founding a claim to the consideration of the Crown. Apply, then, this case to that of the illustrious countryman of Sir John Newport — Mr. Grattan. It is true, that he received a magnificent provision from the Irish people; but suppose that no such grant had been assigned to that gentleman by the Irish people, — will any man contend that though Mr. Grattan, as it will be recollected, perseveringly refused to accept offices tendered to him at various periods of his parliamentary career, — for that reason, an Administration who sympathised in his principles, or revered his merits, should be prevented from recommending him to the liberality of the Crown, if circumstances called for it? Apply the same principle to the cases of Sir Samuel Romilly, and of Sir James Mackintosh, — the greater part of whose lives and most valuable services were given to the country in opposition. Look, also, to the pensions granted to the families of deceased statesmen, — such as Mr. Fox, Mr. Tierney, and Mr. Sheridan; the greater part of whose lives, also, were equally passed in opposition; and then let me not be told that official services should alone recommend gentlemen to the favour of the Crown! The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth stated, when the subject was last debated, — and somewhat in a spirit of self-application which I by no means deny his claim to, — that great good can be done to the country by Members in opposition. I cordially agree in that sentiment. I wish that the claims of those who may have been in opposition should obtain consideration. But then it was contended, the other night, that if there was a claim arising from parliamentary services, it ought to be decided by a vote recorded within the walls of Parliament. I own, however, that that course seems to me to be the reverse of expedient. I apprehend that that is the tendency of the resolution which has been placed on the paper by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. But the burdens of the country would, I believe, be greatly increased, if, in addition to the bounty of the Crown, there were also to be imposed on it the sums which this House might be inclined to grant. There would thereby, too, arise a great temptation to the canvassing of parties in Parliament. It is true, that pensions granted by the Crown on the Civil List may call for the condemnation of Parliament; but the originating and canvassing for the proposal of pensions in Parliament would put matters upon a different footing, and would have a tendency to throw a misinterpretation and misconstruction upon the contests going on within the walls of Parliament itself. But, Sir, while the Right Honourable Baronet seemed to intimate his opinion of the propriety of a grant for parliamentary services being arranged by the vote of the House of Parliament itself, — while he intimated that parliamentary services should be remunerated by pensions, — the only instance adverted to was that of Mr. Burke, who, it is well known, did not receive his pension in consequence of a vote of the House of Commons; but was placed upon the Civil List by the Crown itself. I gather, then, that the feeling of the House is rather to leave the responsibility to the Ministers of the Crown than to the votes of the Houses of Parliament. But then the Honourable Member who has proposed these resolutions seems to have thought that the sum of 1000*l.* was too large a grant to be taken for one person from that limited amount which is assigned to the Crown to distribute. I do not think it wise or salutary, however, after you have so far limited the discretion of the Crown as to the amount of pensions, further to question that limited discretion within the bounds to which you have assigned it, provided it can be shown that the pension has not been bestowed on an unworthy object, and that it is within the limits and resolutions established and requisite. Does, then, the case of Sir John Newport answer these conditions? Is he, or is he not, a worthy subject for the bounty of the Crown? I challenge the name of any person that is now on the pension list, — highly graced and honoured as that list is, — and I say that there is no name on that list that can feel discredited or disparaged by Sir John Newport's being placed by the side of it. It is not necessary that I should tell the House that there are some names on that list which could not be so easily put in such advantageous contrast as that of Sir John Newport.

I do not know, from the spirit in which the discussion of this motion is carried on, that we may not be driven into that department of the subject. But, at all events, be that as it may, at this period of the debate, the case of Sir John Newport, and my resolutions, as combating those proposed by the Honourable Member, do not stand in need of any such reprisals; and I, for one, at least, shall not stoop to the use of any such weapons. The question is, does the case of Sir John Newport fall within the limits and restrictions laid down by Parliament, and is he one of those who, by their personal services to the Crown, and by the performance of their public duties, have merited the generous consideration of the Sovereign, and the gratitude of the country? I trust that I have already sufficiently demonstrated that the case of Sir John Newport comes within these restrictions. But part of the argument of the Honourable Mover of the resolutions goes to this,—that we are, by making such a grant, neglecting the just claims of other parties. Now, Sir, I think that that is a very questionable thing to do, — to canvass the merits of persons who have not received pensions from the Crown: and I think that the Honourable Gentleman but ill consulted the real dignity of Mr. Wordsworth by the use which he made of his name on this subject. I am one, Sir, who must always rejoice to see the names of persons who have distinguished themselves by useful discoveries, or eminence in science, in literature, and the arts placed upon the pension list by the Crown. Several grants of this nature were made during the limited Administration of the Right Honourable Baronet; and, through his means, and to his great credit, the pension list contains the names of many eminent persons of this description. That list has, subsequently, been made by Lord Melbourne to contain the names of several more; and I do hope that succeeding pension lists may testify to still greater numbers of such honourable distinctions. But, then, I do not think it expedient that the claims of gentlemen of science or of literature should be thought to assume anything like a regular or stipendiary character. There is another class of cases, too, to which the Honourable Gentleman has adverted, — namely, the cases of those who have entitled themselves to our consideration, as having boldly battled for their country in many of its most distinguished contests. No class of cases, I admit, can be more fitting for the Royal bounty than this. But, if the pension list is to be restricted to the applications of such claims, you will see the limited restriction of the Crown at once overwhelmed. I do not think that the settlement of this subject was intended to answer any such purpose. I hope that all claims and all cases will, in their turn, receive the fair and patient consideration of the Crown and the country. But the Honourable Member does not wish to examine into the services in Parliament of such a man as the great subject of these resolutions, and would remove from all consideration of the Crown the public services of such a man as Sir John Newport. And what, then, Sir, under these circumstances, are the words of the amendments which I have the honour of placing in your hands? The first amendment which I propose is, to insert, after the word "functions," at the end of the fifth paragraph of the resolutions of the Honourable Member, the following words: —

That, by an Act of 22 George III. cap. 82., it was declared, "And whereas much confusion and expense did arise from having pensions paid at various places, and by various persons; and a custom hath prevailed of granting pensions on a private list during His Majesty's pleasure, upon a supposition that, in some cases, it may not be expedient for the public good to divulge the names of the persons in the said list, or that it may be disagreeable to the persons receiving such pensions to have it known that their distresses are so relieved, or for saving the expense of fees and taxes on small pensions; by means of which said usage, secret and dangerous corruption may hereafter be practised: and whereas it is no disparagement for persons to be relieved by the Royal bounty in their distress, or for their desert; but, on the contrary, it is honourable, in just cause, to be thought worthy of reward," &c: — That this limitation to persons in their distress, or for their desert, not having proved a sufficient check on the grant of unmerited pensions, this House, in the year 1834, entered into certain resolutions concerning pensions.

The second amendment I propose is, that, instead of the last paragraph of the Honourable Gentleman's resolutions, the following words be inserted: —

That it appears to this House that the Right Honourable Sir John Newport, in his official capacity of Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, exerted himself to the utmost to restrain useless expenses, to promote education, and to improve trade and intercourse between Ireland and the other parts of the United Kingdom; that, while in the said office, he directed, and after leaving office suggested, various inquiries which led to the adoption, by Parliament, of measures highly conducive to the better administration of the law, and beneficial to the revenue; that, after serving for five years in the honourable office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, being then upwards of eighty years of age, and afflicted with bodily infirmity, he withdrew from public life, respected for the unblemished integrity of his character, to pass in retirement the remainder of his days: — That, considering that Sir John Newport was not in affluent circumstances when he thus withdrew from office, this House is satisfied that the grant of a pension to a retired Comptroller of the Exchequer, in circumstances so peculiar, cannot be drawn into a precedent in favour of persons who have not "just claims on the Royal beneficence," and are not distinguished by "the performance of duties to the public."

I have had the good fortune of seeing Sir John Newport in that spot which he has selected for his retirement; and I can truly say, that he is one who closely answers the description of the great moralist and poet, —

Whose active days benevolence endears,
Whose nights congratulating conscience cheers;
The general favourite, as the general friend,
Such age is his, — and who would wish its end?

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I do not impute to the Honourable Gentleman opposite, that he wishes the end of such a life. Heaven forbid I should impute any such wish to him, or to any one! But it is because such is the tendency of the resolutions, that I have moved an amendment upon them; — it is because I think that the tendency of those resolutions is to cast a cloud over the evening of a great man's days, and to embitter the calm serenity of his parting hours; — it is to counteract such a possible tendency, but at the same time to do justice to him, and to all parts of his life, that I now, Sir, put my amendment in your hands, in opposition to the spiritless and pointless character of the resolutions of the Honourable Member for North Durham.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

The question was then put from the chair.

Mr. LEADER. — I do not complain, Sir, that the Noble Lord has characterised the speech of the Honourable Mover of the resolutions as "didactic twaddle;" although I must say, that the reply to it may be truly characterised as "official twaddle and misrepresentation." It is, I confess, somewhat difficult to understand what is the distinction between the motion proposed, and the amendment submitted, to the House; as the one says, that this appointment ought not to be drawn into a precedent, and the other asserts it cannot be drawn into a precedent, —

Strange that such difference there should be 'Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

[Laughter.]

The Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland has referred to the provision that has been made by the Gentleman opposite for Mr. Holmes. But it is a strange mode of defending one job, to speak of a Tory job. What do the Whigs mean by doing this? It only shows how vain and unmeaning were their professions when out of office. Why were the people, I would ask, agitated, and the public mind disturbed, by the pretensions of these Whigs to purity, and of their burning desire to put an end to pensions? The public, placing reliance on the professions of the Whigs, expected that that party would not look back to former days for precedents to establish jobs; but that, as they had promised, so they would act, for the public service, without jobbing public offices, or lavishly expending the public money. But it seems, from all I have heard and learnt, that there has been a succession and complication of jobs in connection with this affair. I am very glad, then, that the Honourable Member for North Durham has brought forward these resolutions, although I do not think them strong enough; because they enable Honourable Members to state what they know upon the subject of these jobs, and thus to enlighten the public as to the manner in which offices are jobbed, and pensions granted, under the pure reign of the immaculate Whigs. To make the case clear to those who have not examined it well, ——

[Laughter.]

There may be some Gentlemen on my left hand (the Ministerial benches) who do not wish the case to be examined, —— and I can easily understand why they would not like such examination. I am glad, I say, that the Honourable Member has brought forward this motion; because I trust that I shall be able to state something, myself, upon this subject, in the hope that others more competent than myself will lay the matter quite open to the public, so that they may see all the foulness of this palpable job. With this view, I must go back to the time of the remodelling of the Exchequer; for although there were only two parties more immediately interested in this affair, — namely, the public and the Government,—yet several parties are put forward before the public merely as the instruments of Government in transactions of this description. In mentioning the names of such parties, however, I beg to be understood as by no means treating them with disrespect. In the first place, then, when the Exchequer was remodelled, why was not Sir Henry Ellis appointed Comptroller? He had held the office of Clerk of the Pells; he had a right to expect advancement; and, according to the doctrine of the day, he had a right to compensation. He was a man of ability, of experience, of unquestionable integrity, in the prime of life, and fully competent to the performance of the duties of the office. Why, then, was he not appointed? It was because, in this case, as in many others, the public service was lost sight of, in order to advance party purposes. The Whig party, at that time, thought it necessary to get rid of Sir Henry Ellis; and they dismissed him with a retiring pension of 1400*l*. a-year, to which he had a clear right; and I by no means blame him for taking it. In considering this case, the House must bear in mind that a certain amount of the public money has been, in my opinion, improperly spent in the matter, and, to a certain degree, jobbed. When the Right Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir R. Peel) came into office, during the year 1834, the name of Sir Henry Ellis was found on the list of persons receiving public money, being able to perform public services, but unemployed, although willing, and, indeed, anxious to be employed. He was asked, I believe, whether he had any objection to go back to Persia as ambassador; and his answer was, that he would prefer some office nearer home; but that if the Government chose to employ him, rather than receive the public money in idleness, he would accept the office in question. I believe that it was arranged that Sir Henry Ellis should go out as ambassador to Persia. Then came the dismissal from office of the Right Honourable Baronet, and the pure Whigs returned to their places. But soon, as upon the occasion of the remodelling the Exchequer, it was found inconvenient to employ Sir Henry Ellis in any permanent office; and he was sent to Persia merely to congratulate the Shah, while another person was sent there as ambassador. There were no reasons, except party reasons, for not placing Sir Henry Ellis in the office of Comptroller General of the Exchequer; and for these party reasons, 1400*l*. a-year of the public money was thus thrown away. I will now come to the appointment of Sir John Newport; and here I must premise, that I will not utter a single word against that right honourable gentleman, or against the very great services he has rendered to the public from the time when he was the lenient master, at Eton, of those distinguished fags, Lord Wellesley and Lord Grenville, to the present hour.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear!"]

I must confess, that I thought, when the Noble Lord alluded to such a fact, on such a subject, that he had a bad case to support; and I am astonished that the Noble Lord should have put forward claims of this description, which only show the weakness of the case he had to support. The Noble Lord stated, that Sir John Newport had been the means of saving to the public 75,000*l.* a-year of the public money. But is that, I ask, a ground for giving a pension to a Member of Parliament? Do not many of the Members of this House come to it pledged to economy and retrenchment? and are they to be paid for merely doing their duty? Upon that ground, the Honourable and Gallant Member for Lincoln would be entitled to a pension. The Honourable and Gallant Member has saved the country 20,000*l.* a-year by the vote he carried respecting Prince Albert's annuity. And I should like to know what amount of pension would be sufficient, on your principle, to show the gratitude of the public, and the sense you entertain of the service of saving public money — what amount would be sufficient to remunerate the Honourable and Gallant Member for Lincoln for his public services?

[Laughter, and renewed cries of "Hear!"]

The real fact, Sir, is, that the present claim, in this respect, — if such a principle as this is to be established, — is a very bad claim, and has no foundation whatever. If the Members of this House are to be paid for their public services, they will become mere competitors for the public money; and the public would be justified in saying, that public men were not actuated by a wish to serve the public, but were thinking of the example of Sir John Newport, who got 1000*l.* a-year because he saved 75,000*l.* It really shows that the Noble Lord has not a good case when he attempts to found it on such reasons as these. The Noble Lord has read a long list of motions which Sir John Newport made in Parliament. I must say, that I was very much dismayed at hearing that list read. It seemed to me to be a sort of incitement to Members to make as many motions as possible in this House. The argument of the Noble Lord was, "Give this man a pension, because he has done his duty so well, and made such a quantity of motions." Of course the pension must be in proportion to the number of motions. Now, Sir, without wishing to say a word against Sir John Newport ——

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Hear, hear!

Mr. LEADER. — What can the Noble Lord mean by that very expressive cheer? I have not said a word against Sir John Newport! I believe that Sir John Newport was a very good master to Lord Wellesley and Lord Grenville — his fags. I believe that he did save 75,000*l.* to the public. I believe that he really did his duty as Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland; and I believe that he is a very good old man in Ireland at the present moment. But what of all that? Surely, Sir, it does not at all furnish a reason for giving him a pension, especially when the House considers the way in which he was appointed to, and the understanding on which he must have entered upon office. But, having said thus much of the Noble Lord's praises of Sir John Newport, I will now come to the way in which Sir John Newport was appointed. At the time he was appointed, it was clearly understood, as set forth in the Act of Parliament, that the Comptroller of the Exchequer had no claim for a pension on account of that office. The fact is undeniable; and I believe the rule is, that no man employed in a public office can claim a pension on account of that office till he has served twenty-five years. When Sir John Newport was appointed, he was seventy-five years of age. It was, therefore, utterly, or, at least, almost impossible, that he could become entitled to a pension by twenty-five years' service. The pension, then, which has been given to him is a violation of the Act of Parliament under which he was appointed. But we are told, that Sir John Newport retired on account of his great age and infirmities. But that plea, surely, was an equally valid objection to appointing him at all. At the time of his appointment, he had gone through a long and arduous parliamentary life; and age and infirmity had begun to incapacitate him from performing the responsible duties of his office. What interpretation, then, must any man put upon his appointment? It is plain that the Government of the day wanted to reward a steady old partisan for party services; and being afraid, in the teeth of their own professions and resolutions of purity, to give him a pension at once, they gave him this office as a stepping-stone to a pension. It seems to me, Sir, that this is the only way in which this appointment can be interpreted by every unbiassed man of common sense. I come, now, to the third part of this job; and to that which, I confess, appears to me to be infinitely the worst part. With regard to this part of the subject, every Honourable Member will, no doubt, have the circumstances connected with it fresh in his memory. Towards the end of the last Session, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had given such dissatisfaction to all commercial men, without exception, throughout the country, that the Government found they must positively get rid of him, or the commercial interests of the country would drive them speedily from office. Having, then, found it necessary to get rid of that most inefficient Chancellor of the Exchequer — for I state, without fear of contradiction, that he was inefficient — the Government were at a loss to know what to give him — as a sop. The Speakership of this House at first suggested itself; and certain Members of the Government went round canvassing Members on this side of the House for their votes in support of such a proposition as that!

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I state this openly, and I know that many Honourable Members will bear me out in the statement. It was stated to me, "Spring Rice is unpopular as Chancellor of the Exchequer,—he must be got rid of; and as you, also, wish to get rid of him as Chancellor of the Exchequer, will you not vote for him as Speaker?"

[Cries of "Hear!" and much laughter.]

I, at once, plainly and openly answered, that I disliked Mr. Spring Rice as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that I certainly would not vote for him as Speaker, — that I thought, however, under any circumstances, they had better get rid of him as Chancellor of the Exchequer; — and as to the Speakership, I stated, that if Mr. Spring Rice were put up as Speaker, he would be sure to be beaten. Afterwards, accordingly, and to our great good fortune, Sir, we elected you!

[Cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

It then became necessary for the Government to find some other retiring place for the late Chancellor of the Exchequer; and as I suppose that Right Honourable Gentleman considered himself a very ill-used man in not being made Speaker, they were obliged to give him a most disproportionate reward for his party services, — public services I will not call them. Now, when a man retires from office after long public service, he claims, generally, one of two things. If he be a needy man, and wants money, he will, perhaps, claim some good place, which may enable him to live comfortably. If, on the other hand, he be a man not caring so much for money, but caring for the honour and power which a peerage confers, he considers himself entitled to that honour and power. But, in the case of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, there was an accumulation of rewards. Not only was a peerage not sufficient; but there was added to it the very agreeable and well-paid office of Comptroller of the Exchequer. Having now, Sir, however, stated what my belief is, touching the way in which this office has been jobbed for party services, and against the interests of the public, I should like to call the attention of the House and of the country to one very important point of the case, as regards the public money. We may, perhaps, be told that it cannot signify to so great a nation that 2000*l.* or 3000*l.* of the public money should yearly be thus given away. But, Sir, I think it signifies a very great deal. That is the sort of argument which the reckless spendthrift uses when he finds his fortune beginning to become embarrassed. Such a person will say, "It does not signify whether I spend a few thousands more or less, I am, already, half ruined, so that it cannot make much difference." And so the Government appear to have argued and to have said, — "We are under the necessity of raising new taxes, and it does not signify whether we raise a few thousands more or less." But the public do not argue in this way. The public generally, if not individually, feel the bad moral effect which such conduct has upon the country. And let me ask whether the present is a time for extravagance and for jobbing in public offices, when, amongst the working classes, there exists so much distress — such discontent? I ask whether the present is a time for giving a fresh argument against the institutions of the country? There have been 2000*l.* or 3000*l.* a-year clearly thrown away in this job; and the arguments that will be founded upon the circumstance will, I venture to say, make many more Chartists, than twenty of the most violent speeches delivered at the most violent public meetings would do. It is this want of consistency in public men — these hollow professions of economy and retrenchment — that serve to make Chartists. It is this lavish expenditure of public money that makes men begin to consider whether they could not frame a system of government, under which the public money should not be thus lavishly expended, nor public offices thus shamefully jobbed. In conclusion, Sir, I have only to thank the House for the attention it has paid to these few remarks; and I have only farther to say, that it appears to me that the whole matter may be summed up in a very few words. This transaction is a job; and not only a job, but a job perpetrated by those who profess a great abhorrence of jobs, and who got into office chiefly by means of that profession; and, to sum the case up in the fewest possible, and, at the same time, in the most expressive words I can use, to show that it is a gross and clumsy job, — I have only to pronounce it "a Whig job!"

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Mr. W. BARRON. — I rise, Sir, to protest against what I cannot but consider a most unfounded and shameless attack upon one of the most honest, most indefatigable, and the best men that ever sat within the walls of this House. Never, I will venture to say, was there a man less open to attack, or more deserving of all praise for his public services, than my right honourable friend Sir John Newport. My right honourable friend, unsubdued by failure and by opposition, has, by perseverance and ability, forced, in his time, many most useful measures upon the most reluctant Governments. There is scarcely a branch of legislation, and more particularly so far as Ireland has been concerned, in which Sir John Newport has not been mainly instrumental in effecting great and useful reforms. His successful exertions in the reform of the law in Ireland can be fully estimated only by those who are conversant with the subject. Why, Sir, is it not also notorious that Sir John Newport effected that reform of the Exchequer in Ireland which led to the consolidation of the Exchequer of the two countries, and to a consequent great annual saving of the public money? Sir John Newport has never once swerved from his principles; and it is well known that he refused office, and parted from the early friends of his youth, sooner than concede his principles on the Catholic question. I contend, then, that the resolutions of the Honourable Member for North Durham will have the effect of indirectly passing a vote of censure upon Sir John Newport for having accepted his pension; for if the Ministers of the Crown were wrong in granting this pension, Sir John Newport will be considered as equally wrong in accepting and retaining it. But I believe that this is one of the best earned pensions upon the list. I challenge inquiry into the pension list; and I ask the House and the country to say whether there is a single name on the pension list that can be put in competition with the name of Sir John Newport?

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I unhesitatingly say that there is not one that will bear that comparison. I appeal to those Gentlemen who are connected with agriculture in Ireland, to state what the agriculture of that country would have been but for the exertions of Sir John Newport? Through the exertions — the untiring exertions — of my right honourable friend, the value of land in Ireland has nearly doubled; whilst it is notorious that the importation of manufactures from England has quintupled. As an instance of the good effects which have followed from the exertions of Sir John Newport, I may mention that, previous to the passing of his Act, the agricultural produce exported annually by the city of Waterford was under 300,000*l.*; but, for the last five years, the amount has averaged upwards of 2,000,000*l.* per annum. In like manner, the importations of manufactured goods into the port of Waterford, which, previous to 1806, was less than 100,000*l.* per annum, has now increased to 900,000*l.* per annum. The great object of Sir John Newport uniformly has been to unite the two countries together, and to put an end to any distinction between them. In fact, my right honourable friend has done more to render the union between England and Ireland complete than all the Parliaments since the Act of Union was passed. Are services of this kind to be alone unremembered? Are twaddling poetasters and novelists, and puny inventors ——

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"]

— to be rewarded, while my right honourable friend is to be denied all remuneration for his valuable efforts? It would be monstrous to say that, because a Member of Parliament has served his country effectually, he alone should be unentitled to reward — he alone should not be rewarded in his old years with a pension. Nothing can be more disgusting to any may of feeling, education, and sentiment, than the labour of thirty years' experience in parliamentary drudgery, with twenty-six years of that time spent in opposition Honourable Gentlemen on the other side should have pity on my right honourable friend, now that they are in opposition themselves. Now, I promise, that after the Gentlemen opposite shall have been in opposition for twenty-six years, I will hold myself bound to vote for a pension for any of them who shall be found to have performed similar services to those of Sir John Newport. Do you grudge this poor man his 1000*l.* a-year? Never was there a pension more honestly earned. There is not a single stain on his character; and the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth will, I am sure, manfully bear testimony to the laborious and conscientious discharge of his duty by Sir John Newport all through his career. No man was ever more respected by his countrymen than Sir John Newport, because he was honest and useful; and they will not fail to receive the motion of the Honourable Member as a vote of censure on their tried friend. Will the House, then, pass that vote on an aged man sinking into the grave? If it do so, it will accelerate the death of one of the best public servants the country ever possessed. Sir John Newport continued to represent the city of Waterford for a period of twenty-six years; and though he was a Whig, and the great majority of the electors for a large portion of that time were Tories, yet such was the respect for Sir John Newport's character and services, that he was returned without opposition on many occasions. I hope, therefore, that the House will reject this vote.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I do not intend to detain the House; but I feel called upon to protest against that part of the speech of the Honourable Member for Westminster, in which he has assailed Lord Monteagle. It is open for the Honourable Member to attack Lord Monteagle; and I am not here to defend that Noble Lord from any fair assault; but what I complain of is, that the attack on that Noble Lord was made the ostensible object in order to wound, covertly, the feelings of a person totally unconnected with him. Is there any vote of censure on Lord Monteagle before the House? There is not. Therefore the motion in itself is as idle and vicious as one well can be which goes to fix a stain on the character of an aged and respectable man, and an excellent public servant. The intention of the motion, I am bound to believe, was different; but such would be its real effect. I therefore complain of mixing up the case of Sir John Newport with that of Lord Monteagle. The question before the House clearly is, whether Her Majesty's Government should not be censured for consenting to the arrangement by which Sir John Newport had been allowed to retire from the Comptrollership of the Exchequer, and for giving him a pension on the Civil List. The Honourable Member for Westminster has talked a great deal of Whig jobbing; but he forgot to state that, by this arrangement, the public will not have to pay one penny more than they had paid — previously to it. No: that would not suit the Honourable Member's purpose. But although there may be such a thing as Whig jobbing, there is also such a thing as Chartist cant; and the language of the Honourable Member for Westminster, when he talked of a saving to the public, — when saving there was and could be none, — seemed to indulge in something very like it. But, after all, is Sir John Newport a man to be charged, as with a crime, for taking a pension in his old age, when worn out in the service of the country? As the motion is shaped, such is its import; and it therefore becomes purely personal to that excellent individual. It is not, as I have said, an attack on Lord Monteagle, so much as on a feeble old man, who has spent his best days in the public service, and from whose conduct, public or private, no one can withhold the tribute of his admiration and esteem. What have been the public benefits effected by Sir John Newport's efforts? It was by his means that the information was produced on which Ministers were enabled to abolish that most fertile source of discord in Ireland — church-rates; and if only for that service alone, he deserved the highest degree of gratitude and reward which the country could confer. There were many other services performed by him of equal importance; but as I have promised not to detain the House, I shall not now enter on them. I repeat my strong protest against the plan adopted by Honourable Gentlemen opposite, of attacking one person under cover of the name of another, and of mooting one topic, the better to wound by one of a different character; and I implore the House not to lend itself to this insidious system, nor to sanction the stain intended to be cast on the character of that venerable and most excellent man Sir John Newport, now fast sinking into a timely grave.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — After the two last speeches which have been addressed to the House by the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, I can remain no longer silent. I can assure the House, that if I thought this motion would, either directly or indirectly, imply a censure upon Sir John Newport, no individual in the House would give it a more strenuous opposition than I would. Having known Sir John Newport for very many years, I cannot call to my recollection any public servant more honest, faithful, independent, and generous in the performance of his duties. But besides these considerations, it has been stated, upon authority, that Sir John Newport's affairs are now in an embarrassed state. I consider that the sorrows of a good man are sacred, and I should be the last to say anything calculated to wound his feelings; and it is, therefore, with peculiar pain that I take part in this discussion at all; lest, by chance, anything should fall in the course of it calculated to inflict pain on that individual. I beg to declare that I acquit Sir John Newport of all blame in this transaction; but I do accuse Her Majesty's Ministers of exposing that gentleman to unmerited obloquy, and placing him in a most painful situation. But, at the same time, I cannot let my private feelings interfere with the performance of my public duty; for I should be ashamed to allow any private considerations to restrain me from expressing my opinion relative to this transaction, now that it has been forced upon public notice. I differ in opinion with many parties in this House upon this subject. I was a consenting party to the resolutions of 1832, on which the Pensions Act was framed; but I cannot say that I adopted those resolutions in all respects with any very strong predilection. I saw many strong objections to them. I thought, and still think, that when a statesman has laboured long and hard in the public service, and has become advanced in years, and, perhaps, embarrassed in his circumstances, there should be some harbour of refuge to which he might retreat from political conflict, alike out of the reach of the cold ingratitude of friends, and the bitter animosity of enemies. The Throne, I think, should be the fountain of honours and rewards, as it is the seat of mercy; and I consider that some sum should be placed at the disposal of the Crown, for the reward of acknowledged merit, and the relief of acknowledged distress. With these feelings, therefore, if instead of appointing Sir John Newport to the Comptrollership of the Exchequer, the Government had at that time recommended His late Majesty to grant him a pension for his past services, — whatever might have been the conduct of others on the occasion,—I, for one, would not have offered one word of objection. I beg, in passing, to observe, that Lord Monteagle presided over the Committee at which the resolutions were come to on the subject of pensions. I was not a member of that Committee; but I see opposite several Honourable Members who were; and they can tell the House what took place there,—what was the amount of the pensions contemplated by the Committee out of the limited allowance of 1200*l*., and what were the classes of persons to whom they were to be given. I see the Honourable Member for Kilkenny opposite; and that Honourable Gentleman will, no doubt, before this debate concludes, state to the House his recollection upon these points. Now, for my part, taking the Act of 1834, and the Pensions Act, I am bound to say that this transaction appears to be utterly subversive of the independence of the Comptrollership of the Exchequer, and a direct violation of the Act, as to pensions to official persons. It will be in the recollection of the House, that when I was pressing forward the measure for the regulation of the offices of the Exchequer, I was taunted by several Gentlemen who then sat opposite, but whom I now see by my side, and, more particularly, by the Honourable Member for Harwich, that, by abolishing the double check, which was done away with by extinguishing the office of Clerk of the Pells, I should be rendering the Comptroller of the Exchequer the sole check upon the disposal of the public funds. To this I answered, that, by throwing the whole responsibility of that office upon a single individual, I considered that I insured its more efficient discharge, than if I divided it between two persons, provided I could succeed in insuring the entire independence of this sole officer, and placing him beyond the influence or control of the Crown.

Now, with regard to what the Honourable Member for Westminster has said about the office of Clerk of the Pells. Mr. Ellis was Clerk of the Pells at the time that I refused to retain that office. But I at that time gave a solemn pledge, on the part of Lord Grey's Government, that, as Mr. Ellis, in consideration of his vested interest in that office, was entitled, not to a pension, but to compensation as for an office for life, on the first occasion of a vacancy occurring in an office which that gentleman could be called upon to accept, it should be offered to him; and he, at the same time, gave a pledge, on his part, that upon such an office being offered to him, he would accept it. This assurance, on the part of Mr.

Ellis, was afterwards repeated to the head of the Government, and that in the warmest terms, by that gentleman himself, who said he did not wish ever to be looked upon in the light of a pensioner on the public; that he was anxious to be actively employed; and that he would take any office the duties of which he was adapted to discharge. When the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth came into office, in 1834, the Duke of Wellington, who formed part of that Administration, although not bound by this pledge on the part of a previous Government, proceeded to fulfil it. He offered to Mr. Ellis an appointment to Persia, for which he considered him in every respect well adapted. The appointment was accepted by Mr. Ellis; but, before he had time to leave the country, another change took place in the Administration of the country, and that gentleman's appointment was changed from one of a permanent character into one of a mere complimentary nature; upon which he was only ten months engaged; and he has been ever since that period unemployed, and in the receipt of 1400*l.* a-year, without any performance of duties, and very much against his inclination. With respect to the appointment of Sir John Newport to the Comptrollership of the Exchequer, I am free to confess that, although, as has been truly said by the Noble Lord the Member for Yorkshire, I stated no objection to that appointment at the time, I thought it from the first an injudicious appointment. I considered that Sir John Newport was, at the time, seventy-eight years of age; and that he had, four or five years previously, retired from public life, — the reason for which was openly assigned, — namely, that his health had failed, and that he could not live in London, and wished to retire to his native country. Now, it may be asked, why I did not make this objection at the time? I frankly confess, that, entertaining, as I do, the highest respect for Sir John Newport, I have no doubt that the right honourable gentleman had in his mind the intention of strictly fulfilling the duties of his office, and executing, to the best of his ability, the high control over the finances of the country which it imposed upon him. It should be recollected, that the Act of Parliament regulating this office not only guaranteed its independence, but so studiously was this object observed, that by the Pensions Act, passed six weeks afterwards, this office was expressly and designedly excluded from any claim for a pension or retired allowance. It was also alleged, at the time, that the office would be a sinecure; but I was prepared to meet this objection, and I said I would take care it should not be so; for that an opportunity should be given to Parliament, annually, of stopping the salary in Committee of Supply, if it appeared that the party holding the office did not execute the important duties of it in person. With these views and intentions respecting this office, although, out of respect to Sir John Newport, I did not cavil at his appointment to this office at the time it took place, I certainly thought it an objectionable appointment.

Now, with respect to the particular charge before the House; although the Noble Lord the Member for Yorkshire sneered at the latitude of the scepticism of Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House, I must say that the Noble Lord's explanation, so far from allaying, has only increased, the suspicions which I entertain on the subject. It appears that, in the month of April, 1839, Sir J. Newport had notified to Her Majesty's Ministers that he was unable to perform the duties of his office, and wished to retire into private life in Ireland. Other persons were then thought of to fill the office, and amongst others the Noble Lord, Monteagle, who, however, at that time was aspiring to that chair which you, Sir, now so worthily fill. The Government were aware of the inability of Sir J. Newport to fulfil the duties of his office in April, 1839. On the 27th of May, I believe, the Speaker was elected; but still the Comptrollership of the Exchequer was left vacant through all the months of June, July, August, and September; until, in short, after the prorogation of Parliament; and then the Government appointed their own colleague, Lord Monteagle. This is not, therefore, an attack upon Sir John Newport; but it constitutes a charge of the gravest character against Her Majesty's Ministers, that they kept vacant, during so many months, an office of which the duties were of so high and important a nature. But what was the object of Ministers in keeping open this office till the month of September? What were the great feats which the Right Honourable Gentleman (now Lord Monteagle) had performed to entitle him to this appointment? It is easy to trace the feats which the Noble Lord the late Chancellor of the Exchequer performed whilst he held that office. I believe that, among the first things which that Noble Lord did, was his omitting to fund Exchequer bills when they were at a high premium, and it might, therefore, have been done with advantage; and that he afterwards funded them when Exchequer bills were very low; so that they have ever since been at a discount. The next thing the Noble Lord did, was to introduce a new mode of bidding for a loan, by a kind of auction, which produced no bidders; when the consequence was, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was actually laughed at. Then the Noble Lord, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, got a Select Committee appointed to take into consideration a very abstruse scheme which he had devised for dealing with Church property; but when the Noble Lord's calculations came to be strictly examined, the whole scheme exploded, was blown into air, and abandoned. The Noble Lord also appointed a Committee upon the important subject of joint stock banks, which sat three years examining evidence; but the Noble Lord, though Chancellor of the Exchequer, and their chairman, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, tendered them no advice whatever on this important subject; and, to this day, no Report has been made by that Committee. What was the next feat of the Noble Lord? Why, having so managed the financial affairs of the country, in which, during three years, there had been, year after year, a deficiency, and, at last, an increasing deficiency, he brought forward that notable project by which 1,500,000*l.* of revenue was to be sacrificed,—namely, the penny postage; and then, having announced this great prôjet, in despair of being able to carry his own plan into effect, he actually advertised a reward of 200*l.* to any person in the kingdom who would come forward and help him. The last performance of the Noble Lord was, to attempt the renewal of the bank charter of Ireland,—a subject of vital importance,—and to effectuate a scheme by which a saving of 25,000*l.* a-year was to accrue to the public. Well; having developed this important scheme, the Noble Lord, then, as a last act before bidding the House farewell, gave a practical example of the necessity under which he found himself, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, to succumb to the overwhelming influence of an Honourable and Learned Member in this House, whose will it was that the country should not have the benefit of that measure. I have thus traced the public career of this Noble Lord, from the time he became Chancellor of the Exchequer to the period of his late appointment; and I do not see that there is any reason why he, of all others, should be the gentleman for whose convenience this important and responsible office should have been kept open from May till September, 1839. The Noble Lord the Member for Yorkshire has attempted to be facetious on the present occasion, and congratulated himself that this was not the first time when Her Majesty's Ministers had appealed, by wager of battle; or, as the Noble Lord said, "shown fight."

But, I ask, is this really the first time during the Session that the Noble Lord and his colleagues have "shown fight?" They showed fight, once, and were beaten by 104; but that was a trivial affair; and then, the next time they showed fight, they were beaten by 26; and that upon what was no trivial affair at all. The next time they dared to "show fight" was on a question brought before the House by the Honourable Member for Harwich, which the President of the Board of Trade said "it was of the greatest importance to avoid entering into, in the present state of our finances;" and which the Right Honourable Member the present Chancellor of the Exchequer declared to be "one of the most inconvenient motions they could possibly discuss." I hope that, as they have this night also ventured to "show fight," they will find themselves similarly defeated.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear!"]

The present resolution is said to be "a pointless one!" But I would ask whether this can properly be said of a motion which goes to point out the dangers and disgrace of tampering with an office that regulates and controls the whole revenue of this country,—a resolution, too, which affirms that the Government should not, unquestioned, be permitted to grant pensions for civil services, which it has been declared by statute ought not to be so rewarded from the Civil List? This is a transaction, on the part of the Government, which involves the whole principle of the control of the country,—one simple question; whether an officer, who, as Parliament had declared by a solemn Act, could hold no pension or retired allowance, should, by a strained construction of the Civil List Act, be permitted to retire upon a pension? The object of the resolution, then, is to declare that this promotion should not be drawn into a precedent; and yet this has been called "a pointless resolution!" Upon this point at issue, the Ministers have again "showed fight;" and again, I make no doubt, they will be beaten: and then, if they are not satisfied with that, they must, to use a homely, but well-understood phrase, be "gluttons" indeed! This is no attack upon Sir John Newport, but a direct charge against Her Majesty's Ministers. The resolutions declare that, if this act of the Government were to be drawn into a precedent, it would be subversive of that independence of the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer which Parliament has declared should be incidental to that office; and that is a declaration which I trust the House will not hesitate to affirm. The Noble Lord the Member for Yorkshire has said, however, that this case could not be drawn into a precedent; but I maintain that, by no very strained construction of the resolutions proposed as an amendment by the Noble Lord, Lord Monteagle would be equally entitled, at the present moment, to receive a pension as Sir John Newport was; the sole exception being on the score of advanced age. I am well aware of the import of the words of Burke in the preamble of the Bill, from which the expressions in the Noble Lord's amendment have been drawn, "that it is no disgrace to any person to receive the Royal bounty in the shape of a pension;" but, at the same time, I cannot forget the meaning contained in the appendix, which states that "the several individuals whose names are therein contained shall receive their salaries and pensions at the Treasury, without any deduction for fees." I could, if I pleased, make out a case for a pension for Lord Monteagle, by way of paraphrase on that which has been offered in justification of Sir John Newport, quite as good on the face of it, and really quite as strong and pertinent. It would be very easy to adduce his length of service in Parliament, his fatigue from public business, and the commissions of inquiry that have sprung from his suggestions. And, in conclusion, I doubt not that it would be very easy to induce him to express a wish to retire to Ireland to breathe his native air, — on an understanding that he should have a handsome addition to his income, and that a friendly successor should be installed in the same position, who would not interfere with the control of the Exchequer. If the arguments of the Noble Lord's opponents be good for anything, this case must be admitted in the way of a precedent in future. I therefore feel the necessity of pressing this resolution, as the only way which is left to the House of preserving the independence of the high office of Comptroller of the Exchequer safe and unstained, and of saving the country from the dangerous consequences of this transaction.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, I came down to the House prepared to defend an act of my Noble Friend against the somewhat fine-drawn resolutions moved by the Honourable Gentleman opposite. But, instead of having this task to perform, I see that the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, who has just sat down, wishes to blink this question, and to use the resolutions, which entirely concern the pension granted to Sir John Newport, and the Comptrollership of the Exchequer, as a means of attacking the Noble Lord who was late Chancellor of the Exchequer, and who is not now in his place to defend himself. I do not feel it necessary to enter into a defence of my Noble Friend's conduct, because it does not properly come before us; but I certainly was surprised at the attack which has been made, because I remember that the Right Honourable Gentleman (Sir James Graham) was, for a long time, a Member of that Cabinet under which Mr. Spring Rice was an able and efficient and indefatigable Secretary to the Treasury; and I should have thought that the Right Honourable Gentleman would have recollected, with some gratitude, the able, zealous, and eloquent speeches which Mr. Spring Rice made in defence of that Government, when the Right Honourable Gentleman so often shrunk from his duty in maintaining its acts. I should have thought, certainly, that the Right Honourable Gentleman would not have altogether forgotten those services, or failed to call to mind how much that Government, of which he was a member, in a very high office, and for which he said so little, owed to the very able and efficient speeches made by the then Secretary to the Treasury; and that he would have, at least, been inclined to spare a man not now present to answer him. But if those speeches and services, both official and parliamentary, — all of them showing, not only great zeal and industry, but great ability likewise, — produced no impression on the Right Honourable Gentleman, they did produce an impression on the Noble Lord at the head of the Government; because the Noble Member for Lancashire no sooner resigned the office of Secretary to the Colonies, than Lord Grey thought he could place the seals of the Colonial Office in no better hands than in those of the Noble Lord whom the Right Honourable Gentleman, when no question was before the House as to his conduct, thought fit to censure in such done with advantage; and that he afterwards funded them when Exchequer bills were very low; so that they have ever since been at a discount. The next thing the Noble Lord did, was to introduce a new mode of bidding for a loan, by a kind of auction, which produced no bidders; when the consequence was, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was actually laughed at. Then the Noble Lord, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, got a Select Committee appointed to take into consideration a very abstruse scheme which he had devised for dealing with Church property; but when the Noble Lord's calculations came to be strictly examined, the whole scheme exploded, was blown into air, and abandoned. Sir, I will venture to say that I do not think there is one person now receiving a pension from the Civil List, or from the public in any other shape, on account of great civil services, — (I do not, of course, mean to compare these with the exploits of naval and military commanders), — whose character and public services, both as to the length of those services, and the various modes of them, have so well entitled him to such a reward as Sir John Newport, — that pension being in itself extremely moderate in amount, considering the person to whom it is given. In company with Mr. Elliot and Mr. Ponsonby (who have now departed, but I name them with the same honour as I mention Sir John Newport), he was nominated on a Committee to inquire into the state of public education. In fact, I do not go too far when I say, that ten or twelve Acts of Parliament have been passed, on the suggestion, solely, of Sir John Newport. Now, it does appear to me, that when all the circumstances of this grant are considered, — when his services in an office, the duties of which he performed with great ability, are called to mind, — considering that he not only submitted important measures to Parliament, but that they were adopted by Parliament, — and that, after the course of a long life, having attained a great age (between 80 and 90), he finds himself in narrow and reduced circumstances, — putting all these facts together, they form a ground — and a fully sufficient one — for the pension which has been bestowed on such a man. Now, I must compare this pension with those granted to others on the ground of official services. Mr. Warre and Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Courtenay and Mr. Hamilton, receive pensions to the amount of 1000*l*. a-year; Mr. Lushington, Mr Croker, and Mr. Planta are paid 1500*l*.; Lord Auckland and Mr. Goulburn have each, pensions of 2000*l*. a-year; Lord Bexley has 3000*l*.a-year. I shall only mention another, — Lord Sidmouth, who honourably and manfully gave up the pension to

I am of opinion, therefore, that the Crown, being granted a certain amount on the Civil List for those purposes, with regard to such as have served the Crown (as to those who have not, that is another question), the Prime Minister is the proper person to give advice as to who shall receive pensions. Undoubtedly, as Mr. Burke said, all those pensions are subject to the control of the House of Commons. On any one of those pensions, the House may give its advice; but I don't think a calm opinion would be arrived at by Parliament, each individual voting, as he would do, according to party. I may consider those things services which would not be viewed at all in that light by those opposite. For instance, I may consider the formation of a national board of education in Ireland a great advantage: those opposed to me may look upon it as an injury. It is, therefore, far better not to make such questions or such services the subject of debate.

The Right Honourable Gentleman has said that we have forced on this discussion. I should like to know how it has been forced on, but by the persevering attempts and continual misrepresentations put forward by those who belong to the present party of the Right Honourable Gentleman. Such he considers a becoming manner in which to treat a public servant of eighty-four years of age! In the present Session, had it not been for the Honourable Member for North Durham, I know not whether this would not have passed in the same way as the various other pensions granted by the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth, and by the present First Lord of the Treasury. I heard the Right Honourable Gentleman say there was something exceedingly suspicious in Sir John Newport having expressed a desire to retire in April, and in the present arrangement not having then taken place. Here I must be allowed to ay that I was rather in error in a state-nt I made to the House on a former sion, because I thought that Sir
Newport had written to Lord Mel-from Ireland. In April, he asked rd Melbourne, for the purpose his resignation; and he then ne was about to go to Ireland, cing his resignation in his hands whenever he wished to lay it before the Crown. The Right Honourable Gentleman contends that this step was forced on him by the fact that he was a useless and inefficient Comptroller of the Exchequer. But let it be remembered, that, as he was of great age, he was entitled to leave of absence on the score of laborious service, whether he held or resigned his office. The Right Honourable Gentleman says, he should never have been appointed at all; because he was not capable of performing the duties of his office. I have been always informed that Sir John Newport attended to his duties most assiduously, and that his duties were lately increased to an extent, not originally contemplated.

The Right Honourable Gentleman next alluded, and the Honourable Member for Westminster also referred, to Mr. Ellis. Why, a Bill passed through the House on that occasion, and I remember Lord Althorp observing to me, that if any question were asked on the subject, it would be most painful to him to answer it; because Mr. Ellis was a near relative to our then colleague, Lord Ripon, and he should be obliged to say that he could not recommend Mr. Ellis for the office. In so saying, Lord Althorp merely did his duty as Minister of the Crown; because, whatever might be the considerations of economy, I do not imagine that a Minister was bound, by such views, not to recommend a person qualified for the office. In our selection of you, Sir, for that chair, I am sure we did not consider whether we should make a saving of any pension by our choice; but we were resolved to give your high office to the fittest person; and if we have harsh terms. In that course, Lord Grey thought himself justified, and Lord Melbourne thought himself justified, by the conduct of Lord Monteagle in the situation which he then held; and this I am sure of, — that, if the Right Honourable Gentleman had ventured (which I am sure he never did) to make such an attack as he has indulged in to-night on my Noble Friend's conduct of the financial affairs of the country, in the presence of my Noble Friend, he would have met with an answer which would probably have deterred him from repeating it. But if the Right Honourable Gentleman thought it safe to refrain from impugning the services of my Noble Friend when he sat on these benches, and was selected for office by Lords Grey and Althorp, it was still more safe to make a laboured attack against a man who is now a Member of the other House of Parliament.

But, Sir, the question before the House does not relate to the financial conduct of the affairs of the country during the last Session. I will not be led into it by the taunts of the Right Honourable Gentleman, and his evident and anxious wish to escape the question which his Honourable Friend has brought forward. That question is, whether the Government was justified in granting a pension to Sir John Newport? That question, I must say, does, however the Right Honourable Gentleman may deny it, involve the character of Sir John Newport; because, if, though of great age, and in an infirm state of health, yet being still in the perfect possession of that right understanding which enabled him to judge of the constitution of his country and of its public concerns, he accepted knowingly and wilfully a pension to which he was in no way entitled, and which he obtained in violation of the Acts on the Civil List pensions, — no one will tell me that a resolution of this House, of the nature of that proposed, does not impute blame to, and will not be received as a severe blow by, him, in the decline of his life, after so many services to his country. Sir, I will venture to say that I do not think there is one person now receiving a pension from the Civil List, or from the public in any other shape, on account of great civil services, — (I do not, of course, mean to compare these with the exploits of naval and military commanders), — whose character and public services, both as to the length of those services, and the various modes of them, have so well entitled him to such a reward as Sir John Newport, — that pension being in itself extremely moderate in amount, considering the person to whom it is given. Now I say this, looking back to all those various services which my Noble Friend has gone through, and which I shall not attempt to refer to in the same detail; but let me, in the first place, observe, that a great change must be effected in public affairs, if the custom (which the practice of late years has, perhaps, a tendency to establish) is to prevail, that, in future, not only the great parliamentary pensions, but those under the control of the Crown, are to be governed exclusively by the amount and length of official service. I really think it very possible, with regard to the favour of the Crown, that a person may in six months, or in a year, perform services and accomplish benefits for his country which another in the course of twenty years may not be enabled to do.

Now, let us see what are the claims of Sir John Newport. He instituted inquiries into the state of our revenues, which he afterwards followed up by practical reforms. He cut off many abuses in the Excise, and removed the sources of corruption in that department. He proposed and carried through Parliament an Act, allowing a free trade in corn between this country and Ireland, which has proved of the greatest benefit to both countries. In company with Mr. Elliot and Mr. Ponsonby (who have now departed, but I name them with the same honour as I mention Sir John Newport), he was nominated on a Committee to inquire into the state of public education. In fact, I do not go too far when I say, that ten or twelve Acts of Parliament have been passed, on the suggestion, solely, of Sir John Newport. Now, it does appear to me, that when all the circumstances of this grant are considered, — when his services in an office, the duties of which he performed with great ability, are called to mind, — considering that he not only submitted important measures to Parliament, but that they were adopted by Parliament, — and that, after the course of a long life, having attained a great age (between 80 and 90), he finds himself in narrow and reduced circumstances, — putting all these facts together, they form a ground — and a fully sufficient one — for the pension which has been bestowed on such a man. Now, I must compare this pension with those granted to others on the ground of official services. Mr. Warr and Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Courtenay and Mr. Hamilton, receive pensions to the amount of 1000*l.* a-year; Mr. Lushington, Mr. Croker, and Mr. Planta are paid 1500*l.*; Lord Auckland and Mr. Goulburn have each, pensions of 2000*l.* a-year; Lord Bexley has 3000*l.* a-year. I shall only mention another, — Lord Sidmouth, who honourably and manfully gave up the pension to which he was entitled. But then, it is said, these pensions have been granted under an Act of Parliament. Now, I do not think it a sufficient claim to a pension that a man has served a certain number of years in office, without doing anything remarkable, or performing any essential service. Well, then, it is to be considered whether there are any grounds on which a person can be recommended to the Crown for a pension. As there certainly are such grounds, the question arises, who are to be the judges of the qualifications entitling a person to such a recommendation? I say, the First Minister of the Crown can best know whether a person has performed his services in such a way as to justify the grant of a pension. I own, that all the pensions to which I have referred may be questioned. I admit, if I were asked what Mr. Croker had done to call for a pension, I could not give any reasons for the grant; but I think such things are very properly placed in the hands of the Crown; and no doubt the Minister of the day advised this pension, not merely because Mr. Croker was a Secretary of the Admiralty for twenty years, which may be a very agreeable occupation, but because he rendered essential service to his party, — services of the value of which I may entertain a different opinion. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Crown, being granted a certain amount on the Civil List for those purposes, with regard to such as have served the Crown (as to those who have not, that is another question), the Prime Minister is the proper person to give advice as to who shall receive pensions. Undoubtedly, as Mr. Burke said, all those pensions are subject to the control of the House of Commons. On any one of those pensions, the House may give its advice; but I don't think a calm opinion would be arrived at by Parliament, each individual voting, as he would do, according to party. I may consider those things services which would not be viewed at all in that light by those opposite. For instance, I may consider the formation of a national board of education in Ireland a great advantage: those opposed to me may look upon it as an injury. It is, therefore, far better not to make such questions or such services the subject of debate.

The Right Honourable Gentleman has said that we have forced on this discussion. I should like to know how it has been forced on, but by the persevering attempts and continual misrepresentations put forward by those who belong to the present party of the Right Honourable Gentleman. Such he considers a becoming manner in which to treat a public servant of eighty-four years of age! In the present Session, had it not been for the Honourable Member for North Durham, I know not whether this would not have passed in the same way as the various other pensions granted by the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth, and by the present First Lord of the Treasury. I heard the Right Honourable Gentleman say there was something exceedingly suspicious in Sir John Newport having expressed a desire to retire in April, and in the present arrangement not having then taken place. Here I must be allowed to say that I was rather in error in a statement I made to the House on a former occasion, because I thought that Sir John Newport had written to Lord Melbourne, from Ireland. In April, he asked to see Lord Melbourne, for the purpose of tendering his resignation; and he then stated he was about to go to Ireland, placing his resignation in his hands whenever he wished to lay it before the Crown. The Right Honourable Gentleman contends that this step was forced on him by the fact that he was a useless and inefficient Comptroller of the Exchequer. But let it be remembered, that, as he was of great age, he was entitled to leave of absence on the score of laborious service, whether he held or resigned his office. The Right Honourable Gentleman says, he should never have been appointed at all; because he was not capable of performing the duties of his office. I have been always informed that Sir John Newport attended to his duties most assiduously, and that his duties were lately increased to an extent, not originally contemplated.

The Right Honourable Gentleman next alluded, and the Honourable Member for Westminster also referred, to Mr. Ellis. Why, a Bill passed through the House on that occasion, and I remember Lord Althorp observing to me, that if any question were asked on the subject, it would be most painful to him to answer it; because Mr. Ellis was a near relative to our then colleague, Lord Ripon, and he should be obliged to say that he could not recommend Mr. Ellis for the office. In so saying, Lord Althorp merely did his duty as Minister of the Crown; because, whatever might be the considerations of economy, I do not imagine that a Minister was bound, by such views, not to recommend a person qualified for the office. In our selection of you, Sir, for that chair, I am sure we did not consider whether we should make a saving of any pension by our choice; but we were resolved to give your high office to the fittest person; and if we have exercised such a discretion, we must allow the Crown the same right. The office of Comptroller of the Exchequer was originally intended for Lord Auckland; but an objection to his holding it being urged, on the ground that he had already a situation connected with Greenwich Hospital, the proposal was withdrawn, agreeably to the wishes of that Noble Lord. I do not think that any man could have been placed in the office in every respect so entirely fit for it as Lord Auckland. He has been since called to another destiny. He became a member of the Cabinet, and afterwards Governor General of India; and though he has not filled the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, he has performed services to his country, in another capacity, which merit her deepest gratitude. The office was then offered to and accepted by Sir John Newport; and it does appear to me that the appointment was the most proper one, from the fact that he had always been the friend of Lord Grenville, who was Auditor of the Exchequer; and that he was conversant with the finances of the country. I think, too, he was the best person to be selected, for another reason, — that the Comptroller of the Exchequer ought, besides certain qualifications, to have that high rank which a man acquires by taking an active part in public life.

Now, having gone through the reasons for this grant, none of which have been shaken, I think it right to say, that it is not desirable, as a general principle, that the Comptroller of the Exchequer should look forward to a pension on the Civil List, or any other fund; but I do contend that the circumstances of Sir John Newport — his varied and long services, his great age, and the state of his pecuniary affairs — entitle him to a pension. The Right Honourable Gentleman, in the course of his speech, in which he alluded to many subjects, because he seemed glad to touch any topic rather than the resolution, which does not appear to attract a very warm support from his party, spoke of the Government "showing fight." The Right Honourable Gentleman referred, also, to two questions on which the Government was left in a minority; but there was another question which the Right Honourable Gentleman entirely omitted. There was an Honourable Baronet who seemed disposed, early in the Session, to lead a regular onset against the Government; on which the Government did not refuse to "show fight;" and on which the Right Honourable Baronet and those who thought with him produced all that could be ransacked for the last three or four years, and which ended, after all, in nothing more than in the appointment of some three magistrates, and in some promotions of which they did not approve. No French cook could cater for an epicure, denied the use of meat, with a more plentiful supply of meagre condiments. They had very little to say; and a great deal of what they did charge on us recoiled upon themselves; but the result was, that after four nights' debate, they were completely discomfited in every point. That was a question, not for the production of a Return. It turned upon no meagre and gingerly-worded resolution, but on a plain vote of want of confidence. I really thought the party opposite had made up their minds to this resolution, —"We don't mean to harass you on little points; we don't mean to snatch a vote here and there against you; but we shall submit a proposition perfectly intelligible, — that the House has no confidence in the Government, but only in the Tory party." To that proposition an answer unfavourable to those opposite was returned; and this, and all such other attempts, made by just such a contrivance as hurting the feelings of an old man, only show how forgetful those opposite now are of the reckless profusion which characterised their government; a state of oblivion in which, I am persuaded, neither this House nor the country participate.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, however pointless, however spiritless, and however gingerly worded, the Noble Lord may deem the resolution of my Honourable Friend, he has given conclusive proof that he does not consider the speech of my Right Honourable Friend who preceded him as either gingerly, spiritless, or pointless. It seems to have had the effect of completely obliterating the recollection of the Noble Lord, not only of the services rendered to him and his party by my Right Honourable Friend, but of the unvarying testimony which has been borne by the Noble Lord himself to the value of those services. Has not the Noble Lord declared that the day of separation between himself and my Right Honourable Friend was one of the most painful days of his life, on account of the proofs which my Right Honourable Friend had given of the value of those services which the Noble Lord thinks it decent now to decry. The Noble Lord has said, to-night, that my Right Honourable Friend, when one of his colleagues, and a member of the Government of Lord Grey, shrunk from his public duty. Such was the expression of the Noble Lord, after the reiterated testimony to which I have referred of the estimation in which he held the services and character of my Right Honourable Friend. Is there the slightest foundation for the assertion that my Right Honourable Friend ever shrunk from his duty as a member of the Government? Who was selected as the associate of the Noble Lord in his preparation of the Reform Bill? Was it not my Right Honourable Friend? And does the Noble Lord, now, with his impressions of reform, deny the services which my Right Honourable Friend rendered on that occasion? Does the Noble Lord deny the services of my Right Honourable Friend as First Lord of the Admiralty?

LORD J. RUSSELL.—No!

SIR R. PEEL.—"No," says the Noble Lord. Then what does the Noble Lord mean by saying, that my Right Honourable Friend shrunk from his duty as a member of the Government of Lord Grey? Who reformed the civil departments of the navy? Who was it that took credit for the great saving in the navy estimates during the government of Lord Grey? Why, the whole of that Government; and can they deny that the whole merit of it was due to my Right Honourable Friend?

LORD J. RUSSELL.—Hear, hear!

SIR J. GRAHAM.—Oh, oh!

SIR R. PEEL.—Oh,—I am reviving in the Noble Lord's recollection, some sense of my Right Honourable Friend's services. Why, this very debate might have recalled to the Noble Lord's recollection some of his services. Who was it that reformed the Comptrollership of the Exchequer? Who was it that, burdened as he was with the laborious office of First Lord of the Admiralty, found time to extend his inquiry into the whole department to which I have referred? Who was it that altered the regulations of pensions granted for civil services? It was my Right Honourable Friend, whom the Noble Lord, forgetting all his own past acknowledgments of public services, has charged with shrinking from his duty! I will tell the Noble Lord what my Right Honourable Friend shrunk from. He shrunk from office, in vindication of his principles. Rather than consent to the principle involved in the appropriation clause,—that clause by which I was deprived of the office which I held at a subsequent period,—my Right Honourable Friend shrunk from office; and, perhaps, the place which my Right Honourable Friend now occupies, from his adherence to principle, and the fate of the appropriation clause, may account for the irritation with which the Noble Lord just now addressed the House. The Noble Lord, in the course of his speech, alluded to the pensions that had been granted to other individuals, and read a list of them. The Noble Lord must surely know the complete distinction between pensions granted to holders of office, by virtue of an Act of Parliament, after a prescribed length of service, and a pension granted from the Civil List: and, notwithstanding the complaint which the Noble Lord has made of my Right Honourable Friend, for referring to the conduct of Lord Monteagle in his absence, yet the occasion was too tempting for the Noble Lord to refrain from introducing the name of Mr. Croker. "In the absence of Mr. Croker," the Noble Lord said that, although he admitted twenty years of official service, he could not, for his very life, conceive what was the nature of the service that entitled him to a pension. Allow me also to retort, that if the Noble Lord, during that long period of twenty years, had made that remark in Mr. Croker's presence, "he would probably have received such an answer as would have made him unwilling to repeat this assertion." But that pension, and the pensions granted to Mr. Planta, Mr. Hobhouse, and others, stand upon perfectly distinct and separate grounds. The power of the Crown to grant these pensions was conferred, upon the abolition of certain sinecure offices of much greater amount, to which the Crown had been entitled; and in consideration of its abandonment of those sinecure offices, the Crown had the power, after prescribed lengths of official service, to grant certain pensions. And I think it rather ungrateful of the Noble Lord, who must have had the means of estimating the services of men in departments comparatively subordinate, although they may not have been able to enter into the political contentions of the House, to make so light of services extending over a period of twenty years, during which, their best faculties have been devoted to the service of the state. The Noble Lord has complained, that we wish to draw the attention of the House from the subject before it. Now, I assure the Noble Lord that I have no such wish; and that, encouraged by his precept, rather than by his example, I will apply myself to the only question presented for our consideration. And I must again repeat, that I should be the last man to contest the merits of Sir John Newport. I admire the integrity of his character. He has rendered services to the country which would make me unwilling to deprive him of any reward to which he is entitled, and still more unwilling to embitter the remaining years of his life, which I hope may be long protracted, with as much comfort and ease as it is possible for him to enjoy. I should be very unwilling to make use of one offensive word towards him. But, Sir, the Noble Lord must not shelter the Government under the character of Sir John Newport. The Noble Lord (Lord Morpeth) has talked of "showing fight;" and when a question arises as to the public conduct of the Government, what is the answer? "Don't question us, for fear you may embitter the last years of the life of a worthy and respectable gentleman." Now, the conduct of the Government is open to question. If our comments have any such tendency, they are the responsible parties; and it is the most absurd doctrine, that we are not to question the conduct of an executive Government, for fear that some pain may be inflicted upon an individual who has been in the receipt of a pension, the granting of which is a perfectly legitimate subject for discussion. But let us consider the present question. The resolutions of my Honourable Friend affirm two principles: first, that the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, on account of the peculiar nature of its duties, ought to be independent of the Crown. Can any man deny that principle? Can any man deny that the object of Parliament has been to preserve that office specially and peculiarly from any dependence on the Crown? Why, what says the Act of Parliament, which was brought in by my Right Honourable Friend, the founder of the office now in question for the regulation of official pensions? It permitted pensions to be granted for length of service in various departments of the state, but there is one particular office which is expressly excepted, and only one.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—No, no!

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—I am aware that other offices, by classes, are excepted by the Act; but, I repeat, that the only office, specially excepted, is this particular office of Comptroller of the Exchequer. I am referring to the 15th clause, which provides that the Act shall not be construed as extending a right to pension or superannuation allowance, on the part of any officer of His Majesty's courts of Westminster Hall, or of any of His Majesty's courts of justice elsewhere; and then we come to an office which is specially named and specially excepted; and what is that office? It is this, and this alone,—"or the Comptroller of His Majesty's Exchequer." Was I not warranted, then, in saying that, specially, and by name, there was one office, the holder of which was not entitled to receive a pension? What could be the meaning of that special exception? What but this, —that that officer should be kept not only independent of parties, but, being the sole check upon the issues of the public money from the Treasury, that he should also be kept independent of the Government and of the Crown. It is plain that, under the terms of the Act, the Crown was not entitled to give a pension to this officer. The Act contains another provision, which is somewhat analogous: it declares that the Crown shall not be entitled to appoint the Comptroller of the Exchequer to any other situation held at the pleasure of the Crown, and that that officer shall be removeable, not at the will of the Crown, but only upon an Address from either House of Parliament. Can there be a more distinct proof that the intention of Parliament was, that the Comptroller of the Exchequer should not look to the Crown for favour or promotion of any kind whatever? What, then, has been done? The Crown, according to the provisions of the Act, could not grant a pension. How, then, has it been obtained? Why, it has been granted out of the Civil List. The Noble Lord says that he thinks this pension ought not to be drawn into a precedent. The Noble Lord admits that. Either the Noble Lord differs from the resolutions moved by the Honourable Member for North Durham (Mr. Liddell), and thinks that there was no impropriety in making the grant of this pension out of the Civil List; or else he thinks that the case is questionable, and ought not to be drawn into a precedent. If the Noble Lord holds to the first of these propositions,—if he thinks that the grant is defensible,—if he thinks that the holder of this office is entitled to a pension,—why does he not meet the resolutions with a direct negative? The Noble Lord does not venture to take that course, but chooses to move two other resolutions which he asks the House to adopt. Surely the Noble Lord cannot be serious in asking the House to assent to the first resolution, which quotes the preamble of one of the clauses of the Act 22 Geo. III., and finishes the quotation by an "et cætera," and then proceeds to assert, "that this limitation"—no limitation being mentioned in the quotation—"that this limitation to persons in their distress, or for their desert," not having proved a sufficient check on the grant of unmerited pensions; this House, in the year 1834, entered into certain resolutions concerning pensions." Now, in point of fact, the Act of Geo. III. imposes no limitation. Let us be accurate in our quotations. The Act of Geo. III. does this: — it especially provides that until the gross amount of pensions shall be reduced below a certain sum, no pension of more than 300*l*. a-year shall be granted to any individual, nor any of more than 600*l*. a-year in the whole; and that an account of these pensions shall annually be laid before Parliament. But when the gross amount of pensions shall have fallen below 90,000*l*. a-year, then the unlimited discretion of the Crown to grant pensions is to revert, subject only to the obligation of annually laying before Parliament an account of the pensions granted. Not a word is said about limitation. If the Noble Lord will read the speech made by Mr. Burke upon the occasion, he will find that that statesman said that "he could not control the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, but that he would limit the amount. There should not be the power of granting more than 60,000*l*. a-year."

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — 90,000*l* a-year.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — Yes: it is 90,000*l*. a-year in the Act; but Mr. Burke, in his speech, spoke of 60,000*l*. a-year as the limit. But, provided the pensions fall below 90,000*l*. a-year, there is no limit whatever. Surely the Noble Lord cannot be serious in asking the House to adopt his first resolution. I have no objection to the substance of it; but, before the Noble Lord wishes us to assent to it, I think he will see the propriety of giving it such a shape and form as shall not bring us into discredit for entering it upon the Journals of the House. But the second resolution is the more material one. The Noble Lord says that this ought not to be drawn into a precedent. Now, we do not propose to deprive Sir John Newport of his pension; and I would say, at once, that if he were deprived of it, and it should be proposed, in consideration of the particular circumstances of his case, and the expectations held out to him, that he should be provided for by a special vote of Parliament, I would vote in favour of such a proposition. Allow me to observe, however, that I am surprised at the terms of the Noble Lord's resolution; because I was the person who stated, the other night, that I thought, in special and particular cases, Parliament ought to be appealed to, and the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny was one of the very first who assented to that opinion.

MR. HUME. — No, no!

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I certainly thought so. It is possible that I may have been mistaken; but it appeared to me that the Honourable Gentleman assented to my proposition, and spoke in support of it with unusual enthusiasm. Notwithstanding what has been said by the Noble Lord, I retain my opinion, that in cases where individuals have performed such special and peculiar parliamentary services as shall appear to entitle them to a pecuniary reward, it is better that that reward should be given by Parliament, than that it should be conferred by the Crown. If services have been rendered in Parliament, let Parliament be the judge of their worth, and determine the remuneration that shall be afforded for them. I am surprised that the Noble Lord, when he was preparing his resolution, did not recollect the case of Mr. Grattan. Mr. Grattan's services were not rewarded by the Crown, but by a vote of Parliament. Mr. Pitt's debts were provided for by a vote of Parliament. Be it observed, however, when I say that I think that Parliament ought, in special cases, to make provision for parliamentary services, I think that those circumstances ought to be so peculiar and so extraordinary, that no mere majority of a Member's own party should be entitled to vote it, but that there should be a universal recognition, on the part of the House of Commons, that it is a special case, and entitled to exemption from the general rules. I am not afraid of the abuse of that rule. I think it much more likely that the Crown, by making a grant, might obtain an influence over an active parliamentary opponent, than if the matter were left entirely to the bounty and liberality of the House.

So much for the principle that the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer ought to be independent. But what did we do in 1834? We provided that the whole amount of pensions which the Crown should have the power of granting for the reward of literary service, for scientific distinction, and for services rendered to the Crown, should be 1200*l*. a-year. That was the limit; — and what have you done? Why, you have granted, at one swoop, five sixths of the whole of this sum for parliamentary service! I say that that is contrary to the intention of Parliament. And now let me appeal to every man in the House. I put this question to those who are politically opposed to me:—Suppose, when I came into office in 1835, with the resolution of the House, limiting the grant of pensions to 1200*l.* a-year, fresh in the mind of every one; — suppose at that time I had done what you have done; — suppose I had taken five sixths of the whole of that sum and had granted it to some Gentleman on this side of the House who had devoted himself to the public service in Parliament, but had not held office long enough to entitle him to a pension under the Act of Parliament; — suppose I had created a vacancy in this very office, which ought to be independent of the Crown, by granting a pension to the person who had hitherto held it on condition of his retirement; — suppose I had facilitated some political arrangement by putting a friend of mine into the office; — suppose I had done this: I ask you whether, by an immense majority from your side of the House, you would not have condemned such an act on my part in much stronger language than is employed in any part of the resolutions moved by the Honourable Member for North Durham? Would you have contented yourselves with a simple declaration that such an act ought not to be drawn into a precedent? Would you not have said, "This is a violation of the independence of the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer; this is an absorption, for party and political purposes, of five sixths of the whole sum allotted by Parliament for the reward of every species of merit?" and the most moderate resolution that I should have expected,— which would have been carried with acclamation, if you could have carried it at all, — would have been, not a resolution merely declaring that this act of mine should not be drawn into a precedent, but an humble Address to the Crown, praying that I might forthwith be removed from office, for having been guilty of such an enormity. That, undoubtedly, is the course that you would have taken. I ask you to maintain at least so much of consistency as to vote, to-night, that such an act ought not to be drawn into a precedent. The Noble Lord says it cannot be. Do not you trust to Ministerial declarations. The power of jobbing in posse is immense. You can hardly put a limit to the possibility of what can be done. If you will only convert the "cannot" into "ought not," — if, instead of considering what "cannot be done," you will prescribe what "ought not to be done," it is possible that your deliberations may attain some useful end. If you assent to the resolutions of my Noble Friend, I will prove that this cannot and will not be drawn into a precedent. If you assent to the amendment, I will prove to you that you are going to recognise a power on the part of the Crown to grant a pension of this kind.

In the first place, with every respect for the character, and every acknowledgment of the services, of Sir John Newport, I hope that the House will not establish the precedent of coming to a vote in favour of a civil officer, couched in ten times more glowing terms than any previous vote ever accorded to men of the highest possible distinction, whether civil or military. You did not do this in the case of Mr. Fox. You did not do this in the case of Mr. Pitt. I do not recollect one single instance in which the House of Commons has put upon record such a recognition of public service as that now proposed. This opens a great question. Sir John Newport is complimented in these glowing terms, because he was Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland for a period of thirteen months, — because he was Comptroller of the Exchequer for several years, — and because, whilst he was in the first of these offices, "he exerted himself to the utmost to restrain useless expenses." When the Noble Lord speaks in such fervid terms of this special service, — this exertion to restrain useless expenses, — does he forget the services rendered upon that score by my Right Honourable Friend Sir James Graham? With what consistency can the Noble Lord put this service forward, specially, as a vindication of the pension granted to Sir John Newport, and at the same time, almost in the same breath, turn round and assail the conduct of my Right Honourable Friend, who, during the whole time that he formed a part of the Administration of which the Noble Lord was a member, zealously, indefatigably, and most successfully applied himself to the curtailment of useless and unnecessary expenses? What are the special grounds laid, in the Noble Lord's resolution, in vindication of this pension? Why this:—

> That it appears to this House, that the Right Honourable Sir John Newport, in his official capacity of Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, exerted himself to the utmost to restrain useless expenses, to promote education, and to improve trade and intercourse between Ireland and the other parts of the United Kingdom; that while in the said office he directed, and after leaving office suggested, various inquiries, which led to the adoption by Parliament of measures highly conducive to the better administration of the law, and beneficial to the revenue.

Now, surely these are duties which a man ought to perform, — surely these are duties which a public man is bound to perform, — surely these are not duties to entitle a civilian to special thanks and special rewards, carried by a majority of those who concur with him in political opinions! It is a bad precedent. The Noble Lord's resolution concludes in these terms: —

> That, considering that Sir John Newport was not in affluent circumstances when he thus withdrew from office, this House is satisfied that the grant of a pension to a retired Comptroller of the Exchequer, in circumstances so peculiar, cannot be drawn into a precedent.

Observe, — not, absolutely, cannot be drawn into a precedent, but — > cannot be drawn into a precedent in favour of persons who have not "just claims on the Royal beneficence," and are not distinguished by "the performance of duties to the public."

Thus, you are not going to say that the granting of this pension cannot be drawn into a precedent; but I tell you that if you pass this resolution, you will be giving a parliamentary sanction for drawing it into a precedent. Most likely, whoever is placed in the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer will have been a man who at some period of his career has exerted himself with activity and talent in public life. How easy, then, will it be to say that he has distinguished himself in the performance of his duties to the public, and that he has a just claim upon the Royal beneficence! In such a case the Crown will be perfectly justified, under this resolution, in granting a pension from the Civil List; thereby inducing the officer to retire, and immediately appointing another in his place. Some one, perhaps, referring to the terms of the resolution now proposed, will say, "This ought not to be drawn into a precedent." "True," will be the answer, "it ought not to be drawn into a precedent in favour of a man who has no claim upon Her Majesty's beneficence — who has performed no duty to the public; but the particular friend whom we now propose to appoint to this office has a very great claim to Her Majesty's beneficence and to public gratitude; in proof of which we are prepared to lay before you an account of all the motions he has made during five-and-twenty years of parliamentary service, — of all the Committees he has appointed, — and of the savings he has effected in restraining useless expenses." Why, if my Honourable Friend the Member for Lincoln (Colonel Sibthorp) should happen to fill the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, what a catalogue of public services might be quoted to justify his being pensioned! How many motions for inquiry into useless Commissions! How many motions for inquiries into useless expenses! Sir, according to the admissions of the Noble Lord, my Honourable and Gallant Friend absolutely put an end to the Commission for granting compensation for the Bude light; and, as the Honourable Member for Westminster (Mr. Leader) has justly observed, my Gallant Friend, at one single blow, in one single vote, saved 20,000*l.* a-year to the public in the grant to Prince Albert. In such a case, with such a catalogue of public services, how could Parliament refuse to such a man the pension to which his zeal and activity in the public service would have justly entitled him? The Noble Lord, no doubt, foreseeing this case, has provided for my Honourable Friend, under the head of "performance of duties to the public." If the Noble Lord had limited himself, in his amendment, to a simple declaration that this cannot be drawn into a precedent, it would have been all very well; but when he asks the House to assent to a proposition that it cannot be drawn into a precedent, "except in cases where public services have been performed," can any one deny that, by agreeing to such a resolution, we should be giving a direct sanction to the grant of a pension from the Civil List to all persons who hereafter may hold the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer? I hope I have fulfilled my promise, — that I would not withdraw the attention of the House, by personal considerations, from the question properly before it. I entreat the House to recollect that we have the admission of the Noble Lord that this pension ought not to be drawn into a precedent. I ask the House of Commons to have the courage and manliness to reject the amendment: and as we all admit that it ought not to be drawn into a precedent, let us vote that it ought not; and thus prevent the possibility of other Governments, relying upon any resolution of ours, undermining the independence of an office, the integrity and perfect independence of which are essential to give the holder of it a due and proper control over the public expenditure.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, in rising to follow the Right Honourable Baronet who has just sat down, I intend, as far as possible, to confine the attention of the House to the real state of the question, and to warn it not to be led into a discussion of those topics which my Right Honourable Friend opposite (Sir James Graham) has so dexterously introduced — as I cannot help thinking — with the hope of picking up some stray votes. I, therefore, neither propose to follow my Right Honourable Friend through the attack which he was good enough to make upon the whole of the Government system of finance, nor to pursue the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir R. Peel) in the defence which he has made of the public services of my Right Honourable Friend. I think that the Right Honourable Baronet has a little misunderstood the observations of my Noble Friend (Lord John Russell). In the remarks that fell from my Noble Friend, there was no imputation whatever against the public services of my Right Honourable Friend, — services which I should be the first to acknowledge, both as an effective officer of the Crown, and as the minister of a public department. What my Noble Friend said was this, — that, whilst sitting on the Treasury bench, my Right Honourable Friend did not exhibit the same readiness to appear in debate in support of his colleagues, that he now evinces, on all occasions, to attack them. My Right Honourable Friend says, that the necessity for the perfect independence of the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer is such, that the House ought to mark with its censure any attempt to grant to the holder of that office any civil list pension, or, in fact, any pension whatever. Now, I should be glad to learn where my Right Honourable Friend finds any ground for censure in this proceeding, or where the House is to discover the principle which, for the first time, I have heard laid down? I had the honour, along with my Right Honourable Friend, to serve on the Commission which recommended the alterations to be made in the pension list; and I confess that I have now, for the first time, learned that there was any intention whatever of so controlling the power of granting pensions as to preclude the Comptroller of the Exchequer from ever receiving any retired allowance whatever. I find nothing of that kind either in the Report of the Commissioners or in the Act of Parliament, which was subsequently introduced and passed, founded upon the Report. In point of fact, the very provision upon which my Right Honourable Friend has laid so much stress — the very provision which deprived Lord Auckland of the office — did not exist in the Act when it was first introduced by the Government, but was subsequently inserted by Parliament. But is there anything in the acts and proceedings of the Legislature, in analogous cases, that could lead the Government to discover the new principle which is now laid down, for the purpose of casting a censure on Sir John Newport's pension, and upon the Government? I will refer to some cases which appear to me to be strictly analogous. In the first place, there is the office of Assistant Comptroller of the Exchequer. That officer, in the absence of the Comptroller of the Exchequer, discharges all the duties which the Comptroller can perform, and exercises precisely the same check upon the Treasury, in regulating the expenditure of the public money. It is, therefore, as requisite, that the Assistant Comptroller should be independent of the Crown, as that the Comptroller himself should be independent. Yet the Assistant Comptroller is entitled to a superannuation allowance, and that superannuation allowance is settled by the Treasury. What, then, becomes of the assertion of my Right Honourable Friend, that there is no possibility of mistaking the principle that the party who exercises this check upon the Treasury must be a party wholly independent of the Crown, — a party never to be admitted to any pension whatever?

Passing from the office of Assistant Comptroller of the Exchequer, let the House look, for a moment, to another analogous case, — that of the auditors of public accounts. Is it not as essential that those officers should be independent, as that the Comptroller of the Exchequer should be independent? I think it much more important that they should be independent of the Crown and of the Treasury than the Comptroller himself. In the first place, they hold their appointments during life, — they are Parliamentary Commissioners, not Commissioners appointed by the Crown. They have also certain judicial powers; for instance, they have the power of taking evidence upon oath, and they actually audit the accounts of the Treasury. If ever there was a case, then, to which the new-found principle ought to apply, surely it must be that of the auditors of public accounts; and yet they constantly receive retired allowances from the Treasury. I therefore contend that we had no reason, either from the Report of the Commissioners, from the Act of Parliament, or from analogous cases, to suppose that the Comptrollership of the Exchequer was an office in which the constitutional principle was involved. My Right Honourable Friend has declared that, if Government had given Sir John Newport a pension before his acceptance of the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, he should not have quarrelled with it, — such was his respect for that gentleman. I call upon my Right Honourable Friend to show upon what ground the claim which Sir John Newport had in 1834 was forfeited in 1835, because, instead of applying for a pension, which would have been, at that time, deservedly granted to him, he was willing to continue his services down to a recent period, in an office the duties of which he most efficiently discharged. The Right Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir R. Peel) has made a very facetious attack upon the resolution of my Noble Friend (Lord Morpeth), because he says it includes certain words of Mr. Burke, and that they are not enacting words, and are really of no importance. Now, I would ask, are the words giving the power of granting pensions to the Crown mere words of course? Was there no reason for putting them into the Act? Are they surplusage? or were they not rather meant to be the guide to future Ministers in recommending the Crown to grant pensions? The Right Honourable Gentleman has commented on the inconsistency of an Honourable Member who objected, on a former night, not to giving a pension to Sir John Newport on the authority of the Crown, but by a parliamentary vote. Now, if the Honourable Member has changed his opinion, he has the authority of the Right Honourable Baronet for so doing. In 1837, on the discussion of the Civil List, a proposal was made by the Honourable Member for London, to place the power of granting pensions in the hands of the House, and to take it from the Crown. What said the Right Honourable Baronet on that occasion? —

> I am, however, very averse to the proposition for allowing such a power to be reposed in this House. A popular assembly never wisely interferes with the distribution of patronage; and no instance can be found, either remote or proximate, in the history of the House, in which it can be proved that Parliament ever wisely performed the appropriate duties of the Executive.

The Right Honourable Baronet went on to say, — and I beg the House to attend to the words, for they peculiarly apply to the present case, —

> An assembly, such as the House of Commons, is too much governed by impulse for the just exercise of such a right. The course of their proceedings, I fear, would be this, — that, under certain circumstances, they would give a great deal too much, whilst, under the influence of other considerations, and impelled by some feeling of the moment, they would be tempted to neglect public services of the highest moment.

Now, I cannot help thinking that such circumstances as those alluded to by the Right Honourable Baronet may have some weight in the decision of the present question, and that those circumstances may induce many Honourable Members to overlook public services of the highest moment. The other point to which the Right Honourable Baronet has directed his observations was the amount of this pension. The Right Honourable Baronet says, "You have only 1200*l.* a-year to spend, and in this pension you have disposed of 1000*l.* at once." Now, in the first place, I beg the House to remember that the bounty of the Crown has not been exhausted, and that there still remains for the reward of literary and scientific merit a sufficient sum to meet any claims which may arise. Let not the House be deluded by the assertion, that, because 1000*l.* out of the 1200*l.* are spent, there is, therefore, no reserved fund for those purposes. The Right Honourable Baronet knows, perfectly well, that, according to an arrangement recommended by himself, if the Crown does not grant the full amount of the sum intrusted to it for pensions in any one year, the surplus goes over to another year, and, consequently, there remains an amount sufficient to meet those fair claims which may be brought forward. But I wish to recall to the recollection of the House what the Right Honourable Baronet himself said regarding the proposed allowance to Prince Albert, when we wished to compare it with allowances formerly granted to the Queen Consort of the reigning Monarch. The Right Honourable Baronet then argued that the allowance in the recent case was much greater than was warranted by precedents, inasmuch as it was for a very young life. Now, I think the same argument applies to the grant of the pension now under consideration. The Right Honourable Baronet says that five sixths of the whole amount given to a single person for his political services is an enormous sum. I think that that depends entirely on the age of the party. If this amount had been granted to a young person, it might have been fairly objected to; but when a pension is granted to a person eighty-four years of age, he is not very likely (to use a phrase which has been often repeated) to "encumber" — but, I say, to ornament — the pension list much longer; and therefore the House need feel less difficulty about the amount, knowing that this would be required, in all probability, for a much shorter time than the generality of pensions. My Noble Friend, in alluding to the pensions granted by former Governments, did not intend to depreciate the fairness of their motives, or the propriety of their conduct, because he said, "of the merits of the parties I am no fair judge." But when I find that no public servant of political eminence has received a smaller pension than 1000*l*., and that Sir John Newport wanted only a few months of the full time to entitle him to a pension, I do not think that the amount could be fairly objected to. The Right Honourable Baronet, both to-night and on a former occasion, has stated his opinion, that if Sir John Newport's pension had been granted before he held the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, it would have been a proper pension, and that it would not have been an unfair exercise of the prerogative of the Crown; and I therefore ask the House, seeing that the resolutions of the Honourable Member opposite are only proposed by way of a censure on the Government, which gave the pension, and on Sir John Newport, who receives it, at once to negative them.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, after having been alluded to in the course of the debate, I cannot allow the discussion to close without stating that I think both parties have taken an erroneous view of this subject. The speeches which have been made on this occasion do not apply either to the original motion or the amendment. One half of the speech of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke was directed against the passing over of Mr. Ellis; and on that point I entirely agree with him. The speech of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth was criminatory of Lord Monteagle and of the Government for the appointment which they have made. If Honourable Gentlemen opposite mean to censure the Government, why do they not expressly declare their intention, and name the parties whom they blame? It is on account of their not having done so that I feel some difficulty as to the vote which I ought to give. The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth was not so correct in his dates as he was, apparently, strong in his reasoning. He asked, if he had made such an appointment in 1835, what course would have been taken? The Right Honourable Baronet must be aware that the resolutions to which reference has been made were not in existence at that time; for they were not passed until 1837. The Right Honourable Baronet will bear in mind that I divided the Committee on the question, that no pensions be granted out of the Civil List; and so far from objecting to their coming before Parliament, what I said was, "If any public man is entitled to a public reward, let him receive it openly by a vote of this House;" and he will also recollect that I said, "If you give the Crown the power of granting pensions, abuses will take place; — if you wish the Crown to have that power, place an additional amount on the privy purse; and if the pensions are granted by the Sovereign, the House will have no right to quarrel with them." I beg to call the attention of the House to what took place at the time the vote of 1200*l*. was agreed to. When that sum was proposed to the Committee by the Honourable Member for Aberdeen, the Right Honourable Baronet opposite objected to it as being too small. The answer given was, that it was not intended to recompense political services; and I will venture to say, that not one word fell from Lord Althorp, on Mr. Harvey's motion, which could induce the House to believe that any portion of this sum would be applied as the reward of political services. I must protest against the doctrine laid down by the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud, which holds out an inducement to every man in the House to look forward to rewards from the Crown for services performed in this House; and I therefore consider it impossible for any independent Member of the House to vote for the amendment. The Noble Lord certainly said, he wished it to be understood that future Comptrollers of the Exchequer would have no claim to a pension. My objections to voting for the amendment are twofold; — first, that this pension was granted for parliamentary services; and next, that it was given on account of Sir John Newport having been five years Comptroller of the Exchequer, although the Act expressly deprives every Comptroller of the claim. If the pension was not granted on either of these grounds, let the Noble Lord say so, and I shall be satisfied with the declaration. In my opinion, the vacancy was created for the sole purpose of conferring the office on Lord Monteagle; and I regret that the resolutions of the Honourable Gentleman opposite do not state that fact in a more explicit manner. I wish the House had seen the date of the letter in which the first application was made. If the Noble Lord had stated that, he might have removed all the doubt and suspicion with which the transaction is regarded throughout the country. I can assure the Noble Lord that the general impression is, that the granting this pension was a mere job, for the purpose of favouring Lord Monteagle; and I tell him, that it will be extremely difficult to remove that impression from the public mind. I certainly, as I said before, feel some difficulty in recording my vote; but, on the whole, I am inclined to support the original motion, although it is not framed exactly as I think it ought to have been.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, with regard to the statement of the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, as to the date of the vacancy in the Comptrollership of the Exchequer, I thought that that matter had been sufficiently set at rest by the declarations of Lord Melbourne, Lord Duncannon, and Sir John Newport, all of whom stated that it had nothing to do with Lord Monteagle's retirement from the Chancellorship of the Exchequer.

Mr. T. S. DUNCOMBE. — I feel some difficulty in rising to speak upon this subject, which has been designated a "job." The question is, how are we to deal with this job? When my Honourable Friend (Mr. Hume) rose, I thought it was for the express purpose of saying something in defence of the proposition which he has placed on the notice paper; but he has not thought proper to say a word on the subject. All that I can say is, that if it were possible, according to the forms of the House, for you, Sir, to put all the three different propositions from the chair together, — the proposition of the Honourable Gentleman the Member for North Durham (Mr. Liddell); the proposition of the Noble Lord the Member for the West Riding of the county of York (Viscount Morpeth); and the proposition of my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny; — I should feel the greatest satisfaction in voting against all the three; for there never were three more absurd propositions; — or, if there be one more absurd than another, so far as the public are concerned, I should fix upon that of my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny. It is generally assumed that there are no strangers in the House, and I am bound to assume that to be the case; but if there should be any present, I would address them, in order that it may go forth to the public that the whole of this debate has nothing whatever to do with the public interests. I wish to know whether, in any of the propositions which have been made, any one individual has proposed to save the public purse one shilling? Far from it. With the exception of the proposition of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, whose object is to put 1200*l.* a-year additional upon the public burdens, the whole of the discussion ends in this, — that the Honourable Member for North Durham says that the pension to Sir John Newport "ought not to be drawn into a precedent;" whilst the Noble Lord the Member for the West Riding says "it cannot be drawn into a precedent." Now, the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth cannot trust to that declaration. I recommend neither the House nor the public to trust to it; for, although this House may say that it cannot be drawn into a precedent, and although it ought not to be drawn into a precedent, yet the next House of Commons, with the Tory Administration which will, in all probability, succeed the present, may say, "What have we to do with their 'ought not' or 'cannot?' This is a precedent which has been established for a measure which we will repeat whenever we think proper." But let us look at the conclusion of the motion of the Honourable Member for North Durham, — for his premises are not disputed, — "That, considering all these circumstances, and more especially the great importance of keeping the Comptroller General of the Exchequer independent of the influence of the Crown" ——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

"Hear, hear!" I should like to know from Honourable Gentlemen who are now so desirous of keeping the executive Government independent of the influence of the Crown, when they acquired their new-born zeal? When did it commence? Did it commence in the reign of George III.? Did it exist when Mr. Dunning proposed a resolution that "the influence of the Crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished?" Did the Tories declare that the influence of the Crown ought to have no influence with the Executive when appointments were made in former reigns? Did they entertain this opinion in the reign of George IV.? or in the days of William IV.? No. It was reserved for the reign of Victoria for the Tories to come forward and say, the influence of the Crown ought not to be used in the executive Government! The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke says that he has a great regard for Sir John Newport, and that this motion has nothing to do with him — that it is, in fact, a vote of censure on Her Majesty's Ministers. If this be so, why not state the fact? Instead of saying that this grant ought not to be drawn into a precedent, why do not Honourable Gentlemen say, "This is an act unworthy of Her Majesty's Ministers?" Why do they not state, fairly, "This is a gross job?" Let them state that, and I will say that I agree with them. But they will not do any such thing; they evade the question, and will not directly assert the censure. I should like to ask those Honourable Members opposite who were in Parliament in 1830, whether they recollect a motion made by Sir Robert Heron? Do they recollect the names of Dundas and of Bathurst? Do they recollect the pensions proposed to be given by the Tories of those days? How did the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day defend the proposition? We have it stated upon the Votes that Sir John Newport has served the public for fifty years, and that he is entitled to a pension; and I have not heard any one deny the justice of the claim. If he be not entitled, put the question on the footing of a vote of censure, and let it be fairly met. To use the Noble Lord's expression, — which is not, perhaps, remarkably elegant, although it is very expressive, — Honourable Gentlemen have certainly approached this question in the most "gingerly" manner. How have those Gentlemen defended other pensions? How did the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1830 (Mr. Goulburn, I believe) defend the pensions to Messrs. Bathurst and Dundas? He said, —

> As to the precise nature of the services of those individuals, I am not prepared to answer. I think it rather unfortunate that the length of their services has not been stated in the estimate; but I believe that their service was of about four years' duration, the appointments having taken place in 1825.*

Now, four years' duration was all that the Right Honourable Gentleman had to say in favour of the services of Messrs. Dundas and Bathurst. The Right Honourable Gentleman went on, —

> Mr. Bathurst, although called by the Honourable Baronet a very young gentleman, had been a considerable time at the bar. [Laughter.] I really do not see what there is to excite Honourable Gentlemen's laughter in the circumstance of a gentleman's pursuing an honourable profession. It may appear ridiculous to some Honourable Members; but to me it seems an honourable path for a man to pursue, whatever may be his rank in life. Mr. Bathurst and Mr. Dundas, who had both embarked in different professions, abandoned them on being put into the situations of Commissioners of the Navy, and the principle of compensation and allowances, when reduced, applies perfectly to them.†

Whilst the pension to Sir John Newport, after fifty years' service, is opposed by Honourable Gentlemen opposite, they were quite ready to grant 500*l.* a-year to each of two individuals, in whose favour all that could be said was, that one of them had been at the bar, and that their public services had been of four years' duration. I should like to hear any Honourable Gentleman state to the House how the public interests are concerned in this debate? I contend that the public interests are not concerned in it. It is a mere fight between the two factions; and whichever may succeed is a matter of perfect indifference to the public. I can only repeat that, of the three propositions, that of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny is the most absurd; and as I entertain considerable doubt which of the other two is to be preferred, I feel bound to give the benefit of that doubt to those whose administration I consider most beneficial to the country.

Mr. WYNN. — Sir, from the complexion which this debate has assumed, I feel peculiar difficulty in stating that I differ on this occasion from those with whom I have usually been in the habit of acting. I feel this to be a judicial question, upon which I am bound to give a vote according to my construction of the Act of Parliament, and according to my opinion of the merits of the individual who has been made the subject of the present motion. I am relieved from considerable difficulty by the fair and liberal admission of the merits of the Right Honourable Baronet who has filled the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, which has been made by my Honourable Friends, who, I believe, are of opinion, that when Sir John Newport retired from Parliament he was fully entitled to a pension; and, according to their construction of the Act, there was nothing to prevent him from having then received it. I certainly was not friendly to the resolutions passed by the House in 1837, and I will not go further than I am warranted in doing by the words of those resolutions. By the Act 1 & 2 Victoria, pensions to the amount of 1200*l.* a-year are allowed to be granted to such persons as may have just claims on the Royal beneficence. Now, I believe Sir John Newport to have just claims on the Royal beneficence. The Act continues:—"or who by their personal services to the Crown, or by the performance of their duties to the public, have merited the gracious consideration of the Sovereign and the gratitude of the country." I believe Sir John Newport, by the performance of his public duties, during the long period that he sat in Parliament, to have merited the gracious consideration of the Sovereign and the gratitude of the country; and I cannot find that public servants are precluded from the consideration of those whose duty it is to advise Her Majesty in the bestowal of these pensions, although the individual may only have held office at intervals, and only for a few months at a time. I do not think that the claim of Mrs. Fox or of Mrs. Tierney to a pension were invalidated, because Mr. Fox was Secretary of State only for a short time, or because Mr. Tierney had only been a short time in office. I have had the opportunity of witnessing the services of Sir John Newport; and I feel it my duty on the present occasion to bear my testimony to their value. I believe that no man was ever more indefatigable in his exertions, more upright in the whole of his parliamentary conduct, or more honourable in the discharge of his duties. Under these circumstances, I am not prepared to say that such a grant as the present ought not to form a precedent for similar grants, if similar merit shall be proved, to individuals at that advanced period of life, who have met with reverses of fortune. But the argument that seems to have the greatest weight with my Honourable Friends is this, — that having held the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, Sir John Newport has become disqualified from receiving a pension. Now, I am quite ready to admit that the holding of that office did not give Sir John Newport any claim; but, having a claim before that time, I contend that that appointment was not a disqualification as to such claim. What was the object of the Act of Parliament? It was, that a person should not receive any pension from the Crown at the time of holding the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer; that the holding of the office should not give him a claim to a pension. But allow me to ask whether, if an individual entitled to a retiring pension be appointed to the office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, and retain that office only for a short time, he thereby loses the claim which he previously possessed? I think this would neither be fair towards the individual, nor economical on the part of the public; because the pension would be suspended during the time the individual held the office; and that amount would, consequently, be saved to the public. Upon these grounds, after having listened to the whole of the debate, and given the fullest consideration to the subject, I feel myself bound to vote for the amendment of the Noble Lord.

† Ibid.

Mr. LIDDELL. — Sir, I should not have troubled the House with a single observation, in reply, but for some remarks which have fallen from the Honourable Member for Finsbury. Not content with stating his opinions on the subject under consideration, the Honourable Member has brought forward a tu quoque argument, and has contended that Honourable Members on this side of the House are only anxious to prevent jobs when they are not themselves in office; and the Honourable Member has alluded to certain circumstances connected with a former Government, when my Right Honourable Friend held office. I have ever sat as an independent Member of this House, and I remember, at least as well as the Honourable Member for Finsbury, the circumstances of the case to which he has alluded; and I must say, now that the clouds of obloquy which obscured the Government of the Duke of Wellington have passed away, that if there was any one transaction more than another which redounded to the credit of the Government of the Noble Duke, it was the identical transaction which the Honourable Member has condemned. What were the real circumstances of the case? The Noble Duke, with that zeal for economy which has ever characterised him, finding that certain expenses might be saved to the country, cut off the offices held by Mr. Bathurst and by Mr. Dundas, although those offices were usually held for life. Instead of reducing any of the old clerks, — instead of making a job, as some Honourable Members would have done if placed in the same circumstances, — the Noble Duke, without hesitation, cut off the offices held by the sons of two members of his Cabinet; offices which, up to that time, had invariably been held for life, and the acceptance of which may have materially affected their future circumstances. After having done so, the Noble Duke proposed to grant them a small retiring pension of 500*l*. a-year, which Parliament, in its wisdom, I cannot say in its justice, thought fit to withhold. How that transaction can be characterised as a gross job I will leave the House to decide. I have no interest in coming forward as the apologist of that transaction; and I speak only from my own feelings and impressions, which are as likely to be founded on justice and on honour as those of the Honourable Member for Finsbury. Having said thus much in vindication of the Government of the Duke of Wellington, I will not detain the House by offering any further observations on the question upon which we are about to decide.

Question put, "That after the word

'functions,' at the end of the fifth paragraph, the following words be there inserted:—'That, by an Act of 22 Geo. III. c. 82., it was declared, "And whereas much confusion and expense did arise from having pensions paid at various places, and by various persons, and a custom hath prevailed of granting pensions on a private list during His Majesty's pleasure, upon a supposition that in some cases it may not be expedient for the public good to divulge the names of the persons in the said list, or that it may be disagreeable to the persons receiving such pensions to have it known that their distresses are so relieved, or for saving the expense of fees and taxes on small pensions; by means of which said usage, secret and dangerous corruption may hereafter be practised: and whereas it is no disparagement for persons to be relieved by the Royal bounty in their distress, or for their desert; but, on the contrary, it is honourable in just cause to be thought worthy of reward, &c:" That this limitation to persons in their distress, or for their desert, not having proved a sufficient check on the grant of unmerited pensions, this House, in the year 1834, entered into certain resolutions concerning pensions.'"

Agreed to.

Another amendment proposed, to leave out from the first word "That," in the last paragraph, to the end of the question, in order to add the words "it appears to this House that the Right Honourable Sir John Newport, in his official capacity of Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, exerted himself to the utmost to restrain useless expenses, to promote education, and to improve trade and intercourse between Ireland and the other parts of the United Kingdom; that while in the said office he directed, and after leaving office suggested, various inquiries, which led to the adoption by Parliament of measures highly conducive to the better administration of the law, and beneficial to the revenue; that, after serving for five years in the honourable office of Comptroller of the Exchequer, being then upwards of eighty years of age, and afflicted with bodily infirmity, he withdrew from public life, respected for the unblemished integrity of his character, to pass in retirement the remainder of his days:

That, considering that Sir John Newport was not in affluent circumstances when he thus withdrew from office, this House is satisfied that the grant of a pension to a retired Comptroller of the Exchequer, in circumstances so peculiar, cannot be drawn into a precedent in favour of persons who have not 'just claims on the Royal beneficence,' and are not distinguished by 'the performance of duties to the public,' instead thereof."

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question." The House divided:—Ayes 240, Noes 212; Majority against Ministers 28.

Main question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

MILITARY OPERATIONS (INDIA).

On the motion of SIR JOHN HOBHOUSE, Order (6th February), " That this House doth highly approve and acknowledge the discipline and patient perseverance displayed by the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, both European and native, during a long and painful march through an untried country; and doth also highly approve and acknowledge their undaunted courage at the assault and capture of Ghuznee; " read, and discharged.

Resolved, nemine contradicente, " That this House doth highly approve and acknowledge the discipline and patient perseverance displayed by the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, both European and native, during a long and painful march through an untried country; and doth also highly approve and acknowledge their undaunted courage at the assault and capture of Ghuznee and Khelat."

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S FUND ACT.

Committee nominated; Sir Thomas Troubridge, Mr. Sheil, Captain Alsager, Sir Charles Grey, Mr. Chapman, Mr. Wilshere, Lord Viscount Sandon, Mr. Dennistoun, Mr. Callaghan, Mr. Ingham, Mr. Alderman Thompson, Mr. Bewes, and Mr. Crawford; power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

PARLIAMENTARY BURGHS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Second reading deferred till Monday, 9th March.

EAST INDIA PRODUCE.

Committee to be nominated this day.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — Sir, I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee on the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill.

COLONEL PERCEVAL.—I hope the Noble Lord will not proceed with the Bill at this late hour.

LORD MORPETH. — Certainly not, if there be any objection.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I object to the removal of Sligo from Schedule A to Schedule B; and several other Members entertain similar views.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I propose to proceed with the Bill to-morrow, before the Committee of Supply.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — What! I can scarcely believe that the order will be proceeded with to-morrow; because I undoubtedly expect, after the decision to which the House has come, that the Government will resign their situations. Surely the Noble Lord will not think of going on!

[Laughter.]

Committee deferred till this day.

CHINA.

Petition of the chairman of a meeting held in the Mariners' Church, Wellclose Square, — for investigation of the evils connected with the opium trade. — To lie on the table.

RETURNS.

Ordnance Stores. — On the motion of Mr. GISBORNE, Return ordered —

Of the average annual value of the stores which have, for the last five years, been in the custody of the storekeeper or deputy at each of the thirty Ordnance out-stations, at which there is a salaried storekeeper or deputy, or both; and a Return of the average annual value of the stores issued at each of those stations for the same period:
